THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH,

THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND QVEENE, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c.

A der hope of your Highnesse gracious and accustomed fauour, I have presumed to present here onto your Majestic, Plutarchs lives translated, as a booke sit to be protested by your Highnesse, and meete to be set forth in English. For who is sitter to give countenance to so many great states, then such an high and mighty Princesse? who is sitter to revive the dead memorie of their fame, then she that beareth the lively image of their vertues? who is sitter to authorize a worke of so great learning and wisedome, then she whom all do honour as the Muse of the world? Therefore I humbly beseech your Majestie, to suffer the simplenesse of my translation, to be covered under the amplenesse of your Highnesse protestion. For, most gracious Soveraigne, though this booke be no booke for your Majesties selfe, who are meeter to be the chiefe storie, then a student therein, and can better understand it in Greeke, then any man can make it English:

The Epistle Dedicatorie.

yet I hope the common fort of your subjects shall not onely profit themselues hereby, but also he animated to the better service of your Majeslie. For among all the prophane bookes that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your Highneffe best knowes) that teacheth so much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and denotion to Princes, as these lines of Plutarch do. How many examples shall your subjects reade here, of seuerall persons and whole armies, of noble and base, of yong and old, that both by sea and land, at home and abroad, have strained their wits, not regarding their states, ventured their persons, yea cast away their lines, not onely for the honour and safety, but also for the pleasure of their Princes?

Then well may the Readers thinke, if they have done this for heathen Kings, what should we do for Christian Princes? If they have done this for glory, what should we do for religion? If they have done this without hope of heaven, what should we do, that looke for immortality? And so adding the encouragement of these examples, to the forwardnesse of their owne dispositions: what service is there in war, what honour in peace, which they will not be ready to doe, for their worthy Queene?

And therfore that your Highnesse may give grace to the Booke, and the Booke may do his service to your Majestie: I have translated it out of French, and do here most humbly present the same vnto your Highnesse; beseeching your Majestie with all humility, not to reiest the good meaning, but to pardon the errours of your most humble and obedient subiect and servant, who prayeth God long to multiply all graces and blessings vpon your Majestie. Written the sixteenth day of Januarie, 1579.

> Your Majesties most humble and obedient seruant,

To the Reader.

೨ കേറ്റെද്ද HE profite of stories, and the praise of the Author, are sufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epistle to the Reader: so that I shall not need to make many words thereof. And indeed if you will supply the defects of this translation, with your owne diligence and good understanding: you shall not need to trust him, you may proue your schees, that there you shall not need to trutt him, you may proue you it mes, emediate is no prophane studie better then Pintarch. All other learning is prinate, fitter for Vniuersities then Cities, fuller of contemplation then experience, more commendable in ftudents themselues, then profitable vnto others. Whereas flories are fit for energy place, reach to all perfons, ferue for all times, teach the lining, renine the dead, so farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to see learning in Noblemens lines, then to reade it in Philosophers writings. Now for the Author, I will not denie but loue may deceiue me, for I must needs loue him with whom I have taken so much paine; but I beleeve I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitablest storic of all Authors. For all other were faine to take their matter, as the fortune of the countries whereof they wrote, fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath chosen the speciall acts of the best persons, of the famous of the world. But I will leaue the judgement to your felues. My onely purpose is to desire you to excuse the saults of my translation, with your owne gentlenesse, and with the opinion of my diligence and goodintent. And so I wish you all the profit of the booke. Fare ye well. The source and twentieth day of Ianuarie. 1579.

THOMAS MORTH.

Amiot to the Readers.

HE reading of bookes which bring but avaine and unprofitable pleasure to the Reader, is suftly missisked of wise and grave men. Againe, the reading of such as do but onely bring prosit, and make the Reader to be in love therewith, and do not ease the paine of the reading by some pleasantnesse in the Same : do seeine somewhat har sh to divers delicate wits, that cannot tarie. long upon them. But such bookes as yeeld pleasure and profit, and do both delight and teach, have all that a man can defire why they should be univer-(ally liked and allowed of all forts of men, according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

> That he which matcheth profit with delight, Doth winne the prize in every point aright.

Either of these yeeld his effect the better by reason the one runneth with the other profiting the more because of the delight, and delighting the more because of the prosit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to have pleasure and profit matched together, which kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this wife arme in arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or invention of man. In respect whereof it may be reasonably anowed, that men are more beholding to such good wits, as by their grave and wise writing have deserved the name of Historiographers then they are to any other kind of writers: because an history is an orderly register of notable things faid, done, or happened in times past, to maintaine the continuall remembrance of them, and to serne for the instruction of them to come.

And like as memory is as a store-house of mens conceits and devices, without the which the actions of the other two parts (bould be unperfect, and well-neare unprofitable: so may it also be said, that an history is the very treasury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, and the wonderfull aduentures and strange cases, (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserned from the death of forgetfulnesse. Hereupon itriseth that Plato the wife saith that the name of history was given to the recording of matters, to stay the fleeting of our memory, which otherwise would be some lost, and retaine little. And we may well perceive how greatly we be beholding unto it, if we do no more but consider in how horrible darknesse, and in how beastly and pestilent a quagmire of ignorance we should be plunged: if the remembrance of all the things that have bene done, and have happened before we were borne, were veterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will overpasse the excellencie and worthinesse of the thing it selfe, for a smuch as it is not onely of more antiquity then any other kind of writing that ever was in the world; but also was vsed among men, before there was any vee of letters at allibecause that men in those dayes delinered in their lifetimes the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songs, which they caused their children to learne by heart, from hand to hand, as is to be seene yet in our dayes, by the example of the barbarous people that inhabite the new-found land in the West, who without any records of writings, have had the knowledge of things past, wel neare eight hundred yeares afore, Likewise I leave to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, and durablest monument that men can leave of their doings in this world, to confecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither picture nor image of marble, nor arch of triumph, nor pillar, nor sumptuous sepulcher, that can match the durablenesse of an eloquent history, furnished with the properties which it ought to have. Againe, I mind not to fland much vpon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwaics profeseth to speake truth, and for that the proper ground therof is to treate of the greatest and highest things that are done in the world : insomuch that (to my seeming) the greatest profit thereof is as Horace faith, that it is commonly called the mother of troth and vprightnesse which commendeth it fo greatly, as it needeth not elfewhere to feeke any authority, or ornament of dignity, but of her very (elfe. For it is a certainerule and instruction; which by examples past, teacheth vs to sudge of things present, and to foresee things to come: so as we may know what to like of, and what to follow: what to mislike and what to eschue. It is a picture which (as it were in a table) setteth before our eyes the things worthie of remembrance that have bene done inold time by mighty nations, noble Kings and Princes, wife Gouernours, valiant Captaines, and persons renowmed for some notable quality, reprefenting vato us the manners of strange nations, the lawes and customes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their consultations and enterprises, the meanes that they have vied to compasse them withall, and their demeaning of them selues when they were come to the highest, or throwne downe to the lowest degree of state. So as it is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or warre, in publike or prinate affaires, but that the person which shall have diligently read; well conceived, and throughly remembred histories, shall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counsell whereby to resolve himselfe to take a part, or to give advice unto others, how to choose in doubtfull and dangerous cases, that which may be for their most profit, and in time to find out to what point the matter will come if it be well handled: and how to moderate himselfe in prosperity, and how to cheare up and beare himselfe in aduersity. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacie, and speed, then the bookes of morall Philosophie do : for asmuch as examples are of more force to moue and instruct, then are the arguments and proofes of reason, or their precise precepts; because examples be the very formes of our deedes, and accompanied with all circumstances. Whereas reasons and demonstrations are generall and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into understanding: and examples tend to the shewing of them in practife and execution, because they do not onely declare what is to be done. but also worke a desire to do it, as well in respect of a certaine natural inclination which all menhaue to follow examples, as also for the beautie of vertue, which is of such power, that where some she is seene, she maketh her selfe to be loved and liked. Againe, it doth things with greater weight and granitie, then the inventions and devices of the Poets: because it helpeth not it selfe with any other thing then with the plaine truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly enrich things by commending them about the starres and their deferuing, because the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreover, it doth things with more grace and modestie then the civil lawes and ordinances do: because it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, then to chastife or punish. And yet for all this, an history also bath his manner of punishing the wicked, by the reproch of enertasting infamie, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance; which is a great meane to withdraw them from vice, who otherwise would be leudly and wickedly disposed. Likewise on the contrary part, the immortall praise and glorie wherewith it rewardeth wel-doers, is a very linely and sharpe source for men of noble courage and gentleman-like nature, to cause them to adventure voon all manner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high courage and wisedome, who for desire to continue the remembrance of their name by the sure and certaine record of histories, have willingly yeelded their lives to the service of the common-weale, spent their goods, sustained infinite paines both of body and mind in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in stablishing of lawes and gonernements, and in the finding out of arts and sciences necessary for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithfull registring whereof, the thanke is due to histories. And although true vertue seeke no reward of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her selfe with the conscience of her well doing: yet not with standing I am of opinion, that it is good and meet to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their wertuous deeds, seeing that honour doth naturally accompanie vertue, as the shadow doth the body. For mecommonly see, that not to feele the parkes of desire of honour, is an infallible signe of a base, wile, and clownife nature : and that such as count it an unnecessary needlesse, or unseemely thing to be praised, are likewise no doers of any things worthie of praise, but are commonly men of faint courage, whose thoughts extend no further then to their lines, whereof also they have no further remembrance, then is before their eyes. But if the counsell ofoldmen be to be greatly esteemed because they must needs have seene much by reason of their long life: and if they that have travelled long in Grange countries, and have had the managing of many affaires, and have gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for sage, and worthie to have the reynes of great governments put into their bands: how greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, which is able to furnish vs with more examples in one day, then the whole course of the longest life of any man is able to do ? Insomuch that they which exercife them clues in reading as they ought to do although they be but your become fuch inrespect of understanding of the affaires of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they never have removed out of their houles, yet are they adverted dinformed, and faturied of all things in the world, as well as they that have (hortned their lines by innumerable travels and infinite dangers, in running over the whole earth that is inhabited; whereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the thines that were done er come to passe before they were born. continue still as children, though they be never to aged, and are but as strangers in their owne native countries. To be fort it may be truly faid, that the reading of histories is the schoole of wisdome, to falkion mens understanding by considering adulfedly the state of the world that is pair, and by marking diligently by what lawes, manners, and discipline, Empires, Kingdomes and dominions, have in old time bene stablished, and afterward maintained and increased: or contrariwise changed dimini-Shed, and overthrowne. Also wereade, that when some the right (age and vertuous Emperor of Rome, Alexander Scuerus, was to confult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned wars or gouernment: he alwaies called (uch to counsell as were reported to be well seem in histories. Netwith-"flanding I know there are that will fland against me in this point, and wphold that the reading of history ries can ferue to (mall purpose, or none at all towards the geiting of skill because skill consisted in action and is engendred by the very experience and prastife of things, when a man doth well make and throughly beare away the things that he hath feene with his eyes, and found some by proofe, according to the (aying of the ancient Poet Afranius:

My name is Skill, my Syre Experience hight,

And Memorie bred and brought me forth to light. Which thing was meant likewife by the Philosopher that faid, that the hand is the instrument of skill. By reason whereof it commeth to passe (say they) that such as speake of musters of government and flate, but feetally of matters of warre by the booke, fleake but as booke knights, as the French proverbe termeth them, after the manner of the Grecians, who call him a booke Pelot, which bath not the fure and certaine knowledge of the things that he speakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the understanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that confist on the deed doing where the hand is to be fet to the worke: no more then the often hearing of mentalke and reason of painting, or the disputing upon colours, without taking of the pensill in hand, can stand a man in any fread at all to make him a good painter. But on the contrary part, many have proved wife men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Besides this, they alledge further, that in matters of warre, all things after from yeare to yeare: by meanes whereof the fleights and policies that are to be learned out of bookes, will fire the turne no more then mines that are blowne wp. According whereums Cambyles telleth his some Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Musicke the new !! Jongs are commonly the bell liked of for once, because they were never heard of afore: So in the warres, those policies that never were practifed afore, are those that take best successe, and commonly have the best effect, because the enemies do least doubt of them. Neverthelesse I am not be that will maintaine, that a wife Gouernour of a common-weale, or a great Captaine, can be made of fuch a perfor as hath never travelled out of his studie, and from his bookes : how beit that which Cicco writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieutenant of the Romaines, to make warre against King Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the wars. and yet afterward he bestowed so great diligence in the reading of histories, and in conferring upon eserie point with the old Captaines and men of long experience whom he caried with him, that by the time of his comming into Asia, where he was indeed to put his matters in execution, hee was found to be a verie sufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: insomuch that by those wayes, cleane contrarie to the commonorder of warre, he discomfitted two of the most pullant and greatest Princes that were at that time in the East. For his understanding was fo quicke, his care fo vigilast, and his courage so great, that he needed no long training, nor groffe instruction by experience. And although I grant there have bene diverse Governours and Captaines, which by the encly force of nature (furthered by long continued experience) have done goodly and great exploites: get can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the gifts of nature with the knowledge of learning and the reading of histories, they might have done much greater things, and they might have become much more perfect. For like as in eueric other cunning and skill wherein a man intendeth to excell: fo also to become a perfect and sufficient person to gouerne in peace and warre, there Three are threethings of necessitie required, namely, nature, art, and practise. Nature (in the case we treate cessary for of) must furnish vs with a good mother wit, with a body well disposed to endure all manner of travell, a Magiand with a good will to advance our selves: Art must give vs judgement and knowledge, gotten by the strate, or examples and wife discourses that we have read and double read in good histories: and Practise wil get vs readinesse, assurednesse, and the case how to put things in execution. For though Skillbe the ruler of doing the deed, yet it is a vertue of the mind which teacheth aman the meane point betweene the two faultie extremities of too much and too little, wherein the commendation of all doings confifteth. And whosocuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely trial of experience, and had rather learne it at his owne cost, then at another mans: he may well be of the number of those that are touched by this ancient Prouerb, which faith, Experience is the schoole-mistris of sooles: because mans life is so short, and experience is hard and dangerous; specially in matters of war, wherein (according to the saying of Tamachus she Athenian Captaine) a man cannot fault twice, because the faults are so great, that most commonly they bring with them the ouerthrow of the state, or losse of the lines of those that do them. Therefore we must not tarie for this wit that is wonne by experience, which costeth so deare, and is so long in coming, that a man is of: times dead in the seeking of it before he have attained it so as he had need of a second life to employ it in because of the over late coming by it. But we must makespeed by our diligent and continuall reading of histories both old and new, that we may enion this happine fe which the Poet speaketh of:

A happie wight is he that by mishaps Of others, doth beware of afterclaps.

By the way, as concerning those that say that paper will beare all things: if there be any that vnworthily take upon them the name of Historiographers, and do deface the dignity of the storie for hatred or fauour, by mingling any vntruth with it: that is not the fault of the historie, but of the men that are partiall, who do abuse that name unworthily, to couer and cloake their owne passions withall, which thing shall neuer come to passe, if the writer of the storie have the properties that are necessarily required in a storic-writer, as these: I hat he set aside all affection, be voide of enuic, hatred, and flatterie: that he be aman experienced in the affaires of the world, of good vtterance and indgement, to discerne what is to be said, and what to be left vnsaid; and what would do more harme to have it declared, then do good to have it represented or condemned: for asmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to serve the common-weale, and that he is but as a register to set downe the judgements and definitive sentences of Gods Court, whereof some are given according to the ordinaric course and capacity of our weaks naturall reason, and other some go according to Gods infinite power and incomprebensible wisedome, aboue and against all discourse of mans understanding, who being unable to reach the bottome of his judgements, and to finde out the first motions and grounds thereof, doc impute the cause of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought else but a fained denice of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of such brightnesse, and confounded at the gazing of so bottomelesse a deepe: howbeit, nothing commeth to passe nor is done without the leave of him that is the very right and truth it selfe, with whom nothing is past or to come, who knoweth and understandeth the verie originall causes of all necessitie. The consideration whereof teacheth men to humble the excluse under his mightie hand, by acknowledging that there is one first cause which onerruleth nature, whereof it commeth, that neither hardinesse is alwaies happie, nor wisdome alwaies sure of good successe. These so notable commodities are enery where accompanied with singular delight, which proceedeth chiefly of dinerfity and noneltic, wherein our nature delighteth, and is greatly desirous of: because we having an carnest inclination towards our best prosperitie and advancement, it goeth on still seeking in it enerie thing which it taketh to be goodly or good in this world. But forasmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content it selfe under the cope of heaven, it is soone wearie of the things that it had earnestly desired before, and so goeth on wandering in the unskilfulnesse of her likings, whereof she never ceasseth to make a continual changing wrill she have fully satisfied her desires, by attaining to the last end, which is, to be knit to her chiefe felicitie, where is the full perfection of all goodlinesse and goodnesse. This liking of varietie cannot be better relieved, then by that which is the finder out and the preserver of time, the father of all noveltie, and messenger of antiquitie. For if we finde a certaine singular pleasure, in hearkning to such as be returned from some long voyage, and do report things which they have seene in strange countries, as the manners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of lines, differing from ours : and if we be sometime so raperils that he hath ouer passed, Gas we perseive not how the time goeth away : how much more ought we to be ranished with delight and wondering, to behold the state of mankind, and the true successe of things, which antiquity hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world; as the fetting up of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the rifing and falling of Kingdomes, and all things else worthie admiration, and the same lively set forth in the faire, rich, and true table of Eloquence? And that foliuely, as in the very reading of them we fee our minds to be fo touched by them, not as though the things were already done and past, but as though they were even then presently in doing. and we find our selves caried away with gladnes and griefe through feare or hope, well neare as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithstanding we be not in any paine or danger, but onely conceive in our minds the adversities that other folkes have endured, our selves sitting safe with our contentation and ease, according to those verses of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleasure for to sit at ease Vpon the land, and safely for to see How other folkes are toffed on the feas, That with the bluftring winds turmoiled be. Not that the fight of others miseries Doth any way the honest heart delight: But for because it liketh well our eyes.

To fee harmes free, that on our felues might light.

Alsoit is seene that the reading of histories doth so hold and allure good wits, that diners times it not onely maketh them to forget all other pleasures, but also serueth very fitly to turne away their griefes, and sometimes also to remedie their deseases. As for example, we find it written of Aphonfus King of Naples, that Prince fo greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wifedome and goodneffe, that being fore ficke in the city of Capua, when his Phisitions had spent all the cunning that they had to recover him his health, and he faw that nothing prevailed : he determined with himfelfe to take no more medicines, but for his recreation caused the storie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deeds of Alexander the Great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke so wonderfull pleasure. that nature gathered strength by it, and ouercame the waywardnesse of his disease. Whereupon, hauing Coonereconcred his health, he discharged his Phisitions with such words as these: Feast mee no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, fith they can no skill to helpe me to reconer my health but well fare Quintus Curtius, that could fo good skill to helpe me to recover my health. Now if the reading and knowledge of histories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I fay it is much more for great Princes and Kings, because they have to do with charges of greatest weight and difficultie, to be best stored with gifts and knowledge for the discharge of their duties : (eeing the ground of stories is, to treate of all manner of high matters of estate, as warres, battels, citics, countries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it seemeth more fit for them, then for any other kind of degrees of men: because they being bred and brought up tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons (us meete is for so great states to have) they take not To great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behooveth those to take which will learne the noble ancient languages, and the painefull doctrine comprehended in Philosophie. Againe, when they come to mans state, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, so as there remaineth no exercise of wit more connenient for them, then the reading of histories in their owne tongue, which without paine is able to teach them even with great pleasure and ease, what sower the painefull workes of the Philosophers concerning the government of common-wealths can shew them, to make them skilfull in the well ruling and governing of the people and countries that God hath put under their subjection. But the worst is, that they ever (or for the most part) bave such manner of perfons about them, as feekenothing elfebut to pleafe them by all the wayes they can, and there are very few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrarie part, an historic flattereth them not but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of such as were like them in greatnesse of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerius (a man renowned aswell for his skill in the good government of a common-weale, as for his excellent knowledge otherwise) counselled Ptolomie, first king of Agypt after the death of Alexander the Great, that be should often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the government of Kingdomes because (aid he) thou shalt find many things there, which thy fernants and familiar friends dare not tell thee: Moreover this is another thing, that such great personages cannot easily it auchl out of the bounds of their dominions, to go view strange countries, as private persons do : because the icalousie of their estate, and the regard of their dianstie, requires that they should never be in place where another man might command them. And oftentimes for want of having scene the countries, and knowne the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they have adventured upon attempts without good ground: to avoide the which. the instruction they may have by the reading of histories, is one of the case of and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause then onely this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of histories, wherein are written the heroscall deedes of wife and valuant men, specially of Kings that have bene before them: the consideration whereof may caufe them to be delirous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage: becanferbe feeles of Princely vertues that are bred with themfelues, do then quicken them vp with an emulation towards the fe that have bene or are equall in degree with them, is well inrespect of noblenesseefbloud as of greatnesse of state, so as they be loth to gine place to any person, and much lesse can find in their hearts to be out-gone in glorie of vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alleadzed, if the thing were not so well knowne of it silfe, that it were much more against reasons of abs of it, then needfull to prooue it. Therefore aman may truely conclude, that an bistoric is the schoole mistris of Princes, at whose hand they may without paine, in way of pastime, and with fingular pleafare learne the most part of the things that belong to their office. Row according to the diversitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of writing that it wfeth, it hath fundry names given unto it; but yet among the rest, there are two chiefe kinds. The one, which fetteth downe mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an historic: the other which declareth their natures, sayings and manners, is properly named their lines. And although the ground of them both do close very neare inone, yet doth the one respect more the things, and the other the persons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceede from within the one the events, the other the confultations: betweene the which there is oftentimes great oddes, according to this answer of the Persian Stramnes, to such as maruelled how it came to passe, that his devices being so politicke, had so vnhappie successe: it is (quoth he) because my denices are wholly from mine owne invention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of Fortune and the King. And firely among those that over have taken upon them to write the lines of samous men, the chiefe prerogatine, by the indgement of such as are clearest lighted, is instly ginen to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Cheronea in the countrey of Baotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put menout of doubt, if they lift to reade them through, who all his life long, even to his old age, had to deale in affaires of the common-weale, as he himselfe witnesseth in divers places, specially in the treatise which he intituled, Whether an old man ought to meddle with the gonernment of a common-weale or not: and who had the hap and horour to be schoolemaster to the Emperour Traian, as is commonly believed, and as is exprelly pretended in a certaine Epistle fet before the Latine translation of his matters of state, which (to say the truth) seemeth inmy judgement to be somewhat suspitious, because I finde it not among his workes in Greeke: besides that it speaketh as though the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifestly disproved by the beginning of the booke, and by divers other reasons. Yet notwithstanding, because me thinkes it is sagely and granely written, and well be seeming him, I have set it downe here in this place : Plutarke with Troian sendeth greeting. I know well, that the modestie of your nature was not desirous of Sonera gnetie, though you have alwayes endeuoured to deserve it by your honourable conversation : by reason whereof you have bene thought so much the worthier of it, as you have bene found the further off from all ambition. And therefore I do now reloyce in your vertue and my fortune, if it be fo great as to cause you to administer that thing with instice, which you have obtained by desert. For otherwise, I am sure you have put your selfe in hazard of great danger, and me in perill of slanderous tongues, because that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voyce of the people is alwayes went to cast the faults of the schollers in the teeth of their schoole-masters: as for example, Seneca is railed uponby flanderous tonques, for the faults of his scholler Nero: the scapes of Quintilians yong schollers, are imputed to Quintilian himself: and Socrates is blamed for being too mild " to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you shall do all things well enough, so you keepe you as you are. If you first fet your felfe in order, and then dispose all other things according to vertue, all things " Shall fall out according to your desire. I have set you downe the meanes in writing, which you must observe for the well governing of your common-weale, and have shewed unto you of how great force of your behausour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow those things, you have Plutarke ce for the directer and quider of your life: if not, I protest onto you by this Epistle, that your falling into danger, to the onerthrow of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epiftle witneffeth plainely, that he was the schoolemaster of Traian, which thing seemeth to be anowed by this writing of Suidas . Plutarke being borne in the citie of Cheroneain Becotia, was in the time of the Emperous Traian, and somewhat before. But Traian bonoured him with the dignitie of Consulfhip, and commanded the officers and magistrates that were throughout all the countrey of Illyria, that they should not do any thing without his counsell and authoritie. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am of opinion, that Traian being so wise an Emperour, would never have done him so great honor, if he had not thought himselfe greatly beholding to him for some speciall cause. But the thing that maketh memost to beleene it true, is that the same goodnesse and instice appeared to be naturally imprinted in most of Traians sayings and doings, whereof the patterne and mould (as a man may terme it) is east and see downe in Plutarkes Morals, so as men may perceive expressy that the one could well skill to performe rightly that which the other had taught wifely: For Dion writeth, that among other honours which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree unto Traian, they gave him the title of the good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth, that even wnto his time, when a new Emperour came to be received of the Senate, among the cries of good handfell, and the wishes of good lucke that were made unto him, one was : Happier be thou then Augustus, and better then Traian. How socuer the case flood, it is verie certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes unto him. But when he had lined a long time in Rome, and was come home againe to his owne house, he fell to writing of this excellent worke of Lines, which he calleth Parallelon, as much to fay, as a coupling or matching together, because he matcheth a Grecian with a Romaine, setting downe their lines each after other, and comparing them together, as he found any likenesse of nature, conditions, or aduentures betwixt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worfer, greater or leffer then the other: which things he dosh with so goodly and grave discourse everywhere, taken out of the deepest and most hidden secrets of morall and naturall Philosophie, with so sage precepts and fruitfull instructions, with so effectuall commendation of vertue, and detestation of vice, with so many goodly allegations of other Authors, with so many fit comparisons, and with so many high inventions: that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treasurie of all rare and perfect learning, then by any other name. Also it is faid, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of fingular learning, & a Worthy of the ancient Grece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which faw him so carnelly give to his study that he forgot all other things) what Author he had leuerest choose, if he were at that point that he must needs choose some one to hold him to alone did answer, that he would choose Plutarke: because that if they were all put togéther, there was no one both so profitable, and so pleasant to reade, as he. Soisius Senecio to whom he dedicateth his worke, was a Senator of Rome, as witnesseth Dion, who writeth that the three perfons whom Traian most loued and honored, were Sossius, Parma, and Colfus, insomuch that he caused images, them to be set up. True it is that he wrote the lines of many other men, which the spirefulnesse of the time hath bereft vs of, among which he himselfe maketh mention of the lines of Scipio Africanus, and Metellus Numidicus. And I have read a little Epistle of a sonne of his whose name is not expressed copied out of an old copie in the Librarie of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, aregister of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the couples of lives, he setteth downe the lives of Scipio and Epaminondas, and lastly the lives of Augustus Cæfar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But having veed all the deligence that I could in fearthing the chiefe Libraries of Venice & Rome, I could neuer find them out. Onely I drew out certaine diner lities of readings, and many corrections, by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which bane flood me in great flead to the vnderstanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I have restored by coniccture, by the indgement and helpe of such men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine some places vnamended, howbeit verie few, because some lines were wanting in the original copies, whereof (to my seeming) it was better for me to witnesse the want by marking it with some starre, then to guesse at it with all adventure, or to adde any thing to it. Now finally, if I have over shot my selfe in any thing, as it is veric casie to do in so hard and long aworke, specially to a man of so small ability as I am: I befeech the Readers to wouch safe for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horacc giveth me, where he saith:

A man may well be ouerseene

In workes that long and tedious beene. Specially fith that of so many good men, and men of skill, as have heretofore set hand to the tranflating of it, there was never yet any one found, that went through with it in any language, at leastwife that I have seene or heard of: and that such as have enterprised to translate it, specially into Latine, have enidently witnessed the hardnesse thereof, as they may easily perceine which lift to conferre their translations with mine. Neuerthelese if it so fortune that men find not the speech of this translation (o flowing, as they have found some other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands : I befeech the Readers to consider, that the office of a sit Translator, consisteth not onely in the faithfull expressing of his Authors meaning, but also in a certaine resembling and shadowing out of the forme of his file, and the maner of his speaking : unlesse they will commit the errour of some painters, who baning taken upon them to draw a man lively, do paint him long where he should be short, and grosse where he should be stender, and yet set out the resemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harsh or rude focuer my speech be, yet am I fure that my translation will be much easier to my countrimen. then the Greeke copic is, even to such as are best practised in the Greeke tongue, by reason of Plutarchs peculiar maner of inditing, which is rather sharpe, learned, and short, then plaine, polished, and easie. At the hardest, although I have not compassed my matters so happily as ye would have wished and defired: yet do I hope that your Lordships in reading it will hold the parties good will excused, which hath taken such paines in doing of it to prosit you. And if my labour be so happie as to content you, God be praised for it, which hath given me the grace to sinish it.

THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE

Theseus.

IKE as the historiographers which do set forth the description of the earth in figure (my friend softius Senecio) are wont to place in the low- softius se. ermost part of their mappes; the farre distant regions vnknowne vnto them, and to marke in the margent such like notes and reasons as these: Beyond these countries are nothing but deepe drie sands without water, full of sowle ill fauoured venemous beafts, or much mudde vnnauigable, or Scythia forfaken for cold, or else the sea frosen with Ice. Euen so in this my historie, I could speake of strange things, and more ancient, and surther off from mens memorie. But herein I have compared the lines of some noble men, the one with the other, having followed all those times, whereof the monuments remaine yet fo whole, that men may speake of very great likelihood. or rather write a very troth. What hath bene written before, is but of strange faynings, and full of monstrous fables, imagined and deuised by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine, and most vntrue. Howbeit hauing heretofore set forth the lines of Lyeurgus (which established the lawes of the LACED & MONIANS) and of king Numa Pompilius, me thought I might with reason also ascend vnto the time of Romulus, sithens I was come so neare vnto his time. Wherefore having long debated with my felfe what Afchilus the Poet said:

very like.

What champion may with such a man compare? Or who (thinke I) Shall be against him (et? Who is fo bold? or who is he that dare Defend his force in such encounter met?

In the end I resolved to compare him which did set vp the noble and samous citie of A-THENS, vnto him which founded the glorious and inuincible city of ROME. Wherein I would haue wished, that the fables of her antiquitie had bene set out so in our writings, that we might yet haue graced them with some apparance of historicall narration. But if by chance in some places they range a little too boldly out of the bounds or limites of true apparance, and haue no maner of conformity with any crediblenesse of matter: the readers in curtesse must needs hold me excused, accepting in good part that which may be written, and reported, of things so Thefan & extremely old and ancient. Now furely me thinkes, that Thefans in many things was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by stealth and out of lawfull matrimony, they were both bruited to be borne of the feed of gods.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know.

Both were very wife, and firong befides of body. The one of them built Rome, and the other the citie of Athens, two of the most noble cities of the world. The one and the other were rauishers of women; and neither the one nor the other could avoid the mischief of quarell and contention with their friends, and to defile themselues with the bloud of their nearest kinsinen. Moreouer, they say that both the one and the other in the end, did get the hate and ill will of their citizens. At the least if we beleeve those things which are lest written, and carry The linage greatest shew of troth, Theseus of his fathers side, was desceded of the right linage of Erichtheus of the great, and of the first inhabitants which occupied the countrey of ATTICA, the which fince were called Avrocthones, as much to fay, as born of themselues. For there is no memory, or other mention made, that they came out of any other countrey then that. And of his mothers Polops king fide he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightiest king of all the countrey of PELOPON-NE SV s, not so much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many innumber, he bestowed them on the greatest Lords of all the countrey: his fonnes also, which likewise were many, he dispersed into every city and free Pilbeus, the towne, finding meanes to make them gouernours and heads of the fame. Pilbeus grandfather to Theseus on the mother side, was one that founded the litle city of Troezen, and was reputed to be one of the best learned and wisest men of his time. But the knowledge and wisdome, which The wife- only caried estimation at that time, consisted altogether in graue sentences & morall sayings, as those are, which wan the Poet Hessodus such fame for his booke intituled, The works & dayes: in the which is read even at this present; this goodly sentence, which they father vpon Pitheus:

Thou halt performe thy promise and thy pay To bired men, and that without delay.

And this doth Arifforle the Philosopher himselfe testifie: and the Poet Euripides also, calling Hippolitus the scholler of the holy Pitheus, doth sufficiently declare of what estimation he was: AEgens the But Aegens defiring (as they fay) to know how he might haue children, went into the city of DELPHES to the Oracle of Apollo: where, by a Nunne of the temple, this notable prophecie was giuen him for an answer; the which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned againe to Athens. And because the words of this prophesic were somewhat darke and hard, he returned by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnto Pithems. The words of the prophecy were thefe:

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace, Plucke not the tappe out of thy trufty tunne. Before thou do returne vnto thy place

In Athens towne, from whence thy race doth runne.

Pitheus vnderstanding the meaning, perswaded him, or rather cunningly by some device deceiued him, in such fort, that he made him to lie with his daughter called Athra. Agens, after the daugh- he had accompanied with her, knowing that the was Pithens daughter with whom he had lien, ter of king and doubting that he had gotten her with child, left her a fword and a paire of shoes, the which Pilbeus, the hid vnder a great hollow stone, the hollownesse whereof served just to receive those things the mother which he laved under it and mode no living creature privile to it but her alone. Organizable of Thefeus, which he layed vnder it; and made no lining creature printe to it but her alone, straightly charging her, that if she happened to have a sonne, when he were come to mans estate, and of ftrength to remoue the stone, and to take those things from vnder it which he left there; that she should then fend him vnto him by those tokens, as secretly as she could, that no body else might know of it. For he did greatly feare the childre of one called Pallas, the which lay in wait The Pallander of Children of the Pallas of and spiall by all the meanes they could to kill him, onely of despite because he had no children, they being fifty brethren, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. Palles had And Athra within few moneths after was deliuered of a goodly foune, the which from that fifty somes. time was called Thefens: and as fome fay, so called, because of the tokens of knowledge his father had laved under the stone. Yet some others write that it was a farmaged as A and a stone farmaged. ther had layed under the stone. Yet some others write, that it was afterwards at ATHENS when called, his father knew him, and auoued him for his fonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie and childhood, he was brought up in the house of his grandfather Pitheus, under the gouernement and teaching of one called Connidas, his schoolemaister: in honour of whom the ATHE- connidas NIANS to this day do facrifice a weather, the day before the great feast of Theseus, having more Theseus reason to honour the memorie of this gouernour, then of a Silanion and of a Parrhasius, to seems they do honour also because they printed and and mould of the interest of the seems of the whom they do honour also, because they painted and cast moulds of the images of Theseus. Now there was a custome at that time in GREECE, that the young men after their infancie and growth to mans state, went into the citie of DELPHES, to offer part of their haires in the temple of Apollo. Thefeus also wentthither as other did: and some fav that the place where the ceremony of this offering was made, hath euer fince kept the old name (and yet continueth) Theseia. Howbeit he did not shaue his head but before onely, as Homer saith, like the tashion Theseia. of the ABANTES in oldrime: and this manner of shaving of haires, was called for his sake, Thefeur Theseida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in troth they were the very first that shaued them- finding. felues after this fashion: neuerthelesse they learned it not of the Arabians, as it was thought The Aban. of some, neither did they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS; but because they were warlike and valiant men, which did io yne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the worldwere skilfullest in fight hand to hand, and would keepe their ground: as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses:

They ve no slings in foughten fields to have, Nor bended bowes: but swords and trenchant blades. For when ficrce Mars beginneth for to rane Inbloudy field, then enery man inuades His fiercest foe and fighteth hand to band: Then do they deeds right cruell to recompt, For in this wife, the brane and warlike band

Do shew their force, which come from Negrepont. The cause why they were thus shauen before, was, for that their enemies should not have the vantage to take them by the haires of the head while they were fighting. And for this felfefame consideration, Alexander the great commanded his captaines to cause all the Mace Do-NIANS to shaue their beards: because it is the easiest hold (and readiest for the hand) a man can Magnus haue of his enemy in fighting, to hold him fast by the same. But to returne to Theseus. Athra his mother had euer vnto that time kept it secret from him, who was his true father. And Pitheus ans shave also had given it out abroad, that he was begotten of Neptune, because the Troezenians have their this god in great veneration, and do worship him as patron and protector of their city, making offerings to him of their first fruits: and they have for the marke and stampe of their mo- faid to bee ny, the three picked mace, which is the figue of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and lustines of his youth, and that with the strength of his body he shewed a The Traze. great courage, joyned with a naturall wildome, and staicdnes of wit: then his mother brought nions coine him to the place where this great hollow stone lay, and telling him truly the order of his birth, with Nepand by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had times three hidden there, and gaue him counsell to go by sea to Athens vnto him. The seasily lift vp the ftone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: Howbeit he answered plainly, that he would Thefeus not go by sea, notwithstanding that it was a great deale the safer way, and that his mother 200th. and grandfather both had instantly intreated him, because the way by land from Troezen to bing in Athens was very dangerous all the wayse being before by replaced and residence. The best bing in ATHENS was very dangerous, all the wayes being befet by robbers and murderers. For the Thefeus World at that time brought forth men, which for strongnesse in their armes, for swiftnesse of time.

king rufhes called Stoebe, and wild Sperage, which she simply like a child intreated to hide her, as if they had heard, and had fenfe to viderifund her: promiting them with an oath, that if they faued her from being found, she would neuer cut them downe, nor burne them. But Thefeus finding her, called her, and fware by his faith he would vie her gently, and do her no hurt, nor displeasure stall. Vpon which promise she came out of the bush, and lay with him, by whom otherwise named Phaa, that is to say, ouergrowne with age: she was not a beast to be made deeds he did, were done by compulsion and of necessitie: adding thereto his opinion also, that a valiant man should not onely fight with men, to defend himselfe from the wicked: but that he should be the first, to assault and slay wild hurtfull beasts. Neuerthelesse others have wristen that paffed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where she dwelt: and that she was surnamed a Sow, for her beaftly brutish behauiour and wicked life, for the which in the end she was also downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, and defirous (as Simonides faith) to ouerthrow it that had continued by prescription of time, did maintaine that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked person, but rather a pursuer and punisher of the wicked, and a friend & kinting n of the most honest and instest men of GRECE. For there is no man but will confesse, that Racus was the most vertuous man among the Grecians in his time, and that Cychreus the SALAMINIAN is honored and reuer enced as a God at ATHENS:

and there is no man also but knoweth that Peleus and Telamon were men of a fingular vertue.

faid sciron, and of his wife Charicio. Also it is not very likely, that so many good men would have had affinity with fo naughty and wicked a man in taking of him, and giving him that which men loue best of all things in the world. And therefore the Historiographers say, that it was not dayesafter, when he tooke the citie of ELEVSIN, which the MEGARIANS held at that time, led Sinnis, furnamed Pityocamtes, that is to fay, a wreather or bower of pine-apple trees: whom pecames a he put to death in that felfe cruell manner that Sinnis had flaine many other trauellers before. there Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practife or exercise; but onely to shew, that cleane strength could do more then either Arte or exercise. This Sinnis had a goodly faire Perigouna daughter called Perigouna, which fled away when the faw her father flaine: whom he followed daughter.

the was conceived of a goodly boy, which was called Menalippus. Afterwards Thefeus married Thefeusbeher vnto one Deioneus, the sonne of Euritus the Oechalian. Of this Menalippus the sonne of The gat Mena-Cens, came lowus: the which with Ornytus brought men into the countrey of CARIA, where he Perioding. built the Citie of Ioxides. And hereof cometh that old ancient ceremonie, observed yet vnto Ioxii Methis day by those of Ioxides, neuerto burne the briers of wild Sperage, northe Steebe, but forme. they have them in some honour and reverence. Touching the wild sauage Sowe of Grommyon, Joxides:

light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. Thefens not with standing taried for her, wild som and killed her in his journey, to the end it should not appeare to the world, that all the valiant of Crommythat this Phea was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her body, which spoiled those Phea a more flaine by Theseus. After her he killed sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, because scirona he robbed all trauellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others fay, for that of a notable robcruell, wicked, and fauage pleafure, he put foorth his feete to those that passed by the sea side, down the and compelled them to washthem. And then when they thought to stoupe to do it, he still spur- rocke by ned them with his feet, till he thrust them headlong into the fea: so Thefeus threw him headlong Thefeus.

Now it is certaine, that this Seiron was sonne in law to Cychreus father in law of Alacus, & grandfather to Peleus and Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the Cyreus.

the first time, when I before went vnto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron . but that it was many coreson the where he deceived the Governour of the citie; called Diocles, and there he flue Sciron. And thefe Thofeus by be the objection the Megarians alledged touching this matter. He flue also Cercyon the Ar- wrafting. CADIAN, in the city of Elevern, wrastling with him. And going a little further, he slue Da. Damastes or house of the process o mastes, otherwise surnamed Procrustes, in the citie of HERMIONIA: and that by stretching of a cruell him out, to make him euen with the length and measure of his beds, as he was wont to do vnto martherer, frangers that passed by. Theseus did that in imitation of Hercules, who punished tyrants with the sclee same paine and torment which they had made others suffer. For even so did Hercules sa-Hercules crifice Buffris. So he flifted Anthous in wraftling. So he put Cycrus to death, fighting with him Termerus manto man. So he brake Termerus head, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, wills feete, and for a generall strength of the whole body, did far passe the common force of others. and were neuer weary for any labour or trauell they tooke in hand. But for all this, they neuer employed these gifts of nature to any honest or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanously to hurt and wrong others: as if all the fruite and profite of their extraordinary strength had confifted in cruelty and violence onely and to be able to keepe others under and in fubicction. and to force, destroy, and spoyle all that came to their hands. Thinking that the more part of those which thinke it a shame to do ill, and commend instice, equity, and humanity, do it of faint cowardly hearts, because they dare not wrong others, for feare they should receive wrong themselues: and therefore that they which by might could have vantage over others, had nothing to do with fuch quiet qualities. Now Hercules, trauelling abroad in the world, draue away many of those wicked theeuish murderers, and some of them he slue and put to death; other as he passed through those places where they kept, did hide themselues for feare of him. and gaue place: informuch as Hercules perceiving they were well tamed and brought low. made no further reckoning to purfue them any more. But after that by fortune he had flaine Iphitus with his owne hands, and that he was passed ouer the seas into the countrey of Lydia. where he ferued Queene omphale a long time, condemning himfelfe vnto that voluntary paine for the murther he had committed, all the Realme of Lydia during his abode there, remained in great peace and fecuritie from fuch kind of people. Howbeit in GR ECE, and all thereabouts. there old mischiefes began againe to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before; because there was no man that punished them, nor that durft take you him to defroy them. By which occasion, the way to go from Peloponnesus to Athens by land-was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto Theseus, what maner of theeues they were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all trauellers and way faring men, fought the rather to perswade him thereby to take his voyage along the seas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the same and glory of Hercules noble deedes, had long before fecretly fet his heart on fire, fo that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly hearkened ynto those which would feeme to describe him what maner of man he was, but chiefly vnto those which had seene him. and bene in his company, when he had faid or done any thing worthy of memory. For then he did manifestly open himselfe, and he selt the like passion in his heart, which Themistotles long time afterwards endured, when he faid: that the victorie and triumph of Milliades would not let him fleepe. For euen fo, the wonderfull admiration which Thefew had of Hercules courage made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble acts and doings, and in the day time, pricked forwards with emulation and enuie of his glory, he determined with himfelfe one day to do the like, and the rather, because they were neere kinsmen, being cosins removed by the mothers side. For Athra was the daughter of Pitheus, and Alemena (the mother of Hereules) was the daughter of Lyfidices, the which was halfe fifter to Pithem, both children of Pelons and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he should be vtterly shamed and difgraced, that Hercules travelling through the world in that fort, did feek out those wicked theeves to rid both sea and land of them: and that he, farre otherwife, should flye occasion that might be offered him. to fight with them that he should meete on his way. Moreouer, he was of opinion, he should greatly shame and dishonour him, whom fame and common bruit of people reported to be his father: if in flunning occasion to fight, he should convey himselfe by sea, and should carry to his true father also a paire of shooes, (to make him knowne of him) and a sword not yet bathed in bloud. Where he should rather seeke cause, by manifest tokens of his worthy deeds, to make knowne to the world of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was descended. With this determination, Thefeus holdeth on his purposed journey with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himselfe, and to be reuenged of those which would take vpon them to assault him. The first therefore whom he slue within the teritories of the citie of Epidavrym, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber yied for his ordinarie weapon to carrie a clubbe, and for that at Thefens to make him fland: but Thefens fought fo luftily with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was fo glad, and chiefly for that he had won his clubbe, that ever after he caried it did witnesse the greatnesse of the beast which Hercules had slaine, even so Theseus went all about, flewing that this club which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne hands inuincible which continueth yet vnto this day: for this Termerus did vse to put them to death in this fore whom he metato iolle his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Theseus after this selfe manner, punishing the wicked in like fort, inftly compelling them to abide the same paine and torments, which they before had vniustly made others abide. And so he held on his journy vntill he came to the river of CEPHISVS, where certaine persons of the house of the Phytalides were the first which went to meet him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him according to the ceremonies vied at that time and afterwards having made a facrifice of propitiation vnto their gods, they made him great cheare in their houses: and this was the first notable entertainement that feasted he found in all his journey. It is supposed he arrived in the city of ATHENS, the eight day of the Thefeus in moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius. He found the common-wealth turmoiled with feditions, factions, and divisions, and particularly the house of Ageus in very ill termes also, because that Medea (being banished out of the Citic of Corinth) was come to dwell in A-THENS, and remained with Agens, whom she had promised of by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children. But when the heard tell that Thefeus was come, before that the good king Ageus (who was now become old, suspicious, and afraid of sedition, by reason of Medeaper, the great factions within the City at that time)knew what he was, she perswaded him to poyson swaded E. him at a feast which they wold make him as a stranger that passed by. Theseus failed not to go to this prepared feast whereunto he was bidden, but yet thought it not good to disclose himselfe. And the rather to give Agens occasion and meane to know him, when they brought the meate to the boord, he drew out his fword as though he would have cut withal, & the weth it vnto him. Ageus feeing it, knew it straight, & forthwith ouerthrew the cup with poison which was prepared for him and after he had enquired of him and asked things, he embraced him as his fonne. Afterwards in the common affembly of the inhabitants of the city, he declared, how he auowed him for his fonne. Then all the people received him with exceeding joy, for the renowne of his valiantnes and manhood. And fome fay, that when Ægeus ouerthrew the cup, the poifon which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this present a certaine compasse inclosed all about within the temple which is called Delphinium. For even there in that place, in old time, flood the house of Ageus in witnesse whereof, they call yet at this present time the image of Mercury (which is on the fide of the temple looking towards the rifing of the Sunne) the Mercury gate of Ageus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before stood alwayes in hope to recouer the Realme of ATHENS, at the least after Agons death, because he had no children: when they saw that Thefeus was known, and openly declared for his fon and heire, and fucceffor to the Realme, they were not able any longer to beare it, seeing that not onely Agens (who was but the adopted for of Pandion, and nothing at all of the bloud royall of the Eritheides) had viurped the kingdome ouer them, but that Thefeus also should enjoy it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both, and deuiding themselues into two parts, the one came openly in armes with their father, marching directly towards the city: the other lay close in ambuilt in the village Gargerrys, meaning to give charge upon the in two places at one instant. Now they brought with them an Herald borne in the towne of AGNVs, celled Lees, who bewrayed vnto Theseus the secret & device of all their enterprise. Theseus vpon this intelligence went forth, and fet on those that lay in ambush, and put them all to the sword. The other which were in Pallas company vnderstanding therof, did break and disperse themselves incontinently, and this is the These still cause (as some say) why those of Pallena do never make affinitic nor marriage with those of Agnys at this day: and that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer speake these words which are cried enery where elsthroughout the whole country of ATTICA, Acouste Leos, (which is as much to fay, as Harken ô people) they do so extremely hate this word Leos, for that it was the Heralds name that wrought them that treason. This done, Theseus who would not line idly at home and do nothing, but defirous therewithall to gratifie the people, went The bull of his way to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which did great mischiefes to the inhabitants of saken alue the country of Terraports. And having taken him alive, brought him through the citie of by Thefens. ATHENS, to be seene of all the inhabitants. Afterwards he did sacrifice him vnto Apollo Delphias. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to have lodged him, and to have given him good entertainement, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the old time, those townes and villages thereabours did affemble together, and made a common facrifice which they called Hecalefton. in honour of Iupiter Hecalion, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutiue name, Hecalena: because that when she received Theseus into her house, being then but very yong, the made much of him, and called him by many pretie made names, as old folks are wont to call yong children. And for a fmuch as she had made a vow to Iupiter to make him a sotemne facrifice, if The few remained fafe from the enterprise he went about, and that she died before his returne: in recompence of the good cheare she made him, she had that honour done vnto her by Thefeus commandement, as Philochorus hath written of it. Shortly after this exploit, there came certaine of king Minos ambassadours out of CRETA, to aske a tribute, being now the third time that it was demanded; which the ATHENIANS payed for this cause. Androgens, The Albeita the eldest some of king Minos, was slaine by treason within the country of ATTICA: for which mans paged cause Minos pursuing the reuenge of his death, made very hote and sharpe warres vpon the A- tributeto THENIANS, and did them great hurt. But besides all this, the gods did sharply punish and scourge of creta, for all the countrey, as well with barrennesse and famine, as also with plague and other mischiefes, the death euen to the drying vp of their rivers. The Athenians perceiving these fore troubles and of Androplagues, ranto the oracle of Apollo, who answered them that they should appeale Minos, & when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrath of the gods would ceasse against them, and their troubles should have an end. Whereupon the Athenians sent immediatly vnto him, and intreated him for peace: which he granted them, with condition that they should be The manus bound to fend him yearly into CRETA, feuen yong boyes, and as many yong gyrles. Now thus of the tri: farre all the Historiographers do very well agree, but in the rest not. And they which seeme furthest off from the troth, do declare, that when these yong boyes were delivered in CRETA, they caused them to be denoured by the Minotaure within the Labrinth: or else that they were shut within this Labyrinth, wandring vp and downe, and could find uo place to get out, vntill fuch time as they died, euen famished for hunger. And this Minotaure, as Euripides the Poet saith, was Acorps combin' d which monstrous might be deem'd: A Boy, a Bull, both man and beast it feem'd.

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS do not confesse that, but say that this Labyrinth was a gaile or prison, in the which they had no other hart, saving that they which were kept rinth aprithere vnder locke and key, could not flie nor start away: and that Minos had in memorie of his for in crefonne Androgens, instituted games and playes of prife, where he gaue vnto them that wan the victorie, those yong children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time not withstanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the prison of the Labyrinth: and that at the first games that were kept, one of the Kings Captaines called Taurus, who was in best credite with his maister, wan the prise. This Taurus was a churlish and naughty natured man of condition, and very hard of Mins and cruell to these children of ATHENS. And to verific the same, the Philosopher Aristotle him- Captaines. felfe, fpeaking of the commonwealth of the Bottleians, declareth very well, that he neuer of the Bot thought that Minos did at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, thought that Minos did at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, thought that Minos did at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, tiesans, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith the children of ATHENS to be put to death the children of ATHENS to be put to de that they poorely toyled in CRETA, even to crooked age, earning their living by true & painfull fernice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to fatisfie an old vow of theirs, which they had made of ancient time) sent sometime the first borne of their children vnto Apollo in the citie of DELPHES: and that amongst them also they mingled those which were descended of the ancient prisoners of Athens, and they went with them. But because they could not live there, they directed their journey first into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of Pv GL 1A, and afterwards from thence went into the confines of THRAC1A, where they had this name of Bottleians. In memorie whereof the daughters of the Bottleians in a folenme facrifice they make, do vie to fing the foot of this fong: Let vs to Athens go. But thereby we may fee how perillous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmity with a city which can speak wel, & where learning & eloquence do florish. For ever fince that time Minos was alwaies blassed defined by and difgraced throughout all the Theaters of Athens. The testimonie of Hesiodus, who calleth the Poets in him the most worthy King, doth nothing at all helpe him, nor the praise of Homer, who nameth the these him Impiters familiar friend: because the tragicall Poets got the vpper hand in disgracing him, terrat notwithstanding all these, & vpon their stages where al the Tragedies were plaid, they stil gave forth many ill fauored words & foule speeches of him; as against a man that had bin most cruell & vnnaturall. Yet most men think, that Minos was the King that established the laws, & Radama. The third which had children not yet maried, to give them to be put forth to take their chance and lot: the citizens of ATHEN'S began to murmur against Agens, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this cuill, was only alone exempted from this grief. And that to bring the gouernement of the Realme to fall into the hands of a ftranger his baftard, he cared nor though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vinaturally compelled to leave and for fake them. These inst for rowes and complaints of the fathers whose children were taken from them, did pierce the heart of Thefens, who willing to yeeld to reason, and to run the selfe fame fortune as the citizens did, willingly offered himfelfe to be fent thither, without regard taking to his hap or aduenture. For which, the citizens greatly efteemed of his courage and honorable disposition, and dearely loued him for the good affection he seemed to beare vnto the communaltie. But Ageus having vied many reasons and persivations to cause him to turne and flay from his purpole, and perceiving in the end there was no remedie but he would go, he then drew lots for the children which should go with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding doth write, that they were not those of the citie which drew lots for the children they should send. but that Minos himselfe went thither in person, and did chuse them, as he chose Theseus the first, ypon condition agreed between them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS should furnishthem with a ship, and that the children should ship and imbark with him, carying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Mindaure this tribute should ceasie. Now before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of fafetic of their children; therefore the ATHENIANS alwayes fent a ship to conucy their children, with a blacke saile, in token of affured loffe. Neuertheleffe Thefeus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good courage, and promifing boldly that he would let upon this Minotaure, Agens gaue unto the maifter of the ship a white faile, commanding him that at his returne he should put out the white faile if his fonne had escaped; if not, that then he should set up the blacke faile, to shew him afarre off his valueky and vafortunate chance. simonides not with standing doth fay, that this faile which Agens gaue to the maister, was not white, but red, died in graine, and of the colour of Scarlet:and that he gaue it him to fignific afarre off their delinerie and fafetie. This maister was called Phereclus Amarsiadas, as Simonides faith. But Philocorus writeth, that Scirus the Salas MINIAN gaue to Thefens a maister called Nausitheus, and another marriner to tackle the sailes who was called Phaw: because the Athenians at that time were not greatly practised to the fea. And this did Seirus, for that one of the children on whom the lot fell was his nephew; and thus much the chappels do testifie, which Thefens built afterwards in honour of Naufitheus, and of Phaas, in the village of Phalerus, joyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is faid moreover, that the feast which they call cybernesia, that is to say, the feast of Patrons of the ships, is celebrated in honour of them. Now after the lots were drawne, Thefeus taking with him the children allorted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of supplication, which they call Hicertria: which was an olive bough hallowed, wreathed about with white wool. After he had made his prayer, he went downe to the fea fide to imbarke, the fixth day of the moneth of March: on which day at this present time they do send their young girles to the same temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and peritions to the gods. But some fay, that the Oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES had ar swered him, that he should take Venus for his guide, and that he should call vpon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cause he did sacrifice a goate vnto her vpon the feat fide, which was found fuddenly turned into a ramme, and that therefore they furnamed this goddesse Fpitragia, as one would say, the goddesse of the ramme. Furthermore, after he Thefera flue was arrived in CRETA, he flue there the Minetaure (as the most part of ancient Authours do write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fancie with him, did give him a clue of threed, by the helpe whereof the taught him, how he might eafily wind out of the turnings and cranckes of the Labyrinth. And they fay, that having killed this Minotaure he returking Minos ned backe againe the fame way he went, bringing with him those other young children of A-Thejeus re- THENS, whom with Ariadneallo he carried afterwards away. Pherecides faith moreouer, that turne out of he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the ships of CRETA, because they should not sodainly ict out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the Captaine of Minos) was killed in fighr nercome of by Thefens, cuen in the very hauen mouth, as they were readie to shipaway, and hoise vp faile. Yet Philocherus reporteth, that king Mines having fet vp the games, as he was wont to do

vearely in the honour and memoric of his sonne, enery one began to enuy captaine Taurus. because they euer looked that he should carrie away the game and victorie, as he had done other yeares before; ouer and about that, his authority got him much ill will and enuic, because Taurus (uhe was proud and starely, and had in suspirion that he was great with Queene Pasiphaë. Where- fried fore when Thefens required that he might encounter with Taurus, Minos cafily granted it. phas, king And being a folemne custome in CRETA, that the women should be present, to see those o- Minutes peniports and fights, Ariadne being at these games, amongst the rest, fell further in loue with How drie Thefeus, feeing him fo goodly a person, fo strong, and invincible in wrestling, that he farre ex- adm fell in cceded all that wrestled there that day. King Ocinos was so glad that he had taken away the love with honour from captaine Taurus, that he fent him home franke and free into his countrey, rendring to him all the other prisoners of Athens: and for his fake clearely released and forgane debthisthe citie of ATHENS the tribute, which they should have payed him yearely. Howbeit, clide-us bome mus fearching out the beginning of these things to the vtmost, reciteth them very particularly, somers, and and after another fort. For he fayeth, about that time there was a generall restraint through all releases GRECE, restraining all maner of people to beare faile in any vessell or bottome, wherein there and of their were about flue perfons, except onely Ialon, who was chosen captaine of that great shippe tribute. Argus, and had commission to faile enery where, to chase and drine away roners and pirats, lim. and to scoure the seas throughout. About this time, Dedalus being fled from CRETA to A- Dedalus THENS in a little Barke, Minos contrarie to this restraint, would needes follow him with a Figure fleet of dinerfe veffels with owers, who being by force of weather drinen with the coaft of S1-CILIE, fortuned to die there. Afterwards his fon Deucalion, being maruelloufly offended with King Minos the Athenians, fent to fummon them to deliver Dedalus vnto him, or elie he would put died in Sithe children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hostages. But Theseus excused estimation himselfe, and said he could not for sake D. edalus, considering he was his neare kinsman, being his Ring Mi. cofingermaine; for he was the some of Merope, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by noes some he caused many vessels secretly to be made, part of them within ATTICA selfe in the village to Athens of Thymetades, farre from any high wayes: and part of them in the city of Troezen, by the Dedalis. fufferance of Pitheus his grandfather, to the end his purpose should be kept the secretier. Afterwards when all his shippes were readie, and rigged out, he tooke sea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: in so much as when they saw them afarre off, they did take them for the barkes of their friends. Thefens landed without refistance, and tooke the hauen. Then ha- Thefens landed without refistance, ning Dedalus, and other banished CRETANS for guides, he entred the city selfe of GNOSVS, Creta, and where he flue Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinih, with all his guard and offi- wan the cicers about him. By this meanes the kingdome of CRETA fell by inheritance into the hands of the fands his fifter Ariadne. The seus made league with her, and carried away the young children of A- Descalor, THENS which were kept as hostages, and concluded peace and amirie betweene the ATHE-NIANS and the CRETANS: who promifed, and fware, they would neuer make warres against them. They report many other things also touching this matter, and specially of Ariadne: but there is no troth nor certaintie in it. For some fay, that Ariadne hung her selfe for sorrow, Divers opiwhen the faw that Thefeus had caft her off. Other write, that the was transported by mariners wions of deinto the Ile of Naxos, where she was married vnto OEnarus the priest of Bacchus: and they riadne. thinke that Thefeus left her, because he was in loue with another, as by these verses should appearc:

Ægles the Nymph was lou'd of Thefens, Who was the daughter of Panopeus.

Hereas the Magarian faith, that these two verses in old time were among the verses of the Poet Hestodus, howbeit Pisistratus tooke them away: as he did in like manner adde these other here in the description of the helles in Homer, to gratiste the Athe-MIANS.

Bold Thefens, and Perithons fout, Descended both from gods immortall race, Triumphing fill, this weary world about In feates of armes, and many a comely grace.

Other hold opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Thefeus: the one of them was named o Enepion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongstothers the Poet Ion writeth it, who was former.

borne in the Ile of Chio, and speaking of this citie, he faith thus:

OEnopion which was the sonne of worthy Theseus,

Did cause menbuild this stately towne which now triumpheth thus.

Now what things are found feemely in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner fing them. But one Pagnon borne in the citie of AMATHYNTA, reciteth this cleane after another fort. and contrary to all other: faying, that Thefeus by tempest was driven with the Ile of Cyprvs having with him Ariadne, which was great with child, and fo fore fea ficke, that she was not able to abide it. In fo much as he was forced to put her aland, and himselfe afterwards returning aboord hoping to faue his ship against the storm, was compelled forthwith to loose into the sea. The women of the country did courteoufly receive & intreat Ariadne: & to comfort her again. (for the was maruelloufly out of hart, to fee the was thus for faken) they counterfeited letters as if Theleus had written them to her. And when her groning time was come, and the to be layed. they did their best by all possible means to saue her, but she died notwithstanding in labour, and could never be delivered. So the was honourably buried by the Ladies of Cypros. The few nor long after returned thither againe, who took her death maruelous heavily, & left mony with the inhabitants of the country, to facrifice vnto her yearly: & for memory of her, he caused two litle images to be molten; the one of copper, & the other of filuer, which he dedicated vnto her. This facrifice is done the fecond day of September, on which they do yet observe this ceremony: they do lay a yong child vpon a bed, which pitifully crieth and lamenteth, as women trauelling with child. They fay alfo, that the AMATHYSIANS do yet cal the groue where her tombe is fet vp, the wood of Venus Ariadne. And yet there are of the Naxians, that report this otherwise: faying, there were two Minoes, and two Ariadnes, whereof the one was maried to Bacchus in the Ile of Naxos of whom Staphylus was borne; and the other the yongest, was rauished and caried away by Thefew, who afterward for fooke her, & she came into the Ile of Naxos with her nurce called Coreyna, whose graue they do shew yet to this day. The second Ariadne died there also, but fhe had no fuch honour done to her after her death, as to the first was given. For they celebrate the feast of the first with all joy & mirth; where the facrifices done in memory of the fecond be Theseus re- mingled with mourning and sorow. Theseus then departing from the Ile of Creta, arrived in the Ile of DELOS, where he did facrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gauethere a litle image of to the teef Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then with the other yong boyes that he had deliue. red, he danced a kind of dance, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they fay: in which there are many turnes and returnes, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELI-ANS call this manner of dance, the crane, as Die earcus faith. And Thefeus danced it first about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to fay, horne-staffe: because it is made and builded of hornes only all on the left hand well and curioufly fet together without any other binding. It is faid also, that he made a game in this I le of DELOS, in which at the first was given to him that hen of vite Ouercame, a branch of palme for reward of victorie. But when they drew neare to the coaft of ATTICA, they were so ioyfull, he and his maister, that they forgat to set up their white saile, by which they should have given knowledge of their health and fafety vnto Ageus. Who seeing the blacke faile afarre off, being out of all hope euer more to fee his fonne againe, tooke fuch a griefe at his heart, that he threw himfelfe headlong from the toppe of a clyffe, and killed himfelfe. So soone as Theseus was arrived at the port named Phalerus, he performed the sacrifices which he had vowed to the gods at his departure: and fent an Herald of his before vnto the city, to carry newes of his fafe arrivall. The Herald found many of the city mourning the death viu eth lafe of King AEgeus. Many other received him with great ioy, as may be supposed. They would haue crowned him also with a garland of flowers, for that he had brought so good tidings, that children in the children of the city were returned in fafety. The Herald was content to take the garland, yet the bauen would he not in any wife put it on his head, but did wind it about his Heralds rod he bare in his hand, and so returned forthwith to the sea, where Theseus made his sacrifices. Who perceirala bare a using they were not yet done, did refuse to enter into the temple, and stayed without for troubling of the facrifices. Afterwards all ceremonies finished, he went in and told him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for forrow, hafted with speed towards the city. And this is the cause, why to this day, at the feast called ofcophoria (as who would fav Ocephoria. the feaft of boughes) the Herald hath not his head but his rod onely crowned with floures, and why the affiftants also after the facrifice done, do make such cries and exclamations: Elizatet iou.iou. whereof the first is the cry and voice they commonly vse one to another to make haste. or else it is the foote of some song of triumph: and the other is the cry and voice of men as it were in feare and trouble. After he had ended the obsequies and funerals for his father, he performed all his facrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed, the feuenth day of the moneth of October, on which they arrived at their returne into the city of ATHENS. Even so the custome officer which they vie at this day to feeth all manner of pulse, cometh of this: that those which then returned with Theseus, did seeth in a great brasse pot all the remaine of their provision, and therewith made good cheare together. Euen in fuch fort as this came vp the custome to carry a tongue. branch of oliue, wreathed about with wooll, which they call Irefione: because at that time they irefione in caried boughes of supplication, as we have told ye before. About which they hang all forts of the life of fruits: for then barrennesse did ceasse, as the verses they sang afterwards did witnesse.

And pure good wine, to make him sleepe full well. Howbeit there are some which will say, that these verses were made for the Heraclides, that is to fay those that descended from Hercules: which flying for their safetic and succour vnto the A-THENTANS, were entertained and much made of by them for a time. But the most part hold opinion, they were made vpon the occasion aforesaid. The vessell in which Theseus went and re- Theseus turned, was a galliot of thirty owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrics west into the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the old peeces of wood that were rotten, and euer renew- the tribute ing them with new in their places. So that euerfince, in the disputations of the Philosophers elithen, in touching things that increase, to wir, whether they remaine alwayes one, or be made others: the gallion of 30. cmthis galliot was alwayes brought in for example of doubt. For some maintained, that it was still or. one vessell: others to the contrary defended it was not so. And they hold opinion also, that the Discussion feast of boughes which is celebrated at ATHENS at this time, was then first of all instituted by creefe. Thefens, It is faid moreouer, that he did not carry all the wenches vpon whom the lots did fall, The galliot but chose two faire young boyes, whose faces were sweete and delicate as maidens be, that for a deabt. otherwise were hardie and quicke spirited. but he made them so oft bathe themselues in hote bathes, and keepe them from the heate of the Sunne, and so many times to wash, annoing, and rub themselves with oiles, which serve to supple and smooth their skins, to keepe fresh and faire their colour, to make yellow and bright their haires: and withall did teach them to to counterfeit the speech, countenance and fashion of young maides, that they seemed to be like them, rather then yong boyes. For there was no maner of difference to be perceived outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a proceffion, in which both he and the other yong boyes were apparelled then, as they be now which carry boughes on the day of the feast in their hands. They carry them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is told of them: or rather because they returned home just at the time and season, whe they gather the fruit of those trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to fay, supper cariers, which are affistants to the facrifice done that day, in reprefenting the mothers of those vpon whom the lots did fall, because they in like fort brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for so did their mothers tattle to their children to comfort and encourage them. All these particularities were written by Demonthe Historiographer. There was moreouer a place chosen out, to build him a temple in and he himself ordained, that those houses which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, should now yearely thenceforth become contributaries towards the Phytalides charges of a folemne facrifice, which should be done in the honour of him: and he did affigue the the full order and administratio of the same, vnto the house of the Phytalides, in recompence of the cur- that seased tesie which they shewed him when he ariued. Furthermore, after the death of his father Ageus, him in he vndertooke a maruellous great enterprise. For he brought all the inhabitants of the whole fes. prouince of ATTICA, to be within the city of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, Thefers which were before dispersed into diverse villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be inhabitants affembled together, when occasion was offered to establish any order concerning the common of the counstate. Many times also they were at variance together and by the eares, making wars one vpon in of atanother. But Thefeus tooke the paines to go from village to village, and from familie to familie, one citie.

to let them understand the reasons why they should confent unto it. So he found the poore people and private men ready to obey and follow his will, but the rich, and fuch as had authoritie in enery village, all against it. Neuerthelesse he wanthem, promising that it should be a commonwealth, and not fubicet to the power of any fole Prince, but rather a popular state. In which he would onely referue to himselfe the charge of the warres, and the preservation of the lawes: for the reft, he was content that every citizen in all, and for all should beare a like sway & authoritie. So there were fome that willingly granted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yeelded notwithstanding for feare of his displeasure and power, which then was very great. So they thought it better to confent with good will, ynto that he required, then to tarry his forcible copulfion. Then he caused all the places where justice was ministred, and all their halles of affem-The fealts bly to be ouerthrowne and pulled downe. He remoued fraight all judges and officers, and built a towne house, and a counsell hall, in the place where the city now standeth, which the ATHE-NIANS call ASTY, but he called the whole corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwards he inflituted the great feast and common facrifice for all the country of ATTICA, which they call Panathenea. Then he ordained another feast also vpon the fixteenth day of the moneth of June, for and moketh all firangers which should come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metwein, and is kept cuen to this day. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promife, and began to fet vp an estate or policy of a commonwealth, beginning first with the scruice of the gods. To The O acle know the good fuccesse of his enterprise, he fent at the very beginning to the oracle of Apollo in DELPHES, to inquire of the fortune of this city: fro whence this answer was brought unto him:

O thou which are the fonne of A Egens, Begot by him on Pitheus daughter deare: The mighty love, my father glorious. By his decree, bath (aid there shall appeare A fatall end of enery city here. Which end he will, shall also come adowne. Within the walles of this thy stately towne. Therefore (hew thou, a valiant constant mind, And let no care nor carke thy heart displease: For like vnto a bladder blowne with wind Thou Shalt be tost apon the furging feas. Yet les no dint of dolours thee difeafe. For why? thou shalt, not perish nor decay, Nor be orecome, not yet be cast away.

It is found written also, that Sibylla afterwards gaue out such a like oracle over the citic of ATHENS:

> The bladder blowne may fleete vpon the fludde, But cannot finke, nor flicke in filthy mudde.

Morcouer, because he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his city, he enticed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the felfe fame freedome and printledges which the natural borne citizens had. So that many judge, that these words which are in vie at this day in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, come ye hither: be the felfe tame which Thefess then caused to be proclaimed, when he in that fort did gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all the the fuffered not the great multitude that came thicher tagge and ragge, to be without distinction of degrees and orders. For he first deuided the Noblemen offlares & from husbandmen and artificers, appointing the Noblemen as judges and Magistrats to judge vpon matters of Religion, and touching the service of the gods: and of hem also he did chuse moximente. rulers, to beare civill office in the common-weale, to determine the law, and to tell all holy and The stime things. By this meanes he made the Noblemen and the two other estates equall in voice. And as the Noblemen did passe the other in honour, even so the artificers exceeded them in regall pane number, and the husbandmenthem in profite. Now that Thefeus was the first who of all others er, and f. 4- yeelded to have a common-weale or popular estate (as Aristotle saith) and did give over his repular state. gall power: Homer selfe seemeth to testific it, in numbring the ships which were in the GR #-Anoxella. Clans army beforethe city of Troia. For amongst all the Gracians, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS people. Moreover Thefews coyned money, which he marked with the stampe of an oxe, in memory of the Ball of Marathon, or of Taurus the captaine of Minos, or else to prouoke his citizens to give themselves to labour. They fay also that of this money they were fince called Hecatombaon, and Decabaon, which fignifieth worth an hundred oxen, and worth ten Hecatom oxen. Furthermore having joyned all the territorie of the city of ME GARA vnto the countrey barn, Deof ATTICA, he caused that notable four fquare pillar to be set up for their confines within the straight of PELOPONNESVS; and engraved thereupon this superfeription, that declareth the separation of both the countries which confine there together. The superscription is this:

Where Titan doth begin, his beames for to display, Euenthat way stands Ionia, in fertile wife alway: And where againe he goeth, adowne to take his rest, There slands Peloponnesus land, for there I compt it west.

It was he also which made the games called Isthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the end that as the GRECIANS did celebrate the feaft of games called Olympia, in the honour of Iupi. ter, by Hercules ordinance: fo, that they should also celebrate the games called Isthmia, by his olympia. order and inflitution, in the honour of Neptune. For those that were done in the straights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, and had rather forme of facrifice or of a my- Thefene. sterie, then of games and open feast. Yet some will say, that these games of Isthmia were instituted in the honour and memory of Sciron, and that Thefens ordained them in fatisfaction of min in the his death: because he was his cosingermaine, being the sonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha Bonnar of the daughter of Pitheus. Other fay that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Thefeus made these games, and not for the memory of the other. Howsocuer it was, he specially willed the Cominthians, that they should give vnto those that came from ATHENS to see their games of Isthmia, so much placeto sit downe before them in the most honourable part of the feast place) as the saile of their ship should cover, in the which they came from Athens: thus do Hellanicus and Andron Halicarnaffeus write hercof. Touching the voyage he made by the fea Maior, Phelochorus, and some other hold opinion, that he went thither with Hercules against the Thefen AMAZONES: and that to honour his valiantnesse, Hercules gauchim Antiopa the AMAZONE. iourny into But the more part of the other Historiographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, and Herodotus, mare maior do write, that Thefeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, and that he tooke this A A A ZONE prisoner; which is likelieft to be true. For we do not find that any other who went this Antique iourney with him, had taken any AMAZONE prisoner besides himselse. Bion also the Histori- the dinsographer, this notwithstanding saith, that he brought her away by deceit and stealth. For the fined by AMAZONES (faith he) naturally louing men, did not flie at all when they faw them land in their Thefen. countrey, but fent them prefents, and that Thefeus entited her to come into his shippe, who brought him a prefent; and to foone as fle was aboord, he hoyfed his faile, and to carried her away. Another Historiographer Menecrates, who wrote the historic of the city of NICEA in the countrey of BYTHINIA, faith: that Thef us having this AMAZONE Antiopa with him, remained a certaine time vpon those coasts, and that amongst other he had in his companie three youngerbrethren of ATHENS, Euneus, Thors, and Solois. This last, Solois, was maruellously in lone with Antiopa, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, faning vnto one salvi fell with whom he was most familiar, and whom he trusted best: so that he reported this matter vn- in lone with to Antiopa. But she veterly rejected his suite, though otherwise she handled it wisely and cur- amipa. teously, and did not complaine to Theseus of him. How beit the young man despairing to enjoy his loue, tooke it so inwardly, that desperatly he leapt into the river, and drowned himselfe. solois Which when Thefeus vnderstood, and the cause also the rought him to the desperation and drawned and he was very forward angreast. Whereamon he remembered a certaine Oracle of Bushin himself end, he was very fory, and angry alfo. Whereupon he remembred a certaine Oracle of Pythia, for lone. by whom he was commanded to build a city in that place in a strange countrey, where he should be most fory, and that he should leave some that were about him at that time, to gouerne the fame. For this cause therefore he built a city in that place, which he named Pyrho- pyllopsili POLIS, because he built it onely by the commandement of the Nume Pythia. He called the ri- built by uer in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memorie of him: and left his two brethren for his deputies and as governors of this new city, with another gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermes. Hereof it cometh, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS calla certaine place of their city, Hermus house. But they faile in the accent, by putting it vpon the last syllable: for

The cause due to the memory of Hermus, ynto the god Mercury. Now heare what was the occasion of the wars of the Amazones, which me thinkes was not a matter of finall moment, nor an enterprife of a woman. For they had not placed their camp within the very city of Athens, nor had not fought in the very place it felfe (called PNYCE) adioyning to the temple of the Mules, if they had not first conquered or subdued all the country therabouts: neither had they all come at the first, so valiantly to assaile the city of Athens. Now, whether they came by land from so farre a countrey, or that they passed ouer an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frosen as Hellanicus faith: it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very city it felfe, the names of the places which continue yet to this prefent day do witnesse it, and the graues also of the women which died there. But so it is, that both armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theleus having first made facrifice vnto Foure the goddesse, according to the counsell of a prophecy he had received, he gave them battel in the moneth of August, on the same day, in the which the A-THEN IANS do cuenat this prefent folemnife the feaft, which they cal Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, defirous particularly to write all the circustances of this encounter, faith, that the left point of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION; and that the right point marched by the fide of Chrysa, eue to the place which is called Pnyce, vpo which the ATHENIANS coming towards the temple of the Muses, did first give their charge. And for proofe that this is true, the graves of the women which died in the first encounter, are found yet in the great fireete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neare vnto the chappell of the litle god Chalcodes. And the ATHENIANS (faith he) were in this place repulsed by the AMAZONS. cuento the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to fay, of the furies. But on the other fide alfo, the Athenians coming towards the quarters of Palladium, Ardettus, and Lucium, draue back their right point euen to within their campe, and flue a great number of them. Peace con- Afterwards, at the end of foure moneths, peace was taken between them by meanes of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Hiftoriographer calleth the AMAZONE which Thefeus maried, Hyppolita and nor Antiopa. Neuertheleffe, some fay that she was flaine (fighting on The. feus fide) with a darr, by another called Molpadia. In memorie whereof, the pillar which is ioyned to the temple of the olympian ground, was fet vp in her honour. We are not to maruell, if the historie of things fo ancient, be found fo dinerly written. For there are also that write, that Queene Antiopa fent those fecretly which were hurt then into the city of CALCIDE, where some of them recouered, and were healed; and others also died, which were buried neare to the place called Amazonion. Howfoeuer it was, it is most certaine that this warre was ended by agreement. For a place adjoying to the temple of Thefens, doth beare record of it, being called orcomofium: because the peace was there by solemne oath concluded. And the facrifice also dorh truly verifie it, which they have made to the AMAZONS, before the feast of Thefews, long time out of mind. They of MEGARA also do shew a tombe of the AMAZONES in their citie, which is as they go from the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they find an ancient tombe, cut in forme and fashion of a losenge. They say that there died other of the AMAZONES allo, neare vnto the city of CHÆRONEA, which were buried all along the litle brooke paffing by the fame, which in the old time (in mine opinion) was called Thermodon, and is now named Hamon, as we have other places written in the life of Demosthenes. And it feemethalfo, that they did not paffe through THESSALY without fighting: for there are feene yet of their tombes all about the city of Scorvsa, hard by the rockes, which be called the dogees head. And this is that which is worthy memory (in mine opinion) touching the warres of these AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth that the AMAZONES made wars with Thefeas to reuenge the iniury he did to their Queene Antiora, refusing her, to marry with Phedra: and for the mur-The few for der which he telleth that Hercules did, that me thinkes is altogether but a denice of Poets. It is by antiopa. very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Thefeus married Phadra, having had before of Antiopa a sonne called Hyppolitus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers do not in any thing speake against the tragicall Poets, in that which concerneth the ill happe that chanced to him, in the persons of this his wife, and of his sonne: we must needes take it to be so, as we finde it written in the Tragedies. And yet we finde many other reports touching the mariages of Thefeus, whose beginnings had no great good honest ground, neither fell out their ends very fortunate: and yet for all that they have made no Tragedies of them. neither neither have they bene plaied in the Theaters. For we reade that he took away Anaxo, the Tro-EZENIAN, and that after he had killed Sinnis and Gereyon, he tooke their daughters perforce; and that he did also mary Phiribea the mother of Aiax, and afterwards Pherebea, and Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much alfo, for that he fo lightly for fooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of Agles the daughter of Panopeus, as we have recited before. Lastly, he tooke away Hellen: which raufhment filled all the Realme of ATTICA with wars, & finally was the very occafion that forced him to forfake his country, and brought him at length to his end, as we will tel you hereafter. Albeit in his time other Princes of GRECE had done many goodly & notable exploits in the wars, yet Herodotw is of opinion, that Thefew was never in any one of them: fauing that he was at the battel of the Lapithe against the Centauri, Others say to the contrary, that The Contrary he was at the journey of Cholchide with Iason, and that he did helpe Meleager to kil the wild Bore burels. of Calydonia: from whence (as they fay) this Prouerbe came : Not without Thefeus; meaning that Prouerbe. fuch a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theleus on theleus telfe did many famous acts, without aide of any man, and that for his valiant neffe this Prouerbe. came in vie, which is spoken: This is another Thefeus. Also he did helpe Adrastus King of the An-ther Thefees. GIVES, to recover the bodies of those that were slaine in the battell, before the city of Thebes. ". Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides faith, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the THEBANS in battell but it was by composition. And thus the greatest number of the most anciet writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus writerh, that this was the first treaty that ener was made to recover the dead bodies flaine in battell : Nevertheleffe we reade in the fiffories & geffes of Hereules, that he was the first that over suffered his enemies to carry away their dead bodies, after they had bene put to the fword. But who focuer he was, at this day in the village of ELEVIHERES, they do flew the place where the people were buried, & where Princes tombes are feen about the city of ELEVSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimony hereof, the tragedy Affilius made of the Elevsinians, where he caufeth it to be fookeneuen thus to The feus himself, doth clearely ouerthrow the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendship betwixt Pirithous and him, it is faid it began this. The renowne of his valiancy was Thosewaramaruelloufly blown abroad through all GRECE, & Pirithous definous to know it by experience listing went even of purpose to inuade his country, & brought away a certaine booty of oxe of his taken out of the country of MARATHON. The feus being aduertifed therof, armed straight, & went friend hip to the refere. Perithous hearing of his coming, fled not at all, but recurned back fuddenly to meet with him. him. And so foon as they came to see one another, they borh wondred at each others beauty & courage, and fo had they no defire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hand first to Theseus, faid vnto him; I make your selfe indge of the damage you have fuftained by my invasion, and with all my heart I will make fuch farisfaction, as ir shall please you to asset it at. These as the did not only release him of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Herupon they were presently sworn brethren in the field: after Perithons which oath betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia, & fent to pray Thefens to come to his maringe, to visite his country, and to make merry with the Lapithe He had bidden also the Centauri them in the to the feaft: who being drunke, committed many lewd parts, euen to the forcing of women. field. Howbeit the Lapith & chastised them fo well, that they flue fome of them prefently in the place, maried De. and drane the rest forwards out of the countrey by the helpe of Theseus, who armed himselfe, idamia. and fought on their fide. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter formwhat contrary, faying that Thefe-the overzes went not at all vntill the war was well begun: and that it was the first time that he saw Hercules, come the and spake vnto him neare vnto the city of Trachina, when he was then quiet, having ended all Those and the city of Trachina when he was then quiet, having ended all Those and the city of Trachina when he was then quiet, having ended all Those and the city of his far voyages, and greatest troubles. They report that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnesse, and honorable entertainement betweene them, and great curtesse was metal Traoffered to each other. Neuertheleffeme thinkes we fhould give better credite to those writers ebina. that fay they met many times together, and that Heroules was accepted and received into the brotherhood of the mysteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenance and fauor which Thefens shewed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of who was to be purged of necessitie of all his ill deeds and cruelcies, before he could enter into the company of These sift thole holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theseus was fiftie yeares old when he tooke away Hellen inguistry and rainfied her, which was very young, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanicus faith. By old when 60 reason whereof, some seeking to hide the rauishment of her as a haynous fact, do report it Hellen.

was not he, but one Idas and Lyncens that caried her away, who left her in his cuftodie and keeping: and that Theseus would have kept her from them, and would not have delivered her to her brethren Callor and Pollux, which afterwards did demand her againe of him. Others againe fay, it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her to keepe, for that he was affraid of Enarfbhorus the fonne of Hippocoon, who would have had her away by force. But that which cometh nearest to the troth in this case, & which indeed by many authors is testified, was in this fort. Thefeus & Perithous wentrogether to the city of LACED EMON, where they took away Hellen (being yet very yong) euen as she was dancing in the temple of Diana surnamed Orthia: and they fled for life. They of LACED EMON sentafter her, but those that followed went no further then the city of TEGEA. Now when they were escaped out of the country of PELOPONNESVS. they agreed to draw lots together, which of them two should haucher, with condition that whose lot it were to have her, he should take her to his wife, & should be boundalso to help his companion to get him another. It was Thefeus hap to light vpon her, who caried her to the city of APHIDNES, because she was yet too young to be maried. Whither he caused his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recomending her to his good care, and to keep it fo fecretly, that no body should know what was become of her. Because he would do the like for Perithous (according to the agreement made betwixt them) he went into Epirvs with him to steale the daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Molossians, who had furnamed his wife Proferpina, his daughter Proferpina, and his dogge Cerberus, with whom he made them fight which came to aske his daughter in mariage, promiting to give her to him that should ouercome his Cerberus. But the king vnderstanding that Perithous was come, not to request his daughter in mariage, but to steale her away, he tooke him prisoner with Theseus: torn in pee- and as for Pirithous, he caused him presently to betorne in peeces with his dogge, and shut Thefess up in close prison. In the meane time there was one at ATHENS called Menestheus, the sonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the fon of Orneus, and Orneus was the fon of Erictheus. This Menefibens was the first that began to flatter the people, and did seeke to win the fauour of the communaltic, by sweet entifing words: by which denice he stirred up the chiefest of the city against Thesens (who indeed long before began to be weary of him) by declaring vnto them how Thefeus had taken from them their royalties and figniories, and had shut them up in such fort within the walles of a city, that he might the better keep them in fubication and obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour fort of people he did stirre vp also to rebellion, perswading them that it was no other then a dreame of liberty which was promifed them: and how contrariwisethey were clearely dispossessed and thrown out of their owne houses, of their temples, and from their naturall places where they were borne, to the end onely, that in liew of many good and louing Lords which they were wont to have before, they should now be compelled to serue one onely head, and a strange Lord. Euen as Menestheus was very hote about this practife, the war of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For thefe Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Castor and Pollux, came down with a great army against the city of ATHENS: and some suspect fore that Monestheus was cause of their comming thither. Howbeitat the first entrie they did no hurt at all in the countrey, but only demanded restitution of their fister. To whom the citizens made answer, that they knew not where she was left: and then the brethren began to make spoile, and offer warre indeed. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who having knowledge (I cannot tell by what meane) that flie was fecretly hidden in the city of Aphidnes, reucaled it vnto the. By reason wherofthe Tyndarides did alwaies honor him very much, fo long as he lived, and afterwards the LACED ÆMONIANS, having of burnt & destroyed the whole country of Arrica throughout, they would yet never touch the Academie of ATHENS for Academus fake. Yet Dicearchus faith, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two ARCADIANS, Echedemus and Marathus, and how of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemic, which fithence hath bene called Academia:and after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, because he willingly Timiarides offered himself to be facrificed before the battell, as obeying the order and commandement of a prophecie. So they went and pitched their campe before the city of APHIDNES, and having wonne the battell, and taken the city by affault, they razed the place. They fay that Alyeus, the the battell fonne of Sciron was flaine at this field, who was in the hoaft of the Tyndarides, and that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alyeus, in the which his body was buried. Howbeit Hereas writeth that Thefeus felfe did kill him before Aphidnes: In wirnesse whereof he alledgeth certaine verses which speake of Alycus.

While as he fought with all his might and maine In thy defence, faire Hellen for to fight, In Aphidnes upon the pleasant plaine, Bold Thefeus to cruell death him dight, Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theseus being there, the city of APHIDNES, and his mother also were taken. But when it was wonne, they of ATHENS beganto quake for feare, and Menestheus counselled them to receive the Tyndarides into the city, and to make them good cheere, fo they would make no wars but vpon Thefeus, which was the first that had done them the wrong and iniury:and that to all other else they should shew fauour and good will. And so it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to do as they listed, they demanded nothing else but that they might be received into their corporation, and not to be reckoned for strangers, no more then Hercules was: the which was granted the Tyndarides, and Aphidnus did The Tynadopt them for his children, as Pylins had adopted Hercules. Moreouer they did honor them as if darides had adopted Hercules. they had bene gods, calling them Anaces. Either because they ceased the wars, or for that they ordered themselves so well, that their whole army being lodged within the city, there was not called ding. any hurt or displeasure done to any person: but as it became those that have the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preserve the good quiet thereof. All which this Greeke word Anacos doth fignific, whereof perchance it comes that they call the kings Anacos. There are o- 163. thers also who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, because of their starres which appeadings and the startes which appeadings and the startes which appeadings and the startes which appead the startes which appears the startes which red in the aire. For the Attican tongue faith, Anaces, and Anecathen: where the common peoAnaces. ple fay ino, and Anothen, that is to fay, aboue. Neuertheleffe Athra Thefeus mother, was caried why fo calprisoned to LACED EMON, and from thence to TROLA with Hellen, as some say: and as Homer led. himselse doth witnesse in his verses, where he speaketh of the women that followed Hellen:

Athra the daughter deare of Pitheus aged Sire, And with her faire Clymene she, whose eyes most men desire.

Yetthere are other who as well reject these two verses, and maintaine they are not Homers: as Diverse also they reprote all that is reported of Munychus: to wit, that Lacetde Wing printilly conceived pinious of of him by Demophon, he was brought vp fecretly by Athra within TROIA. But Hefter the hiftorian in his thirteenth of his histories of Arrica, maketh a recitall far contrary to other, laying that fome hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was flaine in battell by Achilles and Patroclus in the country of Thessaly, neare to the river of Sperchius, & that his brother Hector took the city of Sperchi. TROEZEN, from whence he brought away Athra: in which there is no maner of appearance or ms. likehhood. But Adonius king of the Molossians, feasting Hercules one day as he passed through his Realme, descended by chance into talke of Theseus and Perithous, how they came to feale away his daughter fecretly: and after told how they were also punished. Hercules was maruellous forry to vuderstand that one of them was now dead, and the other in danger to die; and thought with himselfe that to make his mone to Adoneus, it would not helpe the matter; he Theseus de. befought him only that he would deliner Thefens for his fake. And he granted him. Thus Thefens Incredent being deliuered of his captivity, returned to Athens, where his friends were not altogether kept Hereules vnder by his enemics: & at his returne he did dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the city means. had beforecaused to be built in his owne honour. And where first of all they were called The. fea, he did now farname them all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Now when he was arrived at ATHENS, he would immediatly have commanded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found himselfe troubled much with sedition, because those who had hated him of a long time, had added also to their old cankred hate, a disdaine and contempt to The Ather feare him any more. And the common people now were become so stubborne, that where before they would have done all that they were commanded; and have spoken nothing to the contrary to the looked to be horne with and flattered. Wherever, the flattered with the first flattered with the flattered with the flattered with the first flattered with the first flattered with the flattere trary now they looked to be borne with, and flattered. Whereupon Theseusthought at the first to have vsed force, but he was forced by the faction and contention of his enemies to let all alone, and in the end, despairing he should euer bring his matters to passe to his desire, he secretly fent away his children vnto the Ile of Evno BA, to Elphenor the fonne of Chalcodus. And himfelfe, after he had made many wishes & curses against the Athenians, in the village of Gar-GETTVs, in a place which for that cause to this day is called Arateriod, (that is to say, the place of

Lycomedes reigned at that time, and was king of the Ile, vnto whom to the It of Thefeus made request for fome land, as intending to dwell there: albeit some say that he required him to giue him aide against the ATHENIANS. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to enterraine fo great a personage, or that he did it to gratifie Menestheus: caried him vp to the high rockes, faining as though he would from thence have shewed him all his country round about: but when he had him there, he threw him downe headlong from the top of the rocks to the bottome, and put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he feldowne of himselfe by an unfortunate chance, walking one day after supper as he was wont. There was no man at that time that did follow or pursue his death, but Menestheus quietly remained king of ATHENS: and the children of Thefem, as private souldiers followed Elphinor in the warres of TROIA. But atter the death of Menestheus, who died in the journey to TROY, Theseus sonnes returned vnto ATHENS, where they recouered their state. Sithence there were many occasions which moued the ATHENIANS to reuerence and honour him as a demy God. For in the battell of Marathon. many thought they saw his shadow and image in armes, fighting against the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yeare wherein Phadon was gouernour of ATHENS) the Nume Pethia aniwered the ATHENIANS, who had fent to the Oracle of Apolio: that they should bring backe the boncs of Thefeus, and putting them in some honourable place, they should preserve and honour them deuoutly. But it was a hard matter to find his graue; and if they had found it, yet had it bin a hard thing to have brought his bones away, for the malice of those barbarous people which inhabited that He:which were so wild and fierce, that none could trade or liue with them. Notwithstanding Gimon having taken the Iland(as we have written in keth the lle his life) and feeking his graue: perceining by good hap an Eagle pecking with her beake, and fcraping with her clawes in a place of some prety height: straight it came into his mind (as by diuine inspiration) to search and digge the place, where was found the tombe of a great body, with the head of a speare which was of brasse, & a sword with it. All which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon in the admirall gally. The ATHENIANS received them with greatioy. with processions and goodly sacrifices, as if Thefeus himselfe had bene aliue, and had returned into the city againe. At this day all these relickes lye yet in the middest of the city, neare to the place where the yong men do vie all their exercises of body. There is free liberty of accesse for all slaues and poore men (that are afflicted and pursued by any mightier then themselues) to pray and facrifice in remembrance of Thefew: who while he lived was protector of the oppreffed, and did curteously receive their requests and petitions that prayed to have aid of him. The greatest & most solemne sacrifice they do vnto him, is on the eight day of October, in which he returned from CRETA with the other yong children of ATHENS. Howbeit they do not leave to honour him euery eight day of all other moneths, either because he arrived from TROE-ZEN at ATHENS the eight day of Iune, as Diodorus the Cosmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meetelt for him, because the bruite ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They do sacrifice also to Neptune the eight day of enery moneth, because the number of eight is the first cube made of euen number, and the double of the first square: which doth represent a stedsastnesse immoueable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cause we furname Asphalius, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation doth fignifie the lafe keeper, and the stayer of the earth.

THE LIFE OF Romulus.

HE Historiographers do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause the great name of the city of Rome (the glory whereof is Dinerseop). blowne abroad through all the world) was first given vnto it. For some the name of thinke that the Pelasgians, after they had ouercome the greatest part of Rome. the world, and had inhabited and fubdued many nations, in the end did stay themselues in that place where it was new builded: and for their great strength and power in armes, they gaue the name of Rome vnto the city, as fignifying power in the Greeke tongue, Other fay, that after the taking and destruction of TROIA, there were certaine TROIANS, which fauing themselues from the fword, tooke such vessels as they found at aduenture in the hauen, and were by winds put to the Thyscane shore, where they anckered neare vnto the riner of Tyber. There their wives being so fore sea sick, that possibly they could not any more endure the boilterous surges of the seas, it happened one of them among the rest (the noblest and wifest of the company) called Roma, to counsell the other women of her companions to set their ships a fire; which they did accordingly. Wherewith their husbands at the first were maruellously offended. But afterwards, being compelled of necessitie to plant themselves neare vnto the city of Pallantivn, they were appealed when they faw things prosper better then they hoped for, finding the foile there fertile, and the people their neighbours civill and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore among other honours they did to requite this Lady Roma, they called their city after her name, as from whom came the originall cause of the building and foundation thereof. They fay, that from thence came this custome continuing yet to this day at Rome, that the women faluting their kinsefolkes and husbands, dokisse them on the ning of kismonth; for so did these Trotan Ladies to please their husbands, and to winner them againe, sing their after they had lost their fauours, and procured their displeasures with burning of their shippes. kinfolk on the mouth Other fay, that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or elle of Telephus the came from fonne of Hercules, and the wife of AEneas: other fay, of Ascanius, the sonne of AEneas, who the Trian named the city after her name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the fonne of Vliffes and of Circe) that first founded Rome: other will fay that it was Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes fent thither from Troia. Other write that it was one Romis a tyrant of the LATINS, who draue the Thys cans out of those parts: which departing out of Thessaly, went first of all into Lydia, and afterwards from Lydia into Italy. And furthermore, they C 4

who thinke that Romalus (as indeed it carieth best likelihood) was he that gaue the name to the city, do not agree about his anceflors. For fome of them write, that he was the fonne of Aneas and of Dexithea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into Iraly of a litle child with his brother Remus: and that at that time the river of Tyber being overflowne, all other ships were cast away, fauing the shippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good hap came to ftay vpon a very plaine euen ground on the banke: and because the children beyond all hope were faued by this means, therfore the place was afterwards called Roma. Other fay, that Roma the daughter of the first Troian Lady was maried vnto Latinus the son of Telemachus, by whom she had Romulus. Other write, that it was Almilia the daughter of Aneas, and of Lauinia, which was gotten with child by the god Mars. Other telatale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is faid that there was sometime a king of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whose house through the permission of the gods, appeared such a like vision: that there rose vp in the harth of his chimney the forme and fashion of a mans priny member, which continued there many daies. And they fay, that at that time there was in Thy s-CANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius such an of theusin answer; that he should cause his daughter yet vnmaried to have carnall company with the strange thing, for she should beare a some, that should be famous for his valiancie, for strength of body, and his happy fuccesse, wherein he should exceed all men of his time. Tarchetius told this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this strange thing: but she disdaining to do it, sent one of her wayting women to vndertake the entertainement. But Tarchetius was fo mad at this, that he caused them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddesse Vesta appeared to him in his sleep in the night, and charged him he should not do it. Whereupon he did command them to make him a peece of cloth in the prison, with promise that they should be maried when they had finished it. These poore maids toiled at it all the line long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetins commandement) that did vndo all they had done the day before. In the mean time, this waiting woman that was got with child by this strange thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twins: whom Tarchetius gaue ynto one Teratius, with expresse commandement he should cast them away. This Teratius caried them vnto the banke of the river: thither came ashe Wolfeand gave them sucke, and certains birds that brought little crums and put them in their mouthes, vntill a fwine-heard perceiuing them, and wondring at the fight, did boldly go to the children, and tooke them away with him. These infants being thus preserved, after they were come to mans state, did set vpon Tarche. zins and flue him. One Promathien an Italian writer, deliuereth this story thus. But the report that carieth best credite of all, and is allowed of by many writers, cometh from Diocles Peparethian, (whom Fabius Piëlor followeth in many things) who was the first that put forth this story among the GRECIANS, and specially the chiefest points of it. Though this matter be somewhat dinertly taken, yet in effect the flory is thus. The right line and bloud of the kings of AL-BA descended from AEneas, by succession from the father to the sonne: and the kingdome fell in the end betweene two brethren, Wumitor and Amulius, They agreed by lot to make divition betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the gold, filuer, ready money, goods and iewels brought from TROIA. Numitor by his lot chose the Realme for his portion: Amulius having all the gold and treasure in his hands, did find himselfe thereby the stronger, and so did easily take his Realme from him. And fearing lest his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thrust him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, there to passe her dayes in virginity, and neuer to-be maried: (some call her Rhea, other sylma, and other Ilia) neuertheleffe not long after the was found with child, against the rule and profession of the Westall Numes. So nothing had saued her from present death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithstanding she was straightly locked vp, that no body could see her, nor speake with her, lest the should be brought to bed without Amulius knowledge. In the end she was deliuered of two faire boyes and maruellous greattwins; which made Amulius more affraid then before. So he commanded one of his men to take the two children, and to throw them away, and deftroy them. Some fay that this feruants name was Faulfulus: other thinke it was he that brought them vp. But who foeuer he was, he that had the charge to throw them away put them in a trough, and went towards the riner with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it rifen fo high, and running fo swifely, that he durst not come neare the waters side, and so they being in the trough, he laid them on the banke. In the meane time the river swelling still, and overslowing the banke; in such fortthat it came under the trough, did gently life up the trough, and caried it vnto a great plaine, called at this present Cermanum, and in the old time Germanum (as Itake it) Cermanum. because the Romaines called the brothers of father and mother, Germani. Now there was neare vnto this place a wild fig-tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romalus, as the Rominalis, most pare thought: or else because the beasts feeding there, were wont to come under the same in the extreme heate of the day, and there did ruminate, that is, chew their cudde in the shadow: or perhaps because that the two children did sucke the teate of the Wolfe, which the ancient LATINS call RVMA, and they at this day do yet call the goddesse on whom they cry out to give The godtheir children sucke, Rymilia. And in their sacrifices to her they vseno wine, but offer up desse Romi. milke and water mingled with hony. To these two childrenlying there in this fort, they write, there came a she Wolfe, and gaue them suck, and a Hitwaw also which did helpe to nourish and keepe them. Thefetwo beafts are thought to be confecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINS do fingularly honour and reuerence the Hitwaw. This did much helpe to give credite to the words of the mother, who affirmed she was conceined of those two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some thinke she was deceined in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce did rauish her. Other hold opinion that the name of the nurse which gaue the two children sucke with her breasts, gaue occasion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINS do call with one selfe name she Wolfes Lupas, and women that give their bodies to all comers: as this nurse the wise of Faustulus (that brought these children home to her house) did vseto do. By her right name she was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the Romaines do sacrifice yet vnto rentia Fau. this day: & the Priest of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the shedding of wine that mured & milk accustomed at Lurials, and the feast it selfe is called Laurentia. It is true that they honor the town. also another Laurentia for like occasion. The clerk or fexte of Hercules temple, nor knowing one The Greeke day how to drine away the time, as it should seeme: of a certaine line linessee and boldnesse, did rental defire the god Hercules to play at dice with him, with condition that if he did winne, Hercules should be bound to send him some good fortune and if it were his lucke to lose, then he promifed Hercules he would provide him a very good supper, & would besides bring him a faire gentlewoman to Iye withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearfed, the fexten first cast the dice for Hercules, and afterwards for himselfe. It fell out that Hercules wan, and the sexten meaning good faith, and thinking it very meet to performe the bargaine that himself had made, prepared a good supper, and hired this Laurentia the curdian, which was very faire, but as yet of no great Laurentia faine, to cometo it. Thus having feasted within the temple, and prepared a bed ready there, af- fest. ter supper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules should have come indeed, and lyen with Laurentia her. And it is said for troth that Hercules came thicker, and commanded her in the morning the her. And it is faid for troth, that Hercules came thither, and commanded her in the morning she should go into the market place, and salute the first man she met, & keep him euer for her friend. Which thing she performed, and the first man she met was called Tarrutius, a man of great Tarrutius. yeares, and one that had gathered together maruellous wealth and riches. He had no children at all, neither was he cuer maried. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, and loued her fo dearely, that shortly after chancing to die, he madeher heire of all he had :-whereof she disposed afterwards by her last will and testament, the best and greatest part vnto the people of Rome. Moreouer it is reported also, that she now being growne to be famous & of great honor (as thought to be the lemman of a god) did vanish away suddenly in the self same place where the first Lanremia was buried. The place at this day is called relabrum: because the river being overslowne, relabrum they were oftentimes compelled to paffe by bote to go to the market place, and they called this where fi maner of ferrying oner, Velatura. Other fay, that those tumblers and common players, which are Decad. shewed fundry games and passimes to win the fauour of the people, were wont to couer that passage ouer with canuas clothes & veiles, by which they go from the market place to the lists or show place where they run their horses, beginning their race even at that place; and they call a veile in their tongue, Velum. This is the cause why the second Laurentia is honoured at Rome. Faustulus chiefe neat-heard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children, and no body knew it, as some fay; or as others report (and likest to be true) with the privity and knowledge of Numitor Amulius brother, who fecretly furnished them with mony that brought vp the two yong children. It

Romalar & is faid alfothey were both connected vnto the city of the Garlans, where they were brought vp at schoole, and taught all other honest things, which they vse to teach the sons and children of good and Noble men. Further they fay, they were named Remus and Remulus because they were found fucking on the teats of a Wolfe. Now the beautie of their bodies did presently shew, beholding onely but their stature and maner of their countenances, of what nature and linage they were and as they grew in yeares, their manly courage increased maruellously, so as they became flout and hardy men, in so much as they were neuer troubled or astonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romalus had more wit and vnderstanding the his brother Remus. For in all things wherin they were to deale with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limits of their pastures, it was easily discerned in him, that he was borne to command, and not to obey. For this cause they were both exccedingly beloued of their companions, & of those which were their inferiors. As for the kings heardine, they passed not much for them, saying that they were euen like themselues, and so seemed not to care a pinne for their anger or displeasure, but wholly gaue themselves to all gentlemanly exercises and trades, thinking to line idly and at ease without trauell, was neither comely nor convenient: but to exercife and harden heir bodies with hunting, running, purfuing murderers and thecues, and to helpe those which were oppressed with wrong and violence, should be credit and commendation to them. By reason whereof, in very short time they grew to great fame and renowne. And it fell out by chance there arose some strife and variance betweene the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numeter: in to much as those that were Numitors, caried away by force fome cattell of the others. The other fide would not beare that, but purfued fast after, and beating them wel-fauoredly, they made them take their legs, and brought back againe the greatest part of the cattell they had carried sway with them. Whereat Numitor stormed maruelloufly, but yet his men feemed to make but litle account of it, and purpofing reuenge, they gathered about them a good company of vacabounds (that had neither home nor resting place) and certaine fugitiue bondmen which they entifed ill-fauouredly, incouraging them to steale away from their maisters. Thus one day whilest Romulus was busic about some facrifice (being a deuout man and religious, and well giuen to ferue the gods, and to learne to diuine and tell beforehand what things should happen and come to passe) it happened the heardmen of Numitor to meete Remus very flenderly accompanied: fo they fell vpon him fuddenly: blowes were dealt roundly on both fides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the endproued the stronger part, & tooke Remus by force, & caried him straight before Mumitor, alledging many complaints and matters against him. Numitor durst not punish him of his own authority, because he feared his brother Amelius, who was somewhat terrible:but went vnto him, and earneftly befought him to do him inflice, and not to fuffer him being his owne brother, to receive such injurie of his men. There was not a man in the city of ALBA, but did greatly mislike the iniury done to Namitor: and spake it openly, that he was no person to be offered fuch a wrong. Info much as Amutius moued herewith, did deliuer Remus into his hands, to punish him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitar caried him home with him. But when he had him in his house, he began to consider better of him, with admiratio how goodly a yong man he was, how in height and ftrength of body he passed all the rest of his people, and perceiuing in his face an affur d conftancy, and bold stedfass courage that yeelded not, nor was abashed for any danger he saw towards him: and hearing also the reports of his acts and man-Galapronie hood to be answerable to that he faw: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion, by some secret inspiration of the gods, which ordaine the depth of great matters) began partly by coniecture, and partly by chance to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his father and mother: speaking to him in a more gentle wife, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to answer, & be of better hope. Remns boldly answered him. Truly I will not hide the troth from thee, for thou feemest to be more worthy to be King then tion, accla- thy brother Amulius. For thou enquirest, and hearest first before thou condemnest: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill now we thought we had bene the chilbimelfe dren of two of the Kings servants, to wit of Faustilus and of Laurentia: I say we, because my bis trailer. brother and I are two twins. But feeing we are now falfely accused vnto thee, and by malicious furmised tales are wrongfully brought in danger of our lines: we intend to discouer our selues, and to declare ftrange things vnto thee, whereof the prefent perill we now ftand in, shal plainly more firangely, and in our tender yeares were fed by birds and wild beafts, to whom we were cast our as a prey. For a Wolfe gaue vs sucke with her teats, and an Hitwaw(they say) brought vs litle crimmes, and put them in our mouthes, as we lay vponthe banke by the river, where we were put in atrough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of copper, vpon the which are fome letters engrauen half worne out, which peraduenture will one day ferue for fome tokens of knowledge (unprofitable for our parents) when it shall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing these words, with the age the young man seemed Rumitors to be of, and confidering well his face, did not reject the hope of his imagination that finiled on wiedome. him, but handled the matter fo, that he found meanes to speake secretly with his daughter, notwithstanding arthat time she was kept very straightly. Faustalus in the meane time hearing that Remus was prisoner, and that the King had delinered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor todo inflice, went to pray Romalus to helpe him, and told him then whose children Fausulus they were for before he had never opened it to them but in darke speeches, and glauncing wise, remains the state of the st and fo much as fufficed to put them in some hope. So Faustulus taking the trough with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great halte, as maruelloufly affraid for the prefent danger he thought Remns in. The kings fouldiers which warded at the gates of the city, began to gather fome sufpition of Faustulus maner of coming: and he made himselfe to be the more suspected; being questioned with about the cause of his repaire thither, that he saltred in his words, besides they espied his trough which he caried under his cloke. Now amongst the warders, there was by chance one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be cast away, and was present when they were left on the banke of the river to the mercy of fortune. This man knew the trough by and by, as well by the fashion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who mistrufled ftraight that which was true indeed. So he did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, & led Fanftulus with him to have him confesse the troth. Faustulus being in this perplexity, could not keepe all close vpon examination, but did ytter out somewhat of the matter, and he told not all. For he plainely instiffed the children were aline; yet he faid they were farre from the city of Alba, where they kept bealts in the fields. And as for the trough, he was going to carry it to Ilia, because she had dinerse times praied him to let her see & feeleit: to the end the might be more affured of her hope, who promifed her that one day she should see her children againe. So it chanced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth Amulius vnto those that are troubled, and do any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to fend professional or the things was a year based man burn great friend of his bank. one presently (who in all other things was a very honest man, but a great friend of his brother Namitors) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aline. This perfon being come to Numitors house, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be wirnelle thereof, and of the good hap disconcred vnto Numitor: whereupon he perswaded him how to fet vpon hisbrother, & to dispatch the matter with speed. So from that time forwards, he tooke their part. On the other fide also the matter gaue them no leisure to deferre their enterprise, although they had bene willing: for the whole case was somewhat blowne abroad. So Romulus then got straight a power, and drew very neare the city, and many of the citizens of $A_{\rm LEA}$ went out to ioyne with him, who cither feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (ouer and befides those citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were divided by hundreds, and every hundred had his captaine who marched before his band, carrying litle bundels of graffe or of boughes tied to the end of their poles. The LATINES call these bundels Manipulos, whereof it cometh that yet at this day in an army of the ROMAINES, the fouldiers which are all vnder one enfigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus stirring vp those that were within the city, and Romalus bringing in men from without, the tyrant Amulius fell in such forward against the without provided. feare and agony, that without prouiding any thing for his fafety, they came vpon him suddenly in his pallace, and fluc him. Thus you heare how neare Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian do doubles Pepareth wonderfull foundation. Amulius being now flaine as before, and after that all things were appeafed and reduced to good order againe, Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the city of ALBA, being no Lords thereof, nor also would be Lords of it, so long as their grandfather by the mothers fide was aliue. Wherefore after they had reftored him to his estate, and had done the honour and duty they ought vnto their mother, they purposed to go and build a citic in those places where they had bene first brought vp, for this was the honestest colour they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced fo to do whether they would or not, for the great number of banished men, and fugitiue slaues which were gathered together by them for their strength, who had bene vitterly lost and cast away, if they had bene once discharged by them. Therefore it was of necessitie that they should dwell by themselues, separated in some place, to keepe this number together and in some order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the city of ALBA would not fuffer fuch banished persons and runagates to be mingled amongst them, nor would receive them into their city to be free among them. All which appeareth furficiently: first, because they tooke away women by force: and so not of insolency, but of necessity, when they found no man that would bestow any of them. It is manifest also they did greatly honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Purthermore, when their citie began a litle to be fetled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitives and afficted persons, which they called the temple of the god Asileus: where there was fanctuarie and fafety for all forts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the temple: for whom it was alledged, they could not deliner any bondman to his maiiter, nor detter to his creditor, nor the murtherer to the Iustice, that was fled thither for succour, because the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expresly eniouned them to grant sanctuarie to all those that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in short space their city slourished, and was replenished, where at the first foundation of it, they say there was not aboue one thousand houses, as more at large hereafter shall be declared. When they came now to the building of their citie, Romulus and Romus the two brethren fell suddenly at a strife together about the place where the city should be builded. For Romulus built Rome, which is called four fquare, and would needs it should remain in the place which he had chosen. Remus his brother chose another place very strong of situation, vpon mount Auentine, which was called after his name Remorium. and now is called Rignarium. Notwithstanding, in the end they agreed betweene themselues this controuersie should be decided by the slying of birds, which do give a happy divination of things to come. So being fet in diverse places by themselves to make observation, some say that there appeared vnto Remus fix, and to Romulus twelve vultures. Others fay that Remus truly faw fixe, and Romulus feined from the beginning that he faw twife as many . but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelve indeed vnto Romulus; and this is the cause why the ROMANES at this day in their diminations and fouthfayings of the flying of birds, do maruelloufly observe the flying of the vultures. It is true which the Historiographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth, that Hercules reloyced much when there appeared a vultur to him, being ready to begin any enterprise. For it is the fowle of the world that doth least hurt, and neuer marreth nor destroyethany thing that man doth fow, plant, or set: considering hat she feedeth on cario nonly, and doth neuer hurt nor kill any living thing. Also she dorh not prey vpon dead fowle, for the likeneffe that is betweenethem: where the cagles, the dukes, and the fakers, do murther, kill, and cate those which are of their owne kind. And yet as Achylus faith, Needs must that fowle accounted be most vile, Melt ravening and full of filthy mind, Which doth himfelfe continually defile, By preying still upon his proper kind.

Moreouer, other birds are alwayes (as a man would fay) before our eyes, and do daily shew themselues vnto vs. where the vultur is a very rare bird, and hardly to be seene, and men do not eafily find their ayries. Which hath given some occasion to hold a false opinion, that the vulturs are paffagers, and come into these parts out of strange countries. The prognosticators also thinke, that fuch things which are not ordinary, and but feldome feene, be not naturall, but miraculously fent by the gods to prognosticate something. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was very angrie with him. And when Romulus had casta ditch, as it were for the wall about his citie, Remus did not onely scorne it, but hindred also his worke, and in the end for a mockery leapt ouer his wall. To conclude, he did so much, that at the last he was flaine there by Romulus owne hands, as some say: or as other hold opinion, by one of his b Romulus owne hands, as some say: mca, which was called Celer. In this fight they flue Faustalus, and Plestinus also his brother, who or celer. had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howfocuer the matter fell out, this Celer absented himself from Rome, and went into the country of Thus cane. And they fay, that men which are quick and ready vpon a fodaine, took their names cuer after of him, & were called Celeres. As amongst other, Quintus Metellus after the death of his father, having in very few daies made the people of be called. Rome to see a combat of sencers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the sharpe, they surnamed him Questions Celer, for that the ROMANES maruelled how he could prepare his things in fo short a time. Furthermore, Romulus haning now buried his brother, & his other two bringers vp(called foster fathers) in the place they cal Remonia, began then to build & lay the foundation of his city, sending Remolar for menout of Thyscane, who did name and teach him particularly all the ceremonies he had laying the to observe there, according to their lawes & ordinances, as a great holy mystery. And first of all of Rome. they made a round ditch in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did cast their chiefest and best things, which men vse lawfully for good, and naturally as most necessary. After that they did throw also into it, a litle of the earth, from whence every man came, and mingled these all together. This ditch in their ceremonies is called the World, in Latine Mundus, euen The world. the selfe same name the Latines call the Vniversall. About this ditch they did trace the compasse of the city they would build, cuen as one would draw a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the city taketh a plough, to which he fastned a culter or plough share of brasse, & so yoaked in the plough an oxe and a cow, he himselfe holding the plough did make round about the compasse of the city a deep furrow. Those which followed him, had the charge to throw the turues of earth inward into the city, which the plough share raised vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrow thus cast vp was the whole compasse of their wal, which they call in Latin Pomærium, by shortning of the syllables, for post murum: to wit, after wall. But in the Pomærium place where they determined to make a gate, they did take off the plough share, and draw the why so called. plough, with leaving a certaine space vnbroken vp: whereupon the Romain s thinke all the compasse of their wals holy and sacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed Thewals and fanctified, they would have had a conscience through the to have brought in, or caried out by. of the city, any things necessary for the life of man, that had not bene pure and clean. Now they beleeue certainly, that this ceremony of the foundation of their city was made the one & twenty The feels of Aprillibecause the Romanes do yet keep that day holyday, & call it the feast of the natinity day of Romeisons of their country. On which day they did not in old time facrifice any thing that had life, as efteeming that day(which was the natiuity of their city) to be most meet to be kept cleane and pure fro being polluted or defiled with any bloud. Notwithstanding before Rome was builded they had another feast called the shephcards or heardmens holy day, which they did celebrate vpon the same day, and called it Palilia. Now at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the Ro- The season MAINS is cleane contrary to the GRECIANS: yet for all this, they hold opinion for certainty, that Pablia. the day on which Romulus fouded his city, was affuredly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada: that is to fay, the thirtieth day. On which there was feen an eclips of the Moon, which they so elips of firppose was observed by the Poet Animachus (born in the city of TEOs) in the thirteenth yeare the Moore of the fixt Olympiad Likewise in the time of Marcus Varro (a learned man, and one that had read as much of ancient stories as any Romaine) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great Phifoundation losopher and Mathematitian, who being given to the calculation of Astronomie for the delight of speculation only, wherin he was thought most excellent: it did fall out that Varro gaue Philospher him this question, to search out what houre and day the nativity of Romulas was; who gathered Taratius it out by certaine accidents, as they do in the refolutions of certaine Geometricall questions. For they fay, that by the self same science, one may tell before of things to come, and to happen The houre to a man in his life, knowing certainly the houre of his nativity: and how one may tell also the houre of his nativity, when by accidents they know what harh hapned to him all his life. Ta- mativitie may be calrutins did the question that Varrogaue him. And having throughly considered the aduentures, enlared by deeds, and gefts of Romalus, how long he lived, and how he died: all which being gathered and his accident conferred together, he did boldly judge for a certainty, that he was conceined in his mothers nativitie wombe, in the first yeare of the second olympiad, the three and twentieth day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Cheac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke by Tarn-

Anedipse in the morning, in which houre there was a whole eclips of the Sun: and that he was borne into the world, the 21. of the month of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the rifing of the Sun. And that Rome was begun by him on the ninth day of the moneth, which the ÆGYP-TIANS call Pharmuthi, and answereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betweene two and three of the clocke in the morning. For they will fay, that a city hath his revolution & his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man: & that they knew by the fituation of the stars, the day of her beginning & foundation. These things & such other like, peraduenture wil please the Readers better, for their strangenesse and curiosity, then offend or mislike them for their falsehood. Now after that he had founded his city, he first and formost did divide in two companies The Roman all those that were of age to cary armor. In every one of these companies there were three thoufand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: and they were called Legions, because they were forted of the chosen men that were pickt out amongst all the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which fignifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred counsellors of the best and honestest men of the city, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatur, as one would fay, the counsel of the ancients. So they were called Patricians, as some will say, the councell of the fathers lawfull children, which few of the first inhabitants could fliew. It may be, fome wil fay this name was given the of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the fanctuary of their city, which word they vse at this day in the self same fignification; as one that followed Enander into ITALY, was called Patron, because he was pitifull, and relected the poore and litle children, and fo got himselfe a name for his pity and humanity. But me thinks it were more like the troth to fay, that Romulus did call them fo because he thought the chiefest me should have a fatherly care of the meaner fort:considering alfoit was to teach the meaner fort, that they shold not feare the authority of the greater, nor enuv at the honors they had, but rather in all their causes should vsetheir fauour and goodwill, by taking them as their fathers. For eue at this prefent, strangers cal those of the Senat, lords or captaines: but the naturall Romans call them, Patres Conscription which is a name of father head and dignity without enuy. It is true, that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but fithence, because they were many joyned vnto the first, they have bene named Patres Conscription as a man should say, fathers of record together: which is the honorablest name he could have denisted to make a differece betwixt the Senators & the people. Furthermore, he made a difference between the chiefer citizens, and the baser people, by calling the better fort Patroni, as much to say, as defenders: & the meaner fort Clientes, as you would fay, followers, or me protected. This did breed maruellous great loue & good will among them, making the one much beholding to the other. by many mutual curtefies & pleasures; for the Patrons did help the Clients to their right, defended their causes in judgement, gaue vnto them counsell, & did take all their matters in hand. The Clients again enterchangably humbled themselues to their patrons, not only in outward honor & reuerence towards them, but otherwise did help them with mony to marry & aduance their daughters, or els to pay their debts and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no law nor magistrate that could compell the patron to be a witnes against his client: nor yet the client to witnes against his patron. So they increased and continued all other rights & offices of amity & friendship together, saving afterwards they thought it a great shame & reproch for the better & richer, to take reward of the meaner & poorer. And thus of this matter we have spoken sufficiently. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the city was laid, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauishment of women. There are some which lay it vpon Romalus, who being the of nature warlike, & giuento prophecies and answers of the gods, foretold that his city should become very great & mighty, so as he raised it by wars, & increased it by arms: & he sought out this colour to do mischief, and to make war vpon the SABYNS. To proue this true, some say he cau-Sabyne wo- sed certain of their maids by force to be taken away, but not past 30. in nuber, as one that rather fought cause of wars, then did it for need of mariages: which me thinks was not likely to be true, but rather I judge the contrary. For feeing his city was incontinently replenished with people of all forts, wher of there were very few that had wives, and that they were men gathered out of all countries, & the most part of them poore and needy, so as their neighbors disdained the much. and did not look they would long dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maids & rauishing the, to have an entry into alliance with the SARINS, & to entice the further to ioine with them in mariage, if they did gently intreat these wives they had gotten, enterprised this violent taking of their maids, and rauishing of them in such fort. First, he made it to becommonly bruted abroad in enery place, that he had found the altar of a god hidde in the ground, & craft about he called the name of the god, Confus: either because he was god of counsell, wherupon the Ro- ment of the MAINS at this day in their tong call Confilium, which we call counfell: and the chiefe Magistrats Sabyus of their city Confules, as we say counsellers. Other say, it was the altar of the god Neptune, surna- confus a med the patron of horses. For this altar is yet at this day within the great lists of the city, & euer god. couered and hidden, but whe they vie the running games of their horse race. Other say, because the god of the countries of th counsell euer must be kept close and secret, they had good reason to keepe that altar of this god horsemen. Confus hidden in the ground. Now other write, when it was opened, Romulus made a facrifice of wonderfullioy, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in diverse places, that at such a day there should be common playes at Rome, and a solemne feast kept of the god Consus, where all that were disposed to come should be welcome. Great numbers of people repaired thither from all parts. He himselfe was set in the chiefest seate of the shew place, apparelled faire in purple, & accompanied with the chiefe of the citie about him. And there having purposed this rauishment you have heard of, he had given the figne before: that the same should begin, when he should rife vp and fold a plaite of his gowne, and vnfold the same againe. Hereupon his men stood attending with their fwords: who so soone as they perceived the signe was given, with their swords drawne in hand, and with great shouts and cries, ran violently on the maids and daughters of the SABYNES to take them away and rauish them; and suffered the men to runaway, without do-tion of the ing them any hurt or violence. So some say, there were but thirty rauished, after whose names The number were called the thirty linages of the people of Rome. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that ther of the Sawere fine hundred & fenen and twenty; and Iuba, fix hundred fourescore and three. In the which byne work is fingularly to be noted for the comendation of Romulus, that he himselfe did take then but only one of the maids, named Hersilia: that afterwards was the only cause and mediation of peace Hersila betwixt the SABYNEs and the ROMAINS. Which argueth plainly, that it was not to do the Sa-BYNEs any hurt, nor to fatisfic any difordinate lust, that they had so forcibly undertakenthis rauishment: but to joyne two peoples together, with the straightest bonds that could be between men. This Hersilia as some say, was married vnto one Hostelius, the noblest man at that time amongst the Romaines: or as others write, vnto Romulus himselfe, which had two children by Romulus her. The first was a daughter, and her name was Prima, because she was the first the other was a first daugh fon who he named Aollius, because of the multitude of people he had assembled together in his prima. city, & afterwards he was furnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN Writeth, wher- Husonwas in notwithstanding there be diverse that do contrarey him. Among those which ravished the daughters of the SABYNES, it is faid there were found certaine meanemen carying away a marucllous paffing faire one. These met by chance on the way certaine of the chief of the city who would hauetaken her by force from them; which they had done, but that they began to cry, they carried her vnto Talasius, who was a young man maruellously well beloued of enery body. Which when the other vnderstood, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them:infomuch as there were fome which fodainly turned backe againe, and did accompany them for Talasius fake, crying out aloud, and often on his name. From whence the custome came, which to this day the Romains sing at their mariages, Talasius, like as the Grecians sing Hymeneus. For it is faid he was counted very happy that he met with this woman. But Sextins Sylla a why the CARTHAGINIAN borne, a man very wife, and well learned, told me once it was the cry & figne Romains. which Romulus gaue to his men to begin the ravishment: whereupon those that carried them a- do sing the way went crying this word Talasius, & that from thence the custome had continued, that they Talassius in fing it yet attheir mariages. Neuerthelesse the most part of authors, specially Iuba, thinkes it is a mariages. warning to remember the new married women of their worke, which is to spinne, which the GRECIANS call Talasia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And Talasia if it be true the Romaines vscd this terme of Talassia, as we of Grece do vsc, we might by coniecture yeeld another reason for it, which should carry a better likelihood and proofe. For when the SABYNES after the battell had made peace with the ROMAINS, they put in an article in fauor of the women in the treaty, that they should not be bound to serue their husbands in any other worke but in spinning of wooll. Euer fince this custome hath growne, that those which give their daughters in mariage, and those who leade the bride, and such as are present monie at at the wedding, speake in sport to the new maried wife, laughing, Talasius: in token that they do Rome.

not lead the bride for any other work or feruice, but to fpin wooll. Therof this hath bene the vfe to this day, that the bride doth not of her felfe come over the threshold of her husbands doore, but flie is hoifed pretily into the house; because the Sabyne women at that time were so lift vp. and caried away by force. They fay also, that the maner of making the shed of the new wedded wives haire with the yron head of a Iauclin came up then likewife: this flory being a manifest token that these first mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the swords points as we have written more at large in the booke, wherein we render & flew the causes of the Ro-MAINES fashions and customes. This rauishment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the moneth called Sextilis, and now named August: on which day they yet celebrate the feast they call consaira. Now the SABYNES were good men of war, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within inclosed wals: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did feare nothing, and as those who were descended from the LACED AMONI-ANS. Neuertheleffe they feeing themselues bound and tied to peace by pledges and hostages. that were very neare allied vnto them, & fearing their daughters should be ill intreated, sentambaffadors to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers & perswasions, that their daughters might be delivered vito them againe, without any force or violence, & then afterwards, that he would canfe the to be asked in mariage of their parents, as both reason & law would require to the end that with good wil & cofent of al parties, both peoples might contrast amity & alliance together. Wherunto Romulus made answer, he could not restore the maids which his people had taken away and maried: but most friendly he praied the Sabyns to be contented with their alliance. This answer being returned, & not liked, whilst the princes & community of the SABYNS Acron king were occupied in consultatio, & about the arming of the selections: Acron king of the Ceninenses (a man exceeding couragious & skilfull in wars, & one that from the beginning miftrufted the helb warre Ouer bold & stout enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, considering the late rauishmet with Roma- of the SABYN's daughters, and how he was already greatly dreaded of his neighbours, and fomwhat vntollerable, if he were not chaftifed and brought lower) first began to inuade him with a puissant army, & to make hot & violent wars vpon him. Romulus on the other side prepared also, & went forth to meet him. Whe they were come so neare together that they might see one another, they fet defiace to ech other, & praied that they two might fight man to man amidft their armics, & neither of theirs to flir a foot. Both of the accepted of it, & Romulus making his praier vnto Inpiter, did promise, & made a vow: that if he did give him the victory to our come, he wold offer vp to him the armor of his enemy, which he did. For first he flue Acron in the field, & after. wards gaue battell to his men, & ouerthrew them also. Lastly he tooke his city, where he did no hurt nor yet displeasure to any, saving that he comanded them to pull down their houses, & deftroy the & to go dwell with him at Kom E: where they should have the self same rights & priviledges which the first inhabitats did enjoy. There was nothing more inlarged the city of Rome the this maner of policy, to joyne alwaies vnto it those she had ouercome & vanquished, Romelus now to discharge his vow, and in such fort that his offring might be acceptable to Inpiter, and pleasant to his citizes to behold: did cut down a goodly straight grown yong oke, which he ligh. ted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lie: the fame he trimmed and fet forth after the maner of victory, hanging & tying all about it in faire order, the armor & weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gown to him, and putting upon his long bush of haire a garland of lawrel, laid the yong oke vpon his right shoulder, & he first marched before towards his city, and fung a royall long of victory, all his army following him in armes vnto the city in order of The begin- battell: where his citizens received him in all paffing wife and triumph. This noble and stately ming of rie entry euer fince hath given them minds in fuch fort, and in statelier wise to make their triumph. The offering of this triumph was dedicated to Inpiter surnamed Feretrian: because the Latine word Ferire fignification hurt and kill: and the praier Romalus had made, was he might hurt and Spolia opi- kill his enemy. Such spoiles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore faith Varro, that opes signifie riches. Howbeit me thinks it were more likely to fay, that they were so named of this word Opus, which betokeneth a deed, because he must needs be the chiefe of the army, that hath slaine with his own hands the Generall of his enemies, and that must offer the spoiles called Spolia opimanus onely ma, as you would fay, his principall spoiles and deeds. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captains only: of the which Romulus was the first, who flue Acron king of the CENINEN-SES. Cornelius Collus was the fecond, who killed Tolumnius, the General of the THVSCAHS, Clodius Marcellus

Marcellus was the third, who flue Britomartus, king of the Gavles, with his owne hands. And for the two last, Cossus and Marcellus, they made their entry into the city, carying their triumphs vpon charets triumphant: but Romulus did not fo. Therefore in this point Dionysius the historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into Rome vpon a charet triumphant. For it Tarquinius was Tarquinius Priscus the son of Demaratus, who first did set out triumphs in so stately and magnificent flew. Other hold opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that cuerentred vpon triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in Rome, carying in glaree. his triumph a foote. After this ouerthrow and taking of the ČENINENSES, the inhabitants of Filtria the cities of Fidena, Crystymerium, and Antemna, rose altogether against the Romains whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing themselves. So they fought a battell, in which they took the ouerthrow: & left their cities to the spoile of Romulus, their lands to be give where he thought good, and themselves to be caried to Rome. Romulus then did give their lands among of ememna his citizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maidens that they had ta- 1964 4 ken away & rauished. For he was contented that the fathers of them should keep still their lands. By and by the other SABINES from king therat, did chuse them a Generall called Tatius, and so went with a puillant army toward the city of Rome, whereunto to approch at that time it was bone ledby very hard, the castle or keepe of their city being seated where at this day the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great garrifon, wherof Tarpeins was captaine, & not his daughter Tar- the ons of phia, as some will fay, who set out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the captaines daughter, for the Tarpeia bedefire she had to have all the gold bracelets which they did weare about their arms, sold the fort trijeth the to the Saurns, & asked for reward of her treason, all they did weare on their lescarmes. Tatius blecalle, promifed them vnto her; and she opened them a gate in the night, by the which she did let all the in the sale in the collection of the collection of the sale in t SABYNS into the castle. Antigonus the was not alone, who said, he loued those which did betray, hims & hated the that had betrayed nor yet Cafar Augustus, who told Rymitalces the Thracian that he loued treason, but he hated traytors. And it is a common affection which we beare to wicked has Cafars while the common affection which we beare to wicked has Cafars while the cafars and can be can be can be can be can be cased to the case of the persons, whilest we stand in need of them: not valike for all the world to those that have need words of of the gall and poylon of venimous beafts. For when they find it, they are glad, & take it to ferue their turne:but after their turne is serued, & they have that they sought, they have the cruelty of tude. fuch beafts. So plaied Tatius at that time. For when he was gotten into the caftle, he commanded the Sabyns (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to giue her allthey ware on their left armes, & to do as he did: who taking from his own arme first, the bracelets which he ware, did cast it to her, & his target after; and so did althe rest in like fort, November infomuch as being borne down to the ground by the weight of bracelets and targets, she died as prefied to death vnder her burden. Neuerthelesse Tarpeius self was atteinted, & condemned also Tarpeia of treason, by Romulus order, as Iuba saith; it is set forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write now presed to otherwise of Tarpeia, taying she was the daughter of Tatius, Generall of the SAEYNS, & was forced by Romulus to lie with him, & how she was punished in this fort by her own father after her faid treason committed: those I say, amongst whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the Poet Simylus also doth dote most, who saith Tarpeia sold the Capitoll not to the SARYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom she was in soue: as in these verses doth appeare.

ROMVLVS.

Tarpeia, that mayde of foolish minde, Which neere unto the Capitoll did dwell, (In feruent flames of beaftly loue bebisnd, Wherewith the king of Gaules did make her swell) Caus'd stately Rome surprised for to be By enemies, as enery man may fee. And so through hope of his fidelity Betrayd her Syre, with all his family. And a little after, in speaking of the maner of her death, he saith also: Yet lo: the Gaules, those worthy men of might, Threw her not downe into the waves of Po, But from their armes, wherewith they wont to fight, They cast their shields woon her body fo, That she supprest with such an heavy waight, (Ih wofull maid) to death was (mootherd straight.

This maiden therefore being buried in the fame place; the whole hill was called afterwards Tarpeius after her name, which continued untill Tarquinius the King did dedicate all the place to Impiter: for then they caried her bones into some other place, and so it lost her name. Valetse is be that rocke of the Capitoll, which at this present time they call Rupes Tarpeia, from the toppe whereof they were wont in old time to throw downe headlong all wicked offenders. When the SARYNS now had gotten this hold, Romulus being exceeding wrath, fent them a defiance, and bad them battell if they durst. Tation throught refused not confidering if by mischance they were distressed, they had a fure refuge to retire vinto. The place betweene y two armies where the fight should be, was all round about enuironed with litle hils. So as it was plaine, the fight could not be but fharpe and dangerous, for the discommodiousnes of the place, where was neither ground for any to fly, nor yet any space for any long chase, it was of so smala compas. Now it fortuned by chance, the river of Tyber had overflowne the banks a few daics before, and there remained in it a deeper mind then men would have judged, because the ground was so plaine, and was even where the great market place of Roms standeth at this day. They could diftern nothing therof by the eye, because the vpper part of it was crusted, whereby it was the more ready for them to venter vpon, and the worle to get out, for that it did finke vnderneath. So the SABYN's had gone ypon it, had not Curtius danger bene, which by good fortune stayed them. He was one of the nobleft and valiantest men of the SARYNES, who being mounted vpona courser, went on a good way before the army. This courfer entring voon the crufted mud, and finking withall, began to plunge and struggle in the mire: whereat Curtius proued a while with the spurre to stirre him. and get him out, but in the end feeing it would not be, he left his backe, and faued himfelfe. The fame very place to this day is called after his name, Lacus Curtim. The SABYNS the scaping thus this danger, began the battell. The fight did grow very cruell, and endured fo great a while, the gine battell victory leaning no more to the one fide the to the other. There died in a finall space a great number of men, amongst whom Hestiliss was one, who as they say, was the husband of Hersilia, and grandfather to Hostilius that was king of Romain's ofter Numa Pompilius. Afterward there were (as we may think) many other encounters and battels betweene them howbeit they make mention of the last about all the rest, wherin Romulus had so fore a blow on his head with a stone, that he was almost felled to the ground, in so much as he was driven to retire a litle out of the battel. Vpon which occasion the Romaines gaue backe also, and drew towards mount Palatine, being driven out of the plaine by force. Remulus began now to recover of the blow he had receiued, and fo returned to give a new onfet, and cried out all he might to his fouldiers to tary, and thew their face again to their enemie. But for all his loud crying, they left not flying ftill for life. and there was not one that durst returne againe. Wherupon Romulus lifting up his hands straight to heauen, did most feruently pray vnto Iupiter, that it would please him to stay the flying of his people, and not fuffer the Romains glory thus to fall to their veter destruction, but to repaire it by his fauour againe. He had no fooner ended his prayer, but divers of his men that fled, began to be ashamed to slie before their King, and a sudden boldnesse came upon them, and their feare therwithall vanished away. The place they first staicd in was where as now is the temple of Inpiter Stator, which is as much to fay, as Inpiter the stayer, Afterwards gathering themselves together again, they repulfed the Sabins even to the place they calnow Regia, and vnto the temple of the goddelfe Veft. where both the battels being prepared to give a new charge, there did fill out before them a strange and incredible thing to ice, which stayed them they fought not. For of the SABYNE women whom the ROMAINES had rauished, some ran of the one fide, ofull boldnes ther of the other fide of the battels, with lamentations, cries, and shouts, stepping between their weapons, and among the flaine bodies on the ground, in f.ich fort that they feemed out of their wits, and caried as it were with fome spirits. In this manner they went to find out their fathers and their husbands, fome carying their fucking babes in their armes, other having their haire loose about their eyes, and all of them calling, now upon the Sabunes, now upon the Romaines, with the gentlest names that could be deuised which did melt the hearts of both parties in fuch fort, that they gave backe a litle, and made them place betweene both the battels. Then were the cries and lamentations of every one plainely heard. There was not a man there but it pitied him, as well to fee them in that pitifull cafe, as to heare the lamentable words they spake: adding to their most humble petitions and requests that could be any way imagined, pastfing wife perswafions and reasons to induce them to a peace. For what offence (say they) or what displeasure have we done to you, that we should deserve such an heape of enils, as we have the world of the short of the start of the short of already fuffered, and yet you make vs beares we were as you know violently (and against allaw) of Herfills and other rauished by those, whose now we remaine. But our fathers, our brethren, our mothers & friends Sabine wo. have left vs with them fo long, that proces of time, and the straightest bonds of the world, have tied vs now fo fast to them, whom mortally before we hated, that we are constrained now to be flighted thus, to fee them fight, yea and to lament and dye with them, who before vniustly tooke vs from you. For then you came not to our rescue when we were virgins vntouched, nor to recouer vs from them when they wickedly affaulted vs, poore foules: but now ye came to take the wines from their husbands, and the mothers from their litle children. So as the helpe ye thinke to giue vs now doth grieue vs more, then the forsaking of vs was sorrowfull to vs then. Such is the loue they hauebornevnto vs, and such is the kindnesse we beare against to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other cause then for vs, yet were it reason ye should let fall your armes for our fakes (by whom you are made grandfathers and fathers in law, cofins and brothers in law) euen from those against whom you now bend your force. But if all this war began for vs, we heartily befeech youthen that you will receive vs with your fons in law, and your ions by them, and that you wil restore vnto vs our fathers, our brethren, our kinsfolks & friends without spoiling vs of our husbands, of our children, and of our ioyes, and thereby make vs wofull captines and prisoners in our minds. These requests and persivasions by Hersilia, and other the Saryne women being heard, both the armies stayed, and held enery body his hand, and ftraight the two Generals imparked together. During which parle they brought their husbands Romaling and their children, to their fathers and their brethren. They brought meat and drinke for them that would cate. They dreffed vp the wounds of them that were hurt. They caried them home that, with them to their houses. They showed them how they have the shown that were hurt. with them to their houses. They shewed them how they were mistresses there with their husbands. They made them see how greatly they were accounted of and esteemed; yea how with a wedlocke lone and reputation they were honored. So in the end peace was concluded between Peacebethe, wherin it was articled, that the Sabyne women which would remaine with their husbands tween the should tarry still, and be exempted from all work or service (as aboue recited) saue onely spin-andibes. ning of wooll. And that the SABINES and ROMAINS should dwell together in the city, which bines. should be called Rome, after Romalus name; and the inhabitants should be called Quirites, after Ly, which the name of the city of Tatius king of the Sabanes, and that they should reigne and gonerne led. rogether by a common consent. The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this day Comitium: because that Coire, in the Latin tong fignifieth to affemble. So the city being aug- Comitium, mented, by the one halfe, they did chuse of the SABYNES another hundred new PATRICIANS, vato the first hundred of the ROMAINS that were chosen before. Then were the Legions made The Roof 6000, footmen, & 600, horsmen. After they divided their inhabitants into 3. tribes, wherof maine legion 600. those that came of Romulus, were called Ramnenses after his name: those that came of Tatius were for men & called Tasienses after his name: and those that were of the third stocke, were called Lucrenses, as 600. borsefrom the Latin word Lucus, called with vs a groue in English, because thither great nuber of people of al forts did gather, which afterwards were made citizes of Rome. The very word of Tribus mains (which fignifieth bands, wards, or hundreds) dorh witnes this beginning of Rome from wards or hundreds. For hercupon the Romains call those at this day, their Tribune, which are the chiefe heads of the people. But every one of these principall wards had afterwards ten other particular wards vnder them, which somethink were called after the names of the thirty Sanyn women that were ranished: but that seemeth false, because many of them carry the names of the places they came from. Howbeit at that time many things were stablished & ordained in honor Honouristof the women: as to give them place, the vpper hand in meeting them: the vpper hand in freets: to speake no foule or dishonest word before them, no man to vnray himself, or shew naked before them: that they should not be called before criminal Judges sitting vpo homicides & murderers: that their childre should we are about their necks a kind of iewel, called Bulla, fashioned in maner like these water bubbles that rise vpon the water when it beginneth to raine: & that their gownes should be garded with purple. Now the two kings did not straight confer together so soone as any occasion of businesse was offered them, but either of them did first counsell alone with his hundred Senators, and afterwards they did all affemble together. Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the temple of tuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this present, The staires of the faire bank, then, the descent of mount Palatine, as they go to the show place or great lifts, where palatine, as they go to the show place or great lifts, where palatine, as they go to the show place or great lifts, where they fay was fometime the holy Cornell tree, whereof they make fo great account. Romalus one corneltree day defirous to proue his strength, threw (as it is fayd) a dart from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine; the staffe whereof was of a Cornell tree: and the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground being a lustic fat foyle, that no man could pull it our, although many proued it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did so noul rish the end of this staffe, that it tooke root, and began to spread branches: so that in time it became a faire great Cornell tree, which the fucceffours of Romulus did inclose with a wall, and did keepe and worship it as a very holy thing. If by chance any went to see it, and found it looked not fresh and greene, but like a tree withcred and dried away for lack of moisture the went away straight as one affraid, crying to all he met (and they with him went crying still) in enery place. Water, water, as it had bene to have quenched a fire. Then ran they thither out of all quarters with veffels of water, to water and moist the tree. In the time of Caius Casar, who caused the staires about it to be repaired, they fay the labourers raising the place, and digging about this Cornell tree, did by negligence hurt the rootes of the same in such fort, as afterwards it dried vp altogether. Now the Sabynes received the moneths after the manner of the Romaines, whereof we have written fufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vsed the SABYNES shields:and both he and his people changed the fashion of their armour and weapons they vsed. For the ROMAINE's before did cary litle shields, after the fashion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy dayes and facrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them, which either the one or the other people observed before, but they added theranto Feaths, Mar fome other new. As that which they call Matronalia, which was inftituted in honour of the women, because by their meanes peace was concluded. And that also of Carmentalia, in the honour of Carmenta, whom some suppose to be the goddesse of fate or destiny, because she hath rule and power ouer the nativities of men; by reason whereof the mothers call vpon her often, and reuerence her very much. Other fay, the was the wife of Euander the ARCADIAN, who being a prophetesse inspired by the god Phabus, gaue the Oracles in verse; whereupon she was surnamed Carmenta, because that Carmina in Latine fignific verses: for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which give another maner of derivation and interpretation of this word Carmenta, which is the likelier to be true: as if they would fay, Carens mente. which fignifieth wanting wit, for the very fury that taketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirit. For in Latine Carere betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, signifieth wit. As for the feast of Palilia, we have told of it before: but the feast of Lupercalia, confidering the time of celebrating therof, it feemeth it is ordained for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate dayes of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging daies. The daies in the old time on which they did celebrate the fame, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feaft, is as much to fay, as the feast of Wolues. Wherefore it seemeth to be a feast of great antiquity, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Enander: albeit the name of Wolues is as common to the females, as the males, and to it might perhaps be called, by reason of the Wolfe that brought vp Romulus. For we fee those which run vp and downethe city that day, and they call Luperci, do begin their course in the very place where they say Romalus was cast out. Howbeit, many things are done, wherof the original cause were hard now to be coniectured. For goats about a certaine time of the yeare, are killed; then they bring two yong boyes, Noble mens fons, whose foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloud of the goates that are sacrificed. By and by they dry their foreheads with woll dipped in milk. Then the yong boies must laugh immediatly after they have dried their forheads. That done, they cut the goats skins, and make thongs of the, which they take in their hands, & run with the all about the city stark naked (fauing they have a cloth before their fecrets)& so they strike with these thongs all they meet in their way. The yong wives never shun them at all, but are well cotented to be striken with them, beleeuing it helpeth them to be with child, and also to be easily deliuered. There is another thing cians dofa- yet in this feast, that these Lypercians which run about the city, do also sacrifice a dogge. Concerning this feast, the Poet named Butto doth write somwhat in his elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond customes and ceremonies of the Romains, he doth fay, that Romulus Lupercians after that he had flaine Amulius, did runne straight with great ioy to the very place where the Wolfe gaue him and his brother fucke, in memorie of which running, he faith this feaft of Lusity naked, percalia was celebrated: and that the Noble mens younger sonnes do runne through the citie, striking & laying on the that they meet in their way with their goat thongs, in token that Remus & Romalus ran from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawn fwords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloudy knife, is in remembrace of the danger they stood in at that time to have bene slaine. Last of all, the drying of their forheads with wool, dipped in milk, is in memory of the milk they sucked of the Wolces. But Caius Acilius writeth that Remus & Romulus before Rome was built, did happen to lose their beasts on a day, and after they had made certain praiers vnto Faunus for the finding of the, they ranhere & there stark naked as they wet a feeking of the, for feare they shold have bin troubled with overmuch heat & sweating. And this is the cause he saith, why the Lvpercians do at this day run about naked. And if it betrue, they make this facrifice for a purging, a man might fay they might offer vp a dog for that purpose, as the GRECIANS in their facrifices of purgation, do vie to carry out all their dogs. And in many places they do observe this ceremony, to drive out the dogs, which they call Perisylacifmes. Otherwise, if it be of a thankfulnes to the Wolfthat gaue Romulus suck, & saued him fro perishing, that the Romains do solemnize this feast: it is not impertinent they should facrifice a dog, because he is an enemy to the Wolues. Vnlesse a man would say, it was to punish this beast which troubleth and letteth the Lypercians when they run. Some fay also it was Romulus, who first instituted it a religion to keep holy fire, & that first ordained holy virgins, which are called Vesta- The vestal les: other do ascribe it to Numa Fompilius. Notwithstanding it is most certain otherwise, that Romulus was a very deuout man, & greatly skilful in telling of things to come by the flying of birds fine aby for which cause he did ordinarily cary the augurs crooked staffe, called in latin Littus. It is a rod Romelus. crooked at y end, wher with the augurs or foothfaiers whe they fit down to behold the flying of Lituus. birds, do point out & mark the quarters of the heaven. They carefully kept it within the pallace: howbeit it was lost in the time of wars with the GAVLES, when the city of Rome was taken. Afterwards when these barbarous people were chased & driue out, it was found again (as it is faid) all whole, within a great hill or heape of ashes, having no maner of hurt, where all things else about it had bin confumed & marred with the fire. He is faid to have made certain lawes, among Romalia which there is one that feemeth formwhat hard, which is that the man is suffered to put away his laws. wife, & in some case to give her nothing: & like liberty is not given to the wife to put away her hesband. As if the may be proued to have conferred to the poiloning of her children, or to have counterfeited her husbads keys, or to haue comitted adultery. But if he put her away for any other cause, then the one half of the goods is adjudged to the wife, & the other moity to the goddes Geres: & he that putteth away his wife after this fort, is comunded further to facrifice to the goddes of the earth. This also was notable in Romulus, who having ordained no pain nor punishmet for parricides (that is, for those that kil their parents) called yet al murther parricide, to shew how detestable that murder was; and as for parricide, he thought it vnpossible. And it seemed a great while, he had reaso to think so, that such wickednes wold neuer happe in the world. For in 600. years together it was not known that any man in Rome comitted fuch an offence, and the Ropari. first parricide with them was Lucius Ostius, after the wars of Hannibal. But enough touching this cide known in Rome matter. Furthermore in the first yeare of the raigne of Tatius, some of his kinsmen & friends met 600, years by chance on the way certain ambassadors, coming from the city of LAVRENTVM VIIto Rome, together, who they set upon, & meant to have robbed the. The ambassadors resisting the, & not willing to deliuer their mony, they made no more ado, but flue them. This hainous deed being thus comitted, Romulus was of opinio they shold be executed openly in the high way for example. But Ta. Stehinger tius deferred it still from day to day, & did alwaies excuse the matter vnto him, which was the only cause they sel out one with the other. For in all things else, they caried themselves as honestly Ambassa. as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a comon confent & good dours stains to accord. But the parents and kinsfolkes of those who were murdered, when they saw they could Rome. have no inflice because of Tains, watched him one day as he facrificed with Romulus, in the city haue no inflice because of Tatius, watched him one day as he tacrificed with Romalus, in the city of Lauiniñ. & stabbed him in, without offering Romalus any violence, but rather praised him for of Tatius in a good & righteous prince. Ronsulus caused the body of Tatius to be straighttaken vp, & buried Lauminm. him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place now called Armilustriu. Further he neuer shewed any countenance to reuenge his death. There are some Historiographers that write, and that those of the city of Laurent u being affraid at this murder, did deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambassadours. He notwithstanding did let them go againe, saying: one murther was requited by another. This gaue some occasion of speech to thinke, he was glad he was rid of his copanion: yet the Sabynes neither stirred nor rebelled for all this, but some of the were afraid of him for y great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honor they gaue him as a god, continuing still in duty and obedience towards him. Divers strangers also had Romulus valiancy in great honor: as amongst other, those who then were called the ancient Latins, which fent ambassadors to him to make league & amity with him. He deuised to take the city of FIDENA which was neare to Rome. Some fay he tooke it vpon a sudden, hasocke she sin uing fent before certaine horfmen to break downe the hookes and hinges with force, which the gates hang by: & himself came after with the rest of his army, & stole vpon them, before the city mistrusted any thing. Other write that the FIDENATES first inuaded his country, and foraged vnto the very fuburbes of Rome, where they did great harme: & how Romulus laid an ambush in their way as they returned home. & flue a great number of them. When he took their city, he did not raze it, but made a colony of it (as a place to fend the ouer-increase of Rome vnto) whither he fent afterwards two thousand fine hundred Romains to inhabit there and it was on the 13.day of Aprill, which the ROMAINES call the Ides of the same moneth. Not long after there rose such a great plague in Rome, that men died suddenly, & were not sicke: the earth brought forth no fruit; brute beafts deliuered no increase of their kind: there rained also drops of bloud in Rome, as they fay. In so much as besides the euils men felt in this extremity, they fel in a maruellous feare of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiuing the like hapned to the inhabitants of LAVRENTYM, then every man judged it was the very vengeance and heavy hand of the gods: who plagued and punished these two cities for the murder committed vpon Tatim, and the ambaffadors that were killed. Wherupon the murderers of both fides were apprehended & executed: & these plagues by & by ceased both in the one and the other city. Romulus besides, did purifie the cities with certain facrifices that he deuised, which they keep still at this day, at the gate called Ferentia. But before the plague ceassed, the CAMERIANS came to assult the ROMAINS and had ouercome all the country, supposing they should not be able to withstand the because they had bene fo fore troubled with the plague. Yet not with standing, Romulus fet vponthem with his army, & wan the field of them, in which conflict there were flaine about fixe thousand men. After the battell done, he tooke their city, and conucied to Rome the one halfe of the inhabitants that remained. After this he fent twife as many Romains as there were naturall Ca-MERIANS left at CAMERINE, to dwell there among the. This was done the 1.day of August: fo great was the multitude of the inhabitants of Rome that had increased in 16. years from the first foundation of the city. Among other spoiles he got there, he caried away a charret of brasse with foure horses, which he caused to be set up in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne statue vpon it, and victorie crowning him with a garland triumphant. His power being growne thus great, his weake neighbors did submit themselves vnto him, being contented to live in peace by him. His stronger neighbors were afraid of him, and enuicd much his greatnes, and did take it no good policie to fuffer him thus to rife in the face of the world, and thought it meet speedily to daunt his glorie, and clippe his wings. The first of the Thys canes that bent their power against him, were the VETANS, who had a great countrey, and dwelled in a strong and mightie city. To picke a quarrell to him, they fent to have delivered to them the city of FIDENA. which they faid belonged vnto them. This was thought not onely vnreasonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, confidering that all the while the FIDENATES were in war and danger, the THYSCANES never came to their aide, but had suffered them to be flaine, and then came to demand their lands and tenements, when other had possession of them. Therefore Romulus hauing giuen them an answer full of mockerie and derifion, they deuided their power into two armies, and fent the one against them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went against the city of Fidena, prevailed, and killed there two thousand ROMAINES: the other was overthrowne and discomfitted by Romulus, in which there died eight thousand VEIANS. Afterwards they met againe somwhat neare the city of the FIDENA-TES, where they fought a battell, and all did confesse, the chiefest exploite was done by Romu. The incre- lus owne hands that day, who shewed all the skill and valiantnes that was to be looked for in a worthy captaine. It feemed that day he farre exceeded the common fort of men, in strength of body and feats of armes. Neuerthelesse that which some say, is hardly to be credited and to be plaine is out of all compasse of beliefe and possibilitie. For they write, there were 14.thousand men flaine at that battell and that more then halfe of them were flaine by Romulus owne hands:

and the rather, for that every man judgeth it a vaine bragge and oftentation which the MESSE-NIANS report of Aristomenes, who offered in facrifice to the gods three hundred beasts of victory, as for fo many LACED EMONIANS himselfe had slaine in the battell. Their army being thus broken, Romulus Suffered them to flie who by swiftnes could faue themselues, and marched with all his power in good array towards their city. The citizens the confidering their late great loffe and ouerthrow, would not hazard the danger of withstanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition and suit for peace. All was granted them for a hundred yeares, saue Romulus they should forgo their territory called Septemagium, that was the seventh part of their country: materi and yeeld to the Romains all their falt houses by the rivers side, and deliver siftie of their chiefeff citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entry & triumph into Rome for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the same moneth, leading in his triumph many prisoners také in those wars: & among other, the Generall of the VEIANS, a very ancient man, who fondly behaued himfelfe in his charge, and shewed by his doings, that his experience was farre short for his yeares in the warres. And from thence it cometh, when they offer to the gods to give thanks for this victory, that even at this day, they bring to the Capitol through the market place, an old man apparelled in a purple robe, and with a iewell called Bulla about his ncck, which the gentlemens yong children weare about their necks: and a herald goeth hard by him, crying, Who buyeth who, the SARDIANIANS? because they hold opinion the THVScans are come of the Sardianians, and the very city of VEIEs standeth in the country of THYSCANE. This was the last war that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almost to all those, who by sudden prosperity & fortunes Prosperite speciall fauour, are raised to high and great estate. For trusting to prosperity and good successed interests of his acts he began to grow more france and farely and good successed pride and of his acts, he began to grow more strange and stately, and to carrie a sowrer countenance then formathe. he was wont to do before: leauing to be after his old maner, a courteous & gracious prince: and gaue himselfe in fashions to be somewhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and stately port and maiesty that he caried. For he ware euer a coate of purple in graine, and vpon that, a long robe of purple colour: and gaue audience, fitting in a wide chaire of effate, having euer about him yong men called celeres, as we would fay, flights, for their fwiftnes and speed in executing of his celeres Rocommandements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were tipstaues in malin their hands, to make the people give roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to bind goard. fast streight, all the prince should command. Now in old time the LATINS said, Ligare was to bind: but at this present they say Alligare, from whence it cometh that the vshers and sergeants are called Lictores. Howbeit me thinkes it were more likely to fay, they had put to a c, and that Lictores. before they were called Litores, without a c. For they be the very same which the CRECIANS wherefore call Liturgos, and be in English, ministers or officers: and arthis day, Leitos, or Leos in the GREEK Societa. tong fignifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numitor was dead at the city of Alba, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to win the fauor of the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Common weale, and enery yeare did chuse a new magistrate, to minifter instice to the SABYNES. This president taught the noble men of Rome to seeke and desire to have a free estate, where no subject should be at the commandement of a King alone, and the king where every man should command and obey as should be his course. Those which were called dome of the house Patricians in Rome, did meddle with nothing but had only an honorable name & robe, & were man weale. called to counsell rather for a fashion, then to have their advice or counsell. For when they were affembled together, they did only heare the Kings pleasure & commandement, but they might not speak one word, and so departed having no other preheminence ouer the comon wealth, lauing they were the first that did know what was don. Al other things therby did grieuethe lesse. But when of his own meere authority, & as it were of himfelf, he would as pleafed him, beftow the conquered lands of his enemies to his foldiers, & restore again to the VBI ANS their hostages as he did:therein plainely appeared, how great injury he did to the Senate. Whereupon the Senators were suspected afterward that they killed him, when within few daies after it was said, he vanished away so strangely, that no man euer knew what became of him. This was on the seueth Romalus day of the moneth now called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no maner of certainty els of his death that is knowne, faue only of the day & the time when he vanished, as we haue faid before. For on that day the Romains do at this present many things, in remebrance by of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his death was not knowne: feeing Scipio Africanus was found after supper dead in his house, and no man day of July could tell nor yet did know how he died. For some say, that he fainted and died sodainly, being mated by to of weake complexion. Other say he poisoned himselfe other think his enemies did get secretly in the night into his house, and smothered him in his bed. Yet they found his body layed on the ground, that enery body might at leifure confider, if they could find or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vanished away sodainly, there was neither seene peece of his garments, nor yet was there foud any part of his body. Therfore fome have thought that the whole Divers opi- Senators fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in pecces, eucry one caried away a peece of him, folded close in the skirt of his robe. Other think alfo, this vanishing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the presence of the Senators onely: but they fay that Romulus was at that time without the city, neare the place called The goates marsh, where he made an oration to the people, and that fodainly the weather changed, and o. uercaft forerribly as it is not to be told nor credited. For first, the Sun was darkened as if it had bene very night: this darknes was not in a calme or still but there fell horrible thunders boiste. rous winds, and flashing lightnings on every fide, which made the people run away, and scatter here and there, but the Senatours kept still close together. Afterwards when the lightning was past and gone, the day cleared vp, and the element waxed faire as before: then the people gathered together againe, and fought for the King, asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not fuffer them to enquire any further after him, but counselled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen; and that thenceforth in flead of a good King, he would be vnto them a merciful and gracious god. The meaner fort of people (for the most part of them) took it well, and were very glad to heare therof, and went their way worshipping Romu. lus in their hearts, with good hope they should prosper by him. Howbeit some seeking out the troth more eagerly, did cumber fore and troubled the PATRICIANS, accusing them, that they abused the comon people with vaine & fond perswasions, whilst theselues in the meanetime had murdered the king with their own hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, some say there was one Iulias Proculus, the nobleft of all the PATRICIANS, esteemed for a maruellous hones man, and knowne to have bene very familiar with Romelus, and came with him from the city of ALBA: that stepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greatest and holiest other) man might fweare) that he had met Romulus on the way, far greater and fairer, then he had feene him euer before, and armed all in white armor, shining bright like fire: whereat being affraid in that fort to fee him, he asked him yet: O King, why haft thou thus left and forfaken vs. that are fo fallly accused and charged to our vtter discredite and shame, by thy vanishing? To whom Romulus gaue this answer: Proculus, it hath pleased the gods from whom I came, that I should remaine among men so long as Idid: and now having built acity, which in glory and greatnesse of empire shall be the chiefest of the world, that I should return again to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therfore be of good comfort, and tell the Romaines, that they exercifing prowesse and temperancie, shall be the mightiest and greatest people of the world. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus These words seemed credible to the Romans, as wel for the honesty of the man that spake vnto them, as for the solemne othes he made before them all. Yet I wote not how, some celestiall motion, or divine inspiration helped it much: for no man faid a word against it. And so all sufpition and accusation laid aside, every man began to call vpon Quirinus, to pray vnto him, and to worship him. Truly this taleis much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Aristeas the Proconnesian, & of Cleomedes the Astypalaian. For they say, that Arises died in a fullers work ont of mens house, and his friends coming to carrie away his body, it fell out they could not tell what be came of it: and at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his way towards the city of CROTONA. It is faid also that Cleomedes was more the a man naturally strong & great, & therewithall mad, & furious ha sty. For after many desperat parts he had plaid, he came at the last on a day into a schoolehouse full of litle children, the roofe where f was borne with one pillar, which he did hit with fo terriout of mens ble a blow of his fift, that he brake it in the midst, so as the whole roofe fell & dashed the poore children in peeces. The people ran straight after him to take him: but he threw himselfe forth with into a chest, and pulled the lid vpon him. He held it so fast down, that many striuing toge ther all they could to open it, they were not able once to stir it. Wher upon they brake the chest all in peeces, but they found the man neither quick nor dead. Whereat they were maruelloufly amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the prophetesse answered them in this verse: Cleomedes the balt of demy gods.

The report goeth alfo that Alemenes corfe did vanish away, as they caried it to buriall, and how Alemenes instead therof they found a stone laid in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other such wonders, that are farre from any appearance of troth: only because they would make men to be as affile here. gods, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reproue and deny divine power, it were a lewd and wicked part: euen so to compare earth and heauentogether, it were a meere folly. Therefore we must let such fables go, being most certaine that, as Pindarus saith, it is true:

Each living corps must reeld at last to death, Ind enery life must leefe his vitall breath: The foule of man, that onely lines on hie, And is an image of eternitie.

The Coule

For from heaven it came, and thither againe it doth returne, not with the body, but then foonest, when the foule is furthest off and separated from the body, and that she is kept holy, and is no more defiled with the flesh. It is that the Philosopher Heraclitus meant, when he said: The dry light, is the best foule which slieth out of the body, as lightning doth out of the cloud: but that the faile faile folio. which is joyned with the body being full of corporall passions, is a grosse vapor, dark and massie, and cannot flame, arise or shoot out like lightning. We must not believe therefore, that the bodies of noble and vertuous men, do go vp together with their foules into heauen, against the order of nature. But this we are certainly to beleeue, that by the vertues of their foules (according to dinine nature and inflice) they do of men become faints, and of faints halfe gods, and of halfe gods, entire and perfect gods: after that they are perfectly (as it were by facrifice of purgation) made cleane and pure, being delinered from all paine and mortality, and not by any civill ordinance, but in troth and reason, they receive a most happy and glorious end. Now touching Romulus furname, which afterwards was called Quirinus, fome fay, that it fignifieth as much as warlike: other thinke it was so called because the Romain Es themselves were called Quirites. Furthermore it is an vse amongst men, to honor them with a speare or dart, which have shewed themselves valiant in the wars: and that for this cause Romulus was surnamed Onirinus, as who would say, god of the speares & wars. There was since built a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and so named of him. The day whereon he vanished, is called the flying of the people, or otherwise the Nones of the goates. None cap-For on that day they go out of the city to do facrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the goats sating. marsh: and the Romaines call a goate, Capra. As they go thus together, they call with lowd showtes and cryes upon diverse Romaines, as Marcus, Cnews, and Gains, intoken of the flying that was then: and they called one another back againe, as they ran away in great feare and disorder. Howbeit other say, that it is not done to shew the running away, but to shew their fpeed and diligence, and refer it to the flory. Now after the GAVLES that had taken Rome were expulsed by Camillus, y city was so weakned, that they could scant recouer their force & stregth againc: wherefore many of the LATINES ioyning together, went with a great mighty army, vn- The war of der the conduct of Linius Posthumius, to war against the Romains - This Posthumius brought his the Launes, camp as pearer the city of Rounds the could and contract the Romains by Atlanta Linius camp as neare the city of Rome as he could, and sent to the Romains by a trumpet to let them possibilities vnderstand, how the LATINS were desirous by new mariages to restore their old ancient amity General. and kindred that was neere hand decayed between them: and therfore if the Romaines would fend them a convenient number of their daughters and yong widowes to mary with them, they would have peace, as they had before time with the SABYNES, vpon the like occasion. The Ro-MAINS hereat were fore troubled, thinking that to deliuer their women in fuch fort, was no better then to yeeld and submit themselues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a waiting maid called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gaue the counsell to do neither the one nor Philotis the other, but to vie a policy with them, by means whereof they should scape the danger of the waining wars, and should also not be tied nor bound to any pledge. The device was, they should fend to main fulthe LATINES her selfe, and a certaine number of their fairest bond-maids, trimmed vp like gentlewomen, and the best citizens daughters, and that in the night she would lift them vp a burning torch in the airc, at which figne they should come armed, and set vpon their enemies as they lay afleepe. This was brought to passe: and the LATINS thought verily they had benethe Ro-MAINS daughters. Philotis failed not in the night to lift vp her figne, and to shew them a burning torch in the top of a wild fig-tree: and did hang certaine couerlets and clothes behind it, that the enemics might not see the light, and the Romaines contrariwise might discerne it the better. Thereupon fo foone as the ROMAINE's faw it, they ran with all speed, calling one another by their names, and issued out of the gates of the city with great hast and so tooke their enemies vp on a sudden, and flue them. In memory of which victory, they do yet so lemnize the feast called the Nones of the goats, because of the wild fig-tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they do feast the women without the city, vnder shadowes made of the boughes of fig-trees. The waiting maids, they run vp and down, and play here and there together. Afterwards they feeme to fight, and throw stones one at another, as then they did when they holpe the Romains in their fight. But few writers do anow this tale, because it is on the day time that they call so each other by their names, and that they go to the place which they call the goats marsh, as vnto a sacrifice. It feemeth this agreeth better with the first history when they call one another by their names in the night, going against the LATINES: vnlesse peraduenture these two things after many years happened vpon one day. Furthermore, they fay Romulus was taken out of the world, when he was foure and fiftie yeares of age, and had reigned eight and thirty yeares by accompt.

THE COMPARISON OF

Plato in

Hus haue we declared all things of Thefeus & Remulus worthy memory. But to compare the one with the other: it appeareth first, that Thefew of his own voluntary wil, without compulsion of any (when he might with fafety haue reigned in the city of TROEZEN, and fucceeded his grandfather in no small kingdome) did desire of himselfe, and rather sought meanes to aspire to great things: and that Romulus on the other side, to deliuer himfelf from bondage and seruitude that lay sore vpon him, and to escape the threatned punishment which still did hang ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato faith) to shew himselfe hardy for feare:who feeing how extremely he was like to be handled, was of very force constrained to feek aduantage, and hazard the enterprise of attaining high and great things. Moreover the chiefest act that ener he did, was, when he flue one onely tyrant of the city of Alba called Anulius: where Thefeus in his journy only, as he trauelled, gaue his mind to great enterprifes, and flue Sciron, Scinnis, Procrustes, & Corrnetes. And by ridding them out of the world, he delivered GRECE of all those cruell tyrants, before any of those knew him whom he had deliuered from them, Furthermore, he might have gone to Athens by sea, & neuer needed to have travelled, or put himfelfe in danger with these robbers, considering he neuer received hurt by any of them: whereas

Romalus could not be in safety whilest Amulius lived. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Thefeus vnprouoked by any prinat wrong or hurt received, did fet vpon these detestable thieues and robbers: Remus and Remulus contrariwife, fo long as the tyrant did them no harme, did fuffer him to oppresse and wrong all other. And if they alledge, these were noble deeds, and worthy memory: that Romalus was hurt fighting against the SAEYNES, and that he flucking Acron with his owne hands, and that he had ouercome and subdued many of his enemies: the for Thesess on the other figurary be objected, the battel of the Centauri, the wars of the Amazons, the tributed ueto the king of CRETAS how he ventured to go himselfthither with the yong boies & wenches of A-THENS, as willingly offering himselfto be deuoured by a cruell beast, or elsto be slain, & sacrificed vpo the tomb of Androgew, or to become bondslave & tied in captivity to the vile service of cruel men & enemies, if by his courage & manhood he could not deliner himself. This was such an act of magnanimity, inflice & glory, & briefly of so great vertue, that it is vnpoffible truly to be fet out. Screly me thinks the Philosophers did not ill define loue, when they said she was a seruitour of the gods, to faue yong folkes, whom they thought meet to be preferued. For, the loue of miniter of Arisdne was in mine opinion the work of some god, and a meane purposely prepared for Theseus the gods. fafety. Therfore the woman is not to be reproched nor blamed for the love she bare Theseus, but rather it is much to be wondred at, that every man & woman in like wise did not love him. And if of her felf she fell in lone with him, I say (and not without cause) she afterwards deserued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her own nature loued valiantnes and honor, & entertained men of fingular value. But both Thefeus & Romulus being naturally given to rule & reigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a king, but both of them did degenerate alike: the one changing himself into a popular man, the other to a very tyrant. So that by fundry humors, they both fell into one mischiefe and error. For a prince about all things must keep his estate: which Theospees is no lesse preserved by doing nothing vncoly, then by doing all things honorably. But he that is aprince, more sense or remisse then he should be, remaineth now no more a king or a prince, but becommeth a people-pleaser, or a cruell tyrant: & so causeth his subjects to despise or hate him. Yet me thinkes the one is an error of too much pitty and basenesse: and the other of too much pride and crucky. But if we may not charge fortune with all mischances happening vnto men, but that we ought to consider in them the diversities of maners & passions, seeing anger is vnreasonable, and wrath rashand passionate: then can we not cleare the one, nor excuse the other of extreme rage and passion, in the fact committed by the one against his brother, and by the other against his naturall fon. Howbeit the occasion and beginning of anger doth much excuse Theseus, who moued with the greatest cause that might be, was put into such choler and passion. But if Romulus variance with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counfell, or cause of the common-weals: there is none fo fimple to think, that his wildome would fo fuddenly haue fet vpon him. Where as The seus in contrary maner killed his son, prouoked by those passions that few men can avoid: to wit, loue, icalousic, and false report of his wife. Moreouer Romalus anger went to the effect, wherof the iffue fell out very lamentable: The feus anger stretched no further the to rough words and old folks curses in their heat. For it seemeth, cursed fortune, and nought els, was the cause of his fons only mishap, as forespoken and wished for somwhat by his father. These be the speciall things may be alledged for Thefeus. But for Romulus this was a notable thing in him. First his beginning being very low and mean, and his brother and he taken for bondmen, & the children of hogheards, before they were themselves all free, they set at liberty in maner all the Latins, winning at one inftant many titles of glory and honour:as destroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of new cities, and no ouerthrowers of the old: whereas preferred Thefeus of many habitations and houses made only one, and did ouerthrow and plucke downe before The. diners states, bearing the names of ancient kings, princes, & halfgods of Attica, All these also fem. did Remulus afterward, & compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to destroy their own houses, and to come and dwell with their conquerors. And in the begining, he never changed nor increased any city that was built before, but built himself a new city out of the ground, getting all together, land, coutry, kingdoe, kindred & mariages, without lofing or killing any man: and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrey, land, nor houses, and defired nothing else but to make a people amongst them, and to become citizens of some city. Also Romulus bent not himself to follow thecues and robbers, but subdued by force of armes many mighty and puitfant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer kings certainely knowne of whose hands he died. The most part of Authors do charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus deliuered his mother from apparent death, & restored his grandfather to the royall throne of Aneas, who before was deposed and brought from a king to feruile obcdience, without any regard of honour or dignity: to whom he did many moe great pleasures and services. Besides he never offended him willingly, no not so much as ignorantly. Contrary I thinke Thelew, who failing by negligence to put out his white faile at his eturne, cannot be cleared of parricide, how cloquent an oration focuer could be made for his excuse: yea though it were before the most fauourable judges that could be. Wherfore an ATHE-NIAN very well perceiuing that it was an hard thing to excuse and defend so soule a fault, doth faine that the good old man Ageus having newes brought him that his fonnes ship was at hand, did runin so great hast to his castle, to see his son arrive afar off, that as he ran, his soot hit against fomething, and ouerthrew him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man feeing him run fo haftily to the fea fide, did make hafte to attend and waite vpon him. Far-did so knit and toyne in one the set wo nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutual loue which grew afterwards betwixt those two peoples, & consequently of the ioining of their powers rogether. Furthermore, time hath giuen a good testimony of the loue, reuerence, constancy, nations liued peaceably, and in equality, vnder one citill policy, and well gournned common-weale. The ATHENIAN'S contrariwife, by Thefeus mariages, did get neither lone nor kindred of any one person, but rather they procured wars, enmittees, and the flaughter of their citizens, with the loff: in the end of the city of APHIDNES: and yet very hardly, and by the mercy of their encmies (whom they honored as gods) they escaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the selfeact done by Alexander Paris. So it fel out at the last, that his mother was not onely in danger, but even feelingly fuffered like mifery and captivity, which Hecuba did

THE LIFE OF

Mancannot speake any thing at all of Lyeurgus, who made the lawes of the LACED ÆMONIANS, but he shall find great contrariety of him amongst the historiographers. For, of his parentage and trauell out of his country, of his death and making of lawes, of his forme of gouernment and order of executing the same, they have written diversly. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worst about the time heliued in. For some of them (and Aristotle is of that number) will needes have him to have bene in the time of Iphytus, and that he did helpe him to stablish the ordinance that all warres should ceasse during the feast of the games Olympicall: for a testimony wherof, they alledge the copper coyt which was vied to be throwne in those games, and had found grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compring the dayes and time of the fuccession of the kings of LACED EMON (as Eratoftenes & Apollodorus) say, he was many yeares before the first Olympiade. Timeus alfo thinketh ther were two of this name, and in diverfe times: how beit the one having more estimation then the other, men gaue this Lyeurgus the glory of both their doings. Some fay the eldest of the twaine was not long after Homer and fome write they faw him . Xenophon sheweth vs plainely he was of xenophon great antiquitie: faying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were nearest of bloud by de- bbde Linescent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon meant not those Heraclides, which descended from Herademon rep. cules felfe: for the laft kings of Sparta were of Hercules progeny, as well as the first. Therefore of the He. he meaneth those Heraclides, which doubtlesse were the first and nearest before Hercules time. raclides, Neuerthelesse though the historiographers haue written diversly of him, yet we will not leave Paulanias. to collect that which we find written of him in ancient histories, and is least to be denied, and Climen. by best testimonies most to be proued. And first of all, the Poet Simonides sayth, his father was Strem. lib. 1 called Prytams and not Eunomus. and the most part do write the pedigree otherwise, as well of Lycurgus felfe, as of Euromus. For they fay, that Patrocles the fonne of Aristodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begate Prytanis, and Prytanis begate Eunomus, and Eunomus begate Polydeetes of his first wife, and Lyourgus of the second wife, called Dianassa: yet Euthychidas another writer, maketh Lycurgus the fixt of descent in the right line from Polydettes, and the eleuenth after Hercules. But of all his auncesters, the noblest was Sous, in whose time the citie of Sparta fubdued the ILOTES, made them flaues, and did enlarge and increase their dominion, with the lands and possessions they had got by conquest of the Arcadians. And it is faid, that Sous himselfe being on a time straightly besieged by the Cittorians; in a hard Lycurgus.

Thefeusele- thermore, Thefeus faults touching women and rauishments, of the twaine, had the lesse shadow and colour of honesty. Because Thesem did attempt it very often: for he stole away Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the TROEZENIAN. Againe, being stepped in yeares, and at later age, and past maringe, he stole away Helen in her minority, being nothing neere to consent to mary. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACED EMONIANS, and the AMAzons (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birth and linage of his owne countrey which were at ATHENS, and descended of the noble race and progeny of Erichtheus, and of Ce. creps) did giue men occasion to suspect that his womannishnesse was rather to satisfic lust, then of any great loue. Romalus now in a contrary maner, when his people had taken 800. or thereabouts, of the Sabyne women to rauish them, kept but onely one for himselfe that was called Her filia, as they fay, and delivered the rest to his best and most honest citizens. Afterwards by the

Romulus ran Sherent honor, love, and good entertainment that he caused them to have and receive of their husbands. he changed this violent force of rauishment, into a most perfect bond and league of amity: which kindnesse, and all matrimonial offices that he established by that means, betwist man and wife. No disorce For in two hundred and thirty yeares afterwards, there was never man that durst for fake or put away his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the best learned men, and most curious observers of antiquities, do know his name that was the first murderer of his 230 jeares father and mother: even so all the Romains knew what he was, which first durst put away his Spre. Val. wife. It was one called Sparius Carulius, because his wife was barren & had no children. The ef-Max, faith fects also do agree with the testimony of the time. For the realme was common vino the kings of The first wife put at both nations, and through the alliance of these mariages that began first of rauishments, both way in Rome. Thefeus troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romalus dininements, maketh great difference between him and Thefeus. For Romalus in his birth was preserved by the maruellous fauor of the gods: Thefeus to the contrary was begotten against the gods will, as appeared plainly by the answer of the Oracle to Ageus, that he should not meddle with any woman in a strange and for aine countrey.

dry ground, where no water could be found, offered them thereupon to restore all their lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his company did drinke of a fountaine that was there not far off. The CLITORIAN'S did grant vnto it, and peace also was sworne between them. Then he called all his fouldiers before him, and told them if there were any one amongst them that would refraine from drinking, he would refigne his kingdome to him; howbeit there was not one in all his company that could (or would) forbcare to drinke, they were so fore athirst. So they all dranke heartily except himselfe, who being the last that came downe, did no more but a litle moyst his mouth without, and so refreshed himselfe, the enemies selues standing by, and drank not a drop. By reason wherof, he refused afterwards to restore their lands he had promifed, alledging they had not all drunk. But that notwithstanding, he was greatly esteemed for his acts, and yet his house was not named after his owne name: but after his sonnes name Eurytion. they of his house were called Eurytionides. The reason was because his sonne Eu. rytion to please the people, did first let fall and give over the sole and absolute power of a king. Wherupon there followed afterwards maruellous diforder and diffolution, which continued a great time in the city of Sparta. For the people finding themselues at liberty, became very bold and disobedient: and some of the kings that succeeded, were hated even to death, because they would perforce vie their ancient authority ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and good-wils of the people, or because they saw they were not strong inough to rule them, did give theinfelues to diffemble. And this did fo much increase the peoples loose and rebellious minds. that Lyeurgus owne father being king, was flaine among them. For one day, as he was parting a fray betweene two that were fighting, he had fuch a wound with a kitchin knife, that he died: and left his Realine to his eldeft fonne PolydeEtes, who died also soone after, and without heire of his body, as was supposed. In so much as every man thought Lycure we should be king; and fo he tooke it vpon him, vntill it was vnderstood that his brothers wife was young with child. Which thing to foone as he perceived, he published openly, that the Realine belonged to the child that should be borne, if it were a sonne. After this he gouerned the Realme, but as the kings lieutenant and regent. The LACEDEMONIANS calthe regents of their kings that are left within age, Prodicos Lycurgus brothers widow did fend, and let him fecretly vnderstand, that if he would Regents, or promise to marry her when he should be king, that she would come before her time, and either miscary or destroy that she went with. Lyourgus detestably abhorring this brutish and sauage vnkingi inmi. naturalnesse of the woman, did not reject her offer made him, but seemed rather to be very glad, then to diflike of it. Neueriheleffe he fent her word againe, she should not need to try masteries, with drinkes and medicines to make her come before her time: for in so doing, she might bring her felf in danger, and be caft away for euer. Howbeit he aduited her to go her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he would find meanes inough to make away the child that should be borne. And so with such perswasions he drew on this woman to her full time of deliuery. But fo foone as he perceived she was neare her time, he fent certaine to keep her, and to be prefent at her labour, commanding them that if flie were brought a bed of a daughter, they should leave her with the woman: and if it were a sonne, they should forthwith bring it to him. in what place focuer he was, and what bufineffe focuer he had in hand. It chanced that fhe came euen about supportime, and was deliuered of a sonne. As he was sitting at the table with the other magistrates of the city, his feruants entred the hall, and presented to him the litle babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes: and fayd openly to them that were prefent: Behold my Lords of Sparta, here is a king borne vnto vs. And speaking these words, he layd him downe in the kings place, and named him Charilaus, as much to fay as the joy of the people. Thus he faw all the lookers on rejoycing much, and might heare them praise and extoll his finceritie, iuflice, and vertue. By this meanes he reigned onely as king but eight moneths, from thenceforth he was taken and effected fo inft and fincere a man among the citizens, that there were moe that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithstanding there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who fought to hinder and disgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kindred of the kings mother: whose power and honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus authoritie: in so much, as a brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a day, did not sticke to say to his face: I know for a certainty one of these dayes thou wilt be king: meaning thereby to bring him in suspition with the citizens. Which thing thing though Lycurgus neuer meant, yet of a fubrill and crafty wit, Leonidas thought by giving out such words, that if the young King happened to dye in his minoritie naturally, it would be mistrusted that Lyeurgus had secretly made him away. The Kings mother also gaue out such like speeches, which in the end did so table him, with the searche had, what event might fall out thereof, that he determined to depart his country, and by his absence to avoid the sufficient that the country had been even a such that the search when the search had been even a such that the search when the search had been even the search had been even to such that the search had been even the search had been even to such that the search had been even the search had been even to be search had been even the search had been even to be search had been tion that therein might grow vpon him any way. So he trauelled abroad in the world as a Lycurgus ftranger, vntill his nephew had begotten a fonne who was to succeed him in his kingdome. travelled He having with this determination taken his journey, went first of all into CRETA, where he diligently observed and considered the manner of their lining, the order of the government of their Common-weale, and euer kept company with the best, and euer was conferring with the most learned. There he found very good lawes in his judgement, which he noted of purpose to carry home to his countrey, to serue when time should come. He found there other lawes also, but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that aboue the rest was reputed wife and skilfull in matters of state and gouernement, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus did so much by intreaty, and for familiar friendship, that he perswaded him to go with him vnto Sparta. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and Thales apomame: but in effect he sang all that the best and sufficientest governours of the world could deuife. For all his fongs were goodly ditties, wherein he did exhort and perfwade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace and concord one with the other. His words were fet out with fuch tunes, countenance and accents, that were fo full of fweetneffe, harmonie, and piercing, that inwardly it melted mens hearts, and drew the hearers of a loue to like the most honest things, and to leave all hatred, enmitte, sedition, and division, which at that time reigned fore among them. So as it may be faid, he it was that prepared the way for Lyeurgus, wherby he afterwards reformed and brought the LACED ÆMONIANS vnto reafon. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into Asia, with intent (as it is faid) to compare the manner of life and policy former inof those of CRETA (being then very straight and seuere) with the superfluities and vanities of to Afia. IONIA: and thereupon to confider the difference betweene their two manners and gouernements, as the Physition doth, who to know the whole and healthfull the better, doth victo compare them with the ficke and diseased. It is very likely it was there, where he first faw Homers workes, in the hands of the heires and fuccessours of cirophylus and finding in the same, as well many rules of policy, as the great pleasure of poets faining, he diligently copied it out, and made a volume thereof to cary into GRECE. It is true, there was much fame abroad of Homers poefies among the GRECIANS, howbeit there were few of them brought together, but were feattered of Homers and there in diverse mens hands in parables and page 1997. here and there in diucrfe mens hands, in pamphlets and peeces vnfewed and without any order: profes. but the first that brought them most to light among men, was Lyenrgus. The ÆGYPTIANS say, Homers po. that he was in their countrey also, and that having found there one notable ordinance among knows to other, that their fouldiers and men of war were separated from the rest of the people, he brought she Greet. the practife of it into Sparta: where fetting the merchants, artificers and labourers every one apart by themselves he did of ablifus poble common wealth. So the did not be light by apart by themselues, he did establish a noble common wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN historiographers, and some others also of GRECE do write. He was also in Africk E, and in Spaine, and as farreas India, to conferre with the wife menthere, that were called the Philosophers of In-DIA. I know no man that hath written it, fauing Aristocrates, that was Hipparchus sonne. The La-GED EMONIANS wished for him often when he was gone, and sent diverse and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maiestic of a Prince, whereby they did excell the common people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to command, and to give order, as having in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to draw men willingly to obey him. Moreouer the Kings themselues were not vnwilling to have him to returne home, becausethey hoped that his presence would somewhat bridle and restraine the people from their infolency and disobedience towards them. Whereupon Lyeurgus returning home in this opinion and affeand disobedience towards them. Whereupon Lyeurgus returning nome in this opinion and ante-ction of men, it fell out that he was no sooner arrived, but he began to deuise how to alter the whole gouemement of the common-weale, and throughout to change the whole course and and change order of the state: thinking that to make only certaine particular lawes were to no purpose, but gethall the much like, as one should give forme casie medicine, to purge an overthrowne body with all weath. humours and diseases. Therefore he thought first that all grosse and superfluous humours were meet to be dissoluted and purged, and then afterwards to give them a new form and order of gouernment. When he had thus determined with himself, before he would take in hand to do any connelled thing, he went to the city of DELPHES: where after he had facrificed to Apollo, he consulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: O beloued of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craued grace of Apollo to establishgood lawes in his country, it was answered him: that Apollo granted his petition, and that he should ordaine the best and perfectest maner of a common-wealth, that ever had or should be in the world. This answer did comfort him very much, and so he beganto break his purpose to certaine of the chiefe of the city, and fecretly to pray and exhort them to helpe him, going first to those he knew to be his friends, and after by litle and litle he wan others to him, who joined with him in his enterprise. So when he faw the time fit for the matter, he caused thirty of the chiefest men of the city in a morning to come into the market place well appointed and furnished, to suppres those that would attempt to hinder their purpose. Hermippus the historiographer rehearseth twenty of the chiefest: but he that aboue all others did most assist him in his doings, and was the greatest aid vnto the stablishing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadus. The king Charilaus hearing of this affembly, did feare there had bene some conspiracy or insurrection against his person, and chalceacos, for his fafety he fled into the temple of Iuno, and Chalceacos, as much to fay, as Iunos brafen teple. Immes bra- Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth, he waxed bold & came out of the temple again, & he himselffauored the enterprise, being a prince of a noble mind, howbeit very soft by nature, as witneffeth Archelaus (that was then the other king of LACED EMON) by telling how Charilaus antwered one that praised him to his face, in faying he was a good ma. And how shold I not (quoth he)be good, when I cannot be euill to the euill? In this change of the state, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefest alteration was, his law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regal power and equall authority with the kings in matters of weight and importance, and was (as Plato faith) to be y healthful counterpoise of the whole body of the commonweale. The other state before was euer wavering, sometime inclining to tyranny, when the kings were too mighty; and fortime to confusion, when the people would vsurpeauthority. Lyourgus therfore placed between the kings and the people, a counfell of Senators, which was as a strong beame, that held both these extremes in an euen ballance, and gaue sure footing and ground to either part to make ftrong the state of the common-weale. For the 28. Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) tooke for time the kings part, when it was needfull to pul down the fury of the people: & contrarily, they held fomtimes with the people against the kings, to bridle their tyrannicall gouernement. Aristotle faith, he ordained the number of Senators to be but 28. was the eight and twenty, becarfe two of thirty that io yned with him as afore, did for feare for fake him at his enterprise. Howbeit Spherus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purposed to have more then eight and twenty to be the Senate. And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, confidering it is compounded of the number of seuen, multiplied by foure: and is the first perfect number next to fix being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he chose this number rather then any other, because he meant the whole body of the counsell should be but thirty persons, adding to that number, the two kings. Lycurgus tooke so great care to establish well this counsell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apolloes temple in DELPHES. This oracle is called vnto this day Retra, as who would fay, the statute oracle; wher-Lycurgus. of the answer was: When thou hast built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua, the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou shalt establish a Senate of thirty counsellors, with the two kings: and shalt affemble the people at times convenient, in the place between coation f. the bridge and the river CNACION. There the Senators shall propound all matters, and breake vp after their affemblies:and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speake one word. In those dayes the people were euer affembled betweene two rivers, for there was no hall to affemble a counsell at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no builded place meet for men to giue good counsell in, or to determine causes, but rather a hinderance: because in fuch places men be drawne to muse on vaine things, and their minds be caried away with beholding the images, tables, and pictures, commonly fet vp for ornament in fuch open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and fports be made, they think more of them, then of any counsell. Againe, if it be in a great hall, then of the faire embowed or vawted roofs, or of the fretifed feelings curioufly wrought, and fumptuoufly fet forth, and tend not still their businesse they come for. When the people were assembled in counsell, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counsell to be determined, neither mightany of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thing : but the people had only authority to gine their affent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senators, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two kings Polydorus and Theopompus, because the people did many times crosse and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding something to it, they did adde these words to the Oracle aforesaid. That if the people would not assent to any ordinance of the Senate, then should it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake up the counsell, and to frustrate all things done in the same: the wise aduice of the Senate being encountred thus, and their meaning to the best, so peruerted to the worse. These two kings perswaded the people, that at the very first, this addition came with the Oracle of Apollo. as the poet Tyrtaus maketh mention in the place, where he faith:

From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought Of Pythia, into their countrey foile. The Kings (eucn they to whom of right there ought A louing care in princely breasts to boile. The Spartane wealth, to gard from enery spoile:) Shall be the chiefe, grave causes to decide With Senators: whose sound advice is tride. And next to them the people shall fulfill As much as feemes to please their princes will.

Lycurgus now having thus tempered the form of his common-weate, it feemed not with flanding to those that came after him, that this small number of thirty persons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, and of too great authority. Wherefore to bridle them in a litle, they gave them (as Plato faith) a bit in their mouths, and that was the authority of the Ephores, which fignifie as The inflitte. much as controllers: and were creeted about a hundred and thirty years after the death of Lycur-tion of the gus. The first which was chosen of these, was Elatus, and it was in the time of King Theopompus, whose wife on a day in her anger said: How through his negligence he would leave lesse to his fucceffors, then he had received of his predecessors. To whom he answered againe; Not lesse but more, for that it shall continue longer, and with a more surety. For, in losing thus their too absolute power that wrought them great enuy and hatred among their citizens, they did escape the danger and mischiefe that their neighbours the ARGIVES and MESSENIANS did feele: who would not give outr the four-raigne authority which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lyeurgus great wisdome and forefight manifestly knowne; who so will deeply consider the feditions and ill gouernments of the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS (their necreneighbors and wildome. kinsmen)aswell from the people, as from the kings; who from the beginning had all things alike to the Spartans; and in dividing of their lands a far better order then theirs. This notwithstanding, they did not prosper long but through the pride of their kings, & the disobedience of their people, they entred into civill wars one against another, shewing by their disorders and mistortunes the special grace the gods did beare to Sparta, to give the such a reformer, as did so wisely temper the flate of their common-weale, as we will shew herafter. The second law that Lyour Lyourgus gus made, and the boldest and hardest he euer tooke in hand, was the making of a new division of makeib etheir lands. For he faw fo great a diforder and inequality among the inhabitants, as well of the quality among the inhabitants, as well of the country, as of the city Laced & Mon, by reason some (and the greatest number of them) were so mis the cipoore, that they had not a handfull of ground, & other some being least in nuber were very rich, wem. that had all: he thought with himfelf to banish out of the city all insolency, enuy, couetcousnes, & cicliciousnes, and also all riches & pouerty, which he took for the greatest, and most continual plagues of a city, or common-weale. For this purpose, he imagined there was none so ready and necessary a meane, as to perswade his citizens to suffer all the lands, possessions, and inheritance of their country, to runne in common together: and that they should make a new division equally in partition amongst themselues, to line from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, fo that no one were richer then another, and none should seeke to go before each other, any other way then in vertue only: thinking there should be no difference or vnequality among inhabitants of one city, but the reproches of dishonesty, and the praises of vertue. Thus Lycureus following his determination, did out of hand make a law of the division of their lands. For first he did divide all the country of LACONTA, into thirty thousand equall parts, the which he through the did set out for those that inhabited about Spart a: and of those lands that iouned next to the city of Sparta, that was the first metropolitan city of Laconia, he made other nine thousand parts, which he deuided to the naturall citizens of Sparta, who be those that are properly called Spartans. Howbeit some will say, he made but fixethousand parts, and that king Polydorus afterwards did adde two other three thousand parts. Others say also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand parts made but the halfe only, and Polydorus the rest. Euery one of these parts was such. as might yeeld vnto the owner yearly, threefcore and ten bushels of barley for a man, & twelve bushels for the woman; and of wine and other liquid fruits, much like in proportion, which quantity Lycurgus judged to be fufficient, to keep the body of a man in health, & to make him strong and lusty, without any further allowance. They say after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had benereaped not long before, and faw the number of sheaueslying in euery shocketogether, and no one shocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, and told them that were with him, Me thinksall LACONIA is as it were an inheritance of many brethren, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue divided also moucables, and to have made a common partition betweene them, to the end he would have viterly taken away all vnequality. But finding the citizens took it very impatiently. that openly that which they had, should be taken away, he went about to do it more recretly, and in a cunninger wife to take away that conetoufnes. For first of all he did forbid all coine of gold and filuer to be currant: and then he did set out certaine coines of iron, which he commanded only to be currant, wherof a great waight and quantity was but litle worth. So as to lay vp therof the value of ten minas, it would have occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would have needed a yoke of oxen to carry it any where. Now gold and filter being thus banished out of the country, many lewd parts and faults must needs ceasife thereby. For who would rob, steale, pick, take away, hide, procure, or hoord vp any thing, that he had no great occasion to defire, nor any profit to possess, nor wold be any pleasure to vie or imploy. For, the iron they occupied for their coine, they cast vinegar vpon it while it was red-hot out of the fire, to kill the strength and working of it to any other vse for thereby it was so eager and brittle, that it would bide no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other fashion. By this meanes he banished also, all superfluous and unprofitable sciences, which he knew he should not need to do by any proclamation:because they would fall away (or the most part of them) euen of themselves, when the basenesse of the mony they should take for their work, should vndo them. For their iron monies were not currant els where in the cities of GRECE, but every body made a lest of it there. By this occasion, the Laced Emonians could buy no forrein wares nor merchandises, neither came there any ship into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rhetorician did repaire into their country to teach them eloquence, and the cunning cast of iying: nor yet came there to them any wifard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keep any brothell house, nor yet goldsmith or ieweller, to make or sel any toics or trifles of gold or filuer to set forth women: confidering all these things are vsed to be made to get mony, and to hoord vp that they had not. After this fort, delicatenetse that wanted many things that entertained it, began by litle and litle to vanish away, and lastly, to fall off from themselves: when the most rich men had no more occasion then the poorest, and riches having no meane to shew her selfe openly in the world, was faine to remaine shut at home idly, as not able to do her master any service. Thereupon moneables & houshold stuffe (which a man cannot be without, and must be daily occupied) as bedsteds, tables, chaires, and such like necessaries for house, were excellently well made; and mendid greatly praise the fashion of the Laconian cup which they called Cothon, and especially for a fouldier in the wars, as Critius was wontto fay. For it was made after such a fashion, that the color of it did let the eye to discern the foule and vnwholsome water, which men are driven of times to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times against ones stomacke to see it: and if by chance there was any filth or mud in the bottome, it would cleaue and sticke fast up on the ribs of the belly, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that dranke it. The reformer of their state was the cause of althis: because their artificers tending now to superfluous works, were occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, now to driue away all superfluity and deliciousnesse, and to root out vtterly desire to get and gather:he made another third law for eating & drinking, and against feasts & bankets. First he willed and commanded the citizens, that they should eate together all of one meat, and chiefly of those he Lyangus had permitted by his ordinance. Then he did expressly forbid them to eate alone, or apart, or order for fecretly by them selues, vpon rich tables and sumptuous beds, abusing the labour of excellent die vno workemen, and the denices of lickerish cookes, to cramme themselues in corners, as they do fat the Laceda. vp beafts and poultry, which dorh not onely breed ill conditions in the minde, but doth marre the complexions of men, and the good state of their bodies, when they give themselves over to fuch fenfuelity and gluttony. Whereof it followeth in the end, that men must needes sleepe much, to helpe to digeft the excesse of meates they have taken, and then must they go to the hote houses to bathe themselues, and spend long time about the ordinary attendance of their fickly bodies. This was a maruellous thing for him to bring to passe, but much more, to make riches notto be stolen, and least of all to be coneted, as Theophrastus said of him: which by this means of making the cat together with all sobriety at their ordinary diet, was brought to passe. For there was no more meane to the rich, then to the poore, to vieto play, or flew riches, fith both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: fo as that which is commonly ipoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blind, was truly verified onely in the city of Sparta, about all other places of the world. For there riches were layd on the ground like a corfewithout a foule, that moueth no whit at all: confidering it was not lawfull for any man to car at home feeretly in his house before he came to their open hals, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meales, being already full and well fraught. For enery mans eye was vpon those especially which did not cat and drink with a good stomach amongst th.m: and it was the vse to reproch them as gluttons, and dainty mouthed men, which refused to case as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they fay, that grieued most the rich about all that Lyeurgus made, and whereat they were most mad and angry with him: infomuch, as on a day, they all fetting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to run out of the market place, and getting ground of them, he recoursed the liberties of a Church, before any could ouertake him: fauing one yong man called Aleander, who otherwise had no ill nature in him, but that he was formwhat quick of his hand, and cholerike withall. Who following Lycurgus neerer then any other, did give him a blow overthwart the face with a staffe, and strake froke out out one of his Lyes, as Lyeurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lyeurgus neuer bashed or Lyeurgus made word at the marter, but did lift up his head to those that followed him, and shewed them his face all a gore-bloud, & his eye put out cleane; wherof they were fo fore ashamed, that there was not a man that durst once open his mouth against him, but to the contrary, they seemed to piry him, and did deliner Alcander into his hands that had done the deed, to punish him as himfelf pleased. And so they all brought him to his house, and shewed they were right heartily fory for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, faue that he made Alcander to go with him into his house, where he never hurt him, nor gauchim fowle word; but Lyeurgus commanded him onely to waite vpon him, and made his other ordinarie feruants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now began to fpie his owne fault, did most willingly attend upon him, and neuer spake word to the contrary. When he had serued him a certaine time, being very necre continually about him, he began to feele and tafte of his naturall liberaliey, and faw of what affection and intention Lyourgus was moved to do all he did: he perceived what was the fenerity of his ordinary life, and what his constancy was to endure labour without wearinesse. Alcander then began to loue and honour Lyeurgus from his heart, and told his parents and friends, how he was no fuch feuere man as he feemed, but was of fo kind and gentlea nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his punishmentalfo, which he should have received: for of a fierce, rash, and a lewd conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very graue and wife man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lyeurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he furnamed Optiletide, because the Minerua DORIANS which dwell inthose parts of PELOPONNESVS, docall the cycs, Optiles. There are other writers (as Diosecrides for one) which say Lycurgus had a blow with a staffe, but he had not his eye striken out with it: and how contrariwise, he founded this temple to Minerua, to give her thanks for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that ever fince the Spartans have bene restrained to cary states in any affembly of counsell. But to returne to their common repastes, Andria and which the CRETANS call Andria, and the LACED EMONIANS Phiditta, either because they Phiditia, were places wherein they leavned to line foberly and straightly, (for in the GREERE tong Phido pealed."

is to faue and spare) or els because their amity and friendship grew there towards one another, as if they would have called them Philitia, feaffs of love, by changing D. into L. It may be also they added the first letter as superfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, because they did eat and drink there: They fate in their hals by fifteene in a company, litle more or leffe, and at the beginning of cuery moneth, enery one brought a bushell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fine pound of cheefe and two pound and a halfe of figs for a man, befides forme litle portion of their mony to buy certaine fresh cates. And ouer & aboue all this euery man when he did facrifice in his house was bound to fend the best and chiefest things of his facrifice to the hals to be eaten. Likewise if any man went on hunting, and killed any venifon, it was an order, he should send a peece of the flesh thither. Having these two lawfull causes, they might eat and drink by themselves, at home, either when they facrificed any beaft to the gods, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwise they were bound of necessitie to meete in their hals at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very straightly a great time; in so much as king Agis on a day, returning from the wars, where he had overthrowne the Athenians, and being defirous to fup at home prinarly with the Queene his wife, he fent to the hals for his portion. But the Polemarchi. that be certain officers affifting the kings in the wars, did deny him. The next day Agis left off for spite, to do the accustomed facrifice they were wont to celebrate in the end of every war; wherupon they fet a fine on his head, and condemned him to pay it. The yong children also went to thefe repafts, cue as they should go to schooles to learn gravity & temperance, where they heard brought to wife & grave discourses touching the government of a common weale, but not of masters that were as hirelings. There they learned pretily to play vpon words, & pleasantly to sport one with another, without any broad speeches, or vncomly iests, and at others hands to beare the same again, without choler or anger. For this property. The the LACED EMONIANS about all other to edamonia, take and giue a mock without any offence:neuertheleffe, if any mans nature could not beare it, he needed but pray the party to forbeare his iesting, and so he left it straight. And it was cuer an ordinary thing among the that the eldest of the company told the rest that were come into the hall to meale, with shewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a word here out of this doore. Even so he that wold be received to meale there in their copany, must first of necessity be of receiving allowed & received in this fort, by all the rest. Every one of them took a litle ball of bran or dow to wash their hands with, & without cuer a word speaking, they threw it into a basin, which the company at feruant that waited on them at the table did cary vpon his head; he that was contented the other should be received in company, did cast in his ball as he did receive it; but if he misliked him, then he pressed it flat betweene his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of bran thus pressed flat, was as much as a beane bored through, and was to them a figne of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this fort, the fuiter was rejected: for they would not have any enter into their company that was not liked of all the reft. He that thus was rejected, they fay he was discadded: for the basin wherein the litle bals were caried, was called Caddos. The best dish they served at these meales, was that they call their black broth: fo that when they had that, the old men did cate no The blacke flesh, but left it all to the yong men, and they by themselues did eat the broth. There was a king of Pontys, that being defirous to taft of this black broth, did buy of purpose a LACEDEMO NIAN cooke: but after he had once tafted thereof, he was very angry straight. The cooke then faid vnto him and it please your grace, ere one shall find this broth good, he must be washed first in the river of Evrotas. After they had cate and drunke thus foberly together, every one repaired home without any light for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where els with light, because they should accustome themselves boldly to go vp and downe the dark, and all about in the night. This was the order and maner of their meales. But here is specially to be noted, that Lyourgus would in no wife have any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expresly fet downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes should be written. For he thought that which should chiefly make a city happy and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and manners, as to have continuance for cuer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as afarre fironger knot to tie them with then any other compulsarie law. Which when men by vie and cuftome, through good education, do take in their childhood, it maketh enery man to be a law to himfelfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and fometime are changed into one fort, and fometime in another, as occasion feructh: he thought it best not to constraine them to do it by writing, norto establish customes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and discretion of men which had bene brought vp in the same, both to take away, and to adde therein, as the case and time should require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefest point of a good law-maker or reformer of the common-weale was, to cause men to be well brought vp and infiructed. One of his Ordinances therefore was expresly, that not one of his lawes should be written. Another of his deuices was, against superfluous charges and expences: which to anoid, he made a law that all roofes of houses should be made onely with the axe, and all gates and doores with the fawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like open imagination as afterwards Epaminondus had, when he faid, speaking of his table: Such a boord Epaminonneuer receiveth any treason. Even so thought Lycurgus, that such a built house would never receine curioficie or daintinesse. For no man is so madly disposed or simple witted, as to bring into fo poore and meane houses, bedsteads with filuer feet, imbrodered couerlets, or counterpoints of purple filk, neither yet plate of gold nor of filuer, nor fuch other like coffly furniture and fineneile, as those things require to waite upon them: because the beds must be answerable to the meaneneffe of the house, the furnitures of the beds must be sutelike to the same, and all other houshold stuffe, diet, meate, and drinke agreeable to the rest. Hereof proceeded that, which Leentychidas the first King of that name, said once: who supping on a time in the citic of Corintu, & feeing the roofe of the hall where he fate, fumptuoufly embowed & carued, he asked fir aight King Low-& feeing the roofe of the half where he fate, sumptuously embowed & carted, it asked transfer in that from the trees did grow carned fo in that country. The third law was, he did forbid them to make this day in the fairing. warre often with one enemie, left the enemie forced to take often armes in hand, might in the Retra for end grow experter and valianter then they. For this cause king Agesilans was greatly blamed, warres. who was a long time after. For by making often wars with the country of Bo E ot 14, he made the THEBANS in the end as expert and valiant fouldiers as the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Antaleidas feeing him hurt one day, faid vnto him: The THEBBANS have nobly rewarded Antaleidas thee for their learning, fith thou hast made them expert fouldiers vnwilling to learne the discipline of war. These be the lawes Lyourgus selfe called Reira, and signisse as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had discouered to him. Now the education of children, he esteemed the chiefest and greatest matter that a reformer of lawes should establish. Therefore beginning a farre off, he first considered the state of mariage, and the generation of children. For Aristotle laith, that Lyeurgus did attempt to reforme women, and did soone giue it ouer againe: because he could doe no good therein, by reason of the great liberty they had taken by the absence of their husbands in the warres, compelled often fo to be abroad, and that they did leave them mistresses of their houses, and at their returne did honour them so much, and make of them so beyond measure, with calling them ladies and mistresses. Howbeitthis is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, as well as he had of mens; and so reason did require. First of all, he willed that The distribution the maidens should harden their bodies with exercise of running, wrestling, throw the barre, and casting the dart, to the end that the fruit wherewith they might be afterwards conceined, taking the Lacelenourifhment of a ftrong and lafty body, should shoot out and spread the better: and that they by gathering strength thus by exercises, should more easily away with the paines of child-bearing. And to take away from them their womannish daintinesse and sinenesse, he brought vp 17. a custome, for young maides and boyes to goe as it were a procession, and to daunce naked at the series follower following for the series and to sing consists force of their constant in the series and to sing consists force of their constant in the series and to sing consists force of their constant in the series and to sing consists force of their constant in the series and to sing consists force of their constant in the series of the series o folemme feaftes and facrifices, and to fing certaine fongs of their owne making, in the prefence discipline and fight of young men. To whom by the way they gaue many times pretie mockes of pur- of maples. pose, as pleasantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and fometimes also in their fong for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they praised them which had descrued it. By this meanes, they did set young mens hearts on fire, to striue to winne most praise and honour. For who so was praised of them for a valiant man, or whose worthie sets were fing by them, he thereby was encouraged to do the better another time; and the pretie girds and quippes they gaue to others, were of no leffe force, then the sharpest words and admonitions that otherwife could be given them. This tooke place the rather, because it was done in the presence of the Kings, the Senators, & all the rest of the citizens which came thither to fee those sports. And though the maids did shew themselues thus naked openly, yet was there no dishonesty scene nor offered, but all this sport was full of play and toyes, without any youthfuil part or wantonnesse; and rather caried a shew of demurenesse, and a desireto haue their bestmade bodies icen & spied. Moreouer, it somewhat lifted vp their hearts, and made them noblier minded, by giving them to understand, that it was no lesse comely for them, in their kind and exercifes to carrie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exercifes to carry the price. Hereofit came, that the women of LACED EMON were fooded to fay, and thinke of themselves that, which Gorgonathe wife of king Leonidus one day answered, being in talke with a strange woman that faid to her: There be no women in the world that commaund their husbands, but you wines of LACEDEMON. Whereto the Queene straight replied: So be there no women but we. which bring forth men. Furthermore, these plaies, sports, and daunces, the maides did naked before young men, were pronocations to draw and allure the young men to marrie: not as perfivaded by geometricall reasons, as faith Plato, but brought to it by liking, & of very love. Those which would not marrie, he made infamous by law. For it was not lawful for fuch to be preset. where those open games and pastimes were shewed naked. Furthermore the officers of the city compelled fuch as would not marry, euen in the hardest time of the winter, to enuiron the place of these sportes, and to go vp and downe starke naked, and to sing a certaine song made for the purpose against them, which was: that justly were they punished, because that law they disobeyed. Moreouer, when fuch were old, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old maried men vfually received. Therfore there was no man that mifliked or reproved that, which was spoken to Dercillidas: albeit otherwise he was a noble Captaine. For, coming into a presence, there was a young man which would not vouchsafe to rise and doe him reuerence, nor to give him place for to fit downe: And worthily, quoth he, because thou hast not gotten a fon, who may do fo much for me in time to come. Those which were desirous to marrie any, were driuen to take them away by force whom they would marie, not litle young wenches I meane, which were not of age to be married : but lufty and ftrong maides, of age to beare children. And when one of them was stolen away in this fort, she that was privile thereto, and meant to make the mariage, came and fhaued the haires of her head that was maried: then she put her into mans apparell, and gaue her all things fute-like to the fame, and laid her vpon a mattreffe all alone, without light or candle. After this was done, the bridegroome being neither drunk nor finelier apparelled then he was wont to be, but having supped soberly at his ordinary, came home fecretly to the house where the bride was and there vntyed his wines girdle tooke her in his armes, layd her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards faire and foftly stole away to the place where he was wont to sleepe with other young men. And so from thenceforth, he continued alwaies to do the like, being all the day time with his companions, & fleeping most of the night, vnlesse he fometime stole to see his wife; being afraid, and ashamed cuer to be seene by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his young wife did helpe for her part, to spie meanes and occasions how they might meete together, and not be seene. This manner endured a great while and vntill fome of them had children, before they boldly met together, and faw each other on the day time. This fecret meeting in this fort did ferue to good purposes, noronely because it was some meane of continencie, and shamefastnesse, but also it kept their bodies in strength and better state to bring forth children. It continued also in both parties, as still burning loue, and a new defire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor weary, as theirs commonly be which have their bellies full of loue, and as much as they luft: but they cuer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping still a longing defire to deuise how to meete againe. Now when he had stablished such a continencie, and so kind a framed honestie in mariage, he took no lesse care to drive away all foolish icalousie therein, thinking it very good reason to beware there should be no violence, nor confusion in mariage; and yet as loughe in the reason would, they should suffer those which were worthicto get children as it were in common, laughing, at the madde folly of them which reuenge fuch things with warre and bloudflied, as though in that case men in no wise should have no fellowshippe together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being stepped in yeares, and having a young wife, if seeing a faire young man that liked him, and knowne withall to be of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with child, and afterwards would auow it for his, as if himfelfe had gotten it. It was lawful alfo for an honest man that loued another mans wife, for that he saw her wife, shamefast, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreate her husband to suffer him to lye with her, and that he might also plow in that lustic ground, and cast abroade the seede of well fauoured children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloud and parentage, with the most honourable and honestest persons. For first of all, Lyourgus did not like that children should be prinate private to any men, but that they should be common to the common-weale: by which reason he would also, that such as should become citizens, should not be begotten of enery man, but of the most honestest men onely. So Lycurgus thought also there were many foolish vaine toyes & fancies, in the lawes and orders of other Nations, touching mariage: seeing they caused their birches and mares to be limed and conered with the fairest dogs and goodliest stalons that might bee gotten, praying or paying the mafters and owners of the fame; and kept their wives notwithstanding shut vp safe vnder locke and key, for feare lest other then themselues might get them with child, although they were fickely, feeble brained, and extreme old. As if it were not first of all, and chiefly a discommodity to the fathers & mothers, & likewise to those that bring them vp, to haue unperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of dry and withered men: and then to the contrary, what pleasure and benefit is it to those that have saire and good children borne, as gotten of like feed and men. Thefe things were done then by natural & civill reason, neuerthelesse they say women were so farre off then from intreatic, as euer they were before: fo as in old time, in Sparta, men knew not what adulterie ment. For proofe wheror, the Woodulte. answer made by Geradis (one of the first ancient Spartans) vnto a stranger, may be alledged, trickness, trickn that asked him, what punishment they had for adulterers. My friend, quoth he, there be none here. But if there were: replied the stranger againe. Mary said he, the he must pay as great a bul, as standing vpon the top of the mountaine Taygetus, may drinke in the riner Euroras. Yea marie:but how is it possible (quoth the stranger) to find such a bull! Geradas laughing, answered him againe: And how were it possible also to find an adulterer in Sparta? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birth of euery boy, the fit The educather was no more mafter of him, to cocker and bring him vp after his will:but he himfelf caried him to a certaine place called Lesché, where the eldest men of his kindred being set, did view the the laredechild: and if they found him faire, and well proportionated of all his limmes, and strong, they gaue order he should be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thousand parts of inheritance for his education. Contrariwife, if they found him deformed, misshape, or leane, or pale, they fent him to be throwne in a deepe pit of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, & Apothetes. as a man would fay, the common house of office: holding opinion it was neither good for the child, nor yet for the comonweale, that it should line, considering from his birth he was not well made, nor giuento be strong healthfull, nor lustie of body all his life long. For this cause therefore, the nurse after their birth did not wash them with water simply (as they do enery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine; and thereby did they proue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they suppose, that children which are fred with giuen to haue the falling ficknesse, or otherwise to be fall of rewms and ficknesse, cannot abide wine. washing with wine, but rather dry & pine away: as concrarily the other which are healthfull, become thereby the stronger and the lustier. The nurces also of Sparta vse a certaine manner to The sparbring vp their children, without fwadling, or binding them vp in clothes with fivadling bands, or having on their heads any crof-clothes: so as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better shaped and goodlier of body. Befides that, hey acquainted their children to all kind of meates, and brought them vp without much tendance, fo as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be left alone in the dark:neither were they cryers, wrallers, or vnhappie children, which be all tokens of base & cowardly natures. So that there were strangers, that of purpose bought nurces out of Laconia, to bring vp their children: as they fay Amiela was one of them which nurced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gauchim afterwards a bondman called Zopyrus, to be his mafter Platof and gouernour: who had no better property in him, than other common flaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernement of the children of SPARTA into the hands of hired mafters or flaues bought with money; neither was it lawfull for the father himselfe to bring up his owne child after his owne manner and liking. For so soone as they came to seuen yeares of age, he tooke and deuided them by companies, to make them to be brought. How the vptogether, and to accustome them to play, to learne, and to study one with another. Then he chose out of energy company one, whom has bounded bounded by a deal and to study one with another. Then he niamebilchose out of euery company one, whom he thought to have the best wit, and had most courage dren were in him to fight, to whom he gaue the charge and ouerfight of his owne company. The rest had brought me their eyes waiting alwaies on him, they did obey his commandements willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections he gaue them, they did fuch taskes and works as he appointed them: fo that all their studie was most to learne to obey. Furthermore, the old gray headed men were present many times to see them play, and for the most part they gaue them occasions to fall our, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better know and difcerne the natural disposition of enery one of them, and whether they gaue any fignes or tokens in time to come to become cowards or valiant men. Touching learning, they had as much as ferued their turnefor the rest of their time they spent in learning how to obey, to away with paine, or endure labour, to ouercome still in fight. According to their growth and yeares, they did change the exercises of their bodies: they did shaue their heads, they went bare-legged, they were constrained to play naked together the most part of their time. After they were past twelve yeares of age, they wore no longer coates; and they gave them yearely but one fily gowne. This was the cause they were alwaies so nastie & sluttish, and they never yied to bath or noint themselves, sauing onely at certaine daies in the yeare, when they were suffered to tast of this refreshing. They lay & flept together upon beds of straw, which they themselves did make of the tops of reeds or canes that grew in the river of Eurotas: which they were forced to go gather and breake themfelucs with their hands, without any toole or iron at all. In the Winter, they did mingle thiftle downe with these, which is called Lycophonas, because that stuffe seemeth somewhat warme of it felfe. About this time, the fauourers and likers of this pretie youth, which were commonly the Infliest and best disposed youths of the citie, began to be ofter in their company: and then the old men took the better regard vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exercises, and where their vse was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should mock another. This did their old me, not by way of pastime only, but with such care and harry loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, masters, & gouernors, while they were boyes:infomuch as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not alwaies fome to admonish, reproue, or correct the, if they did a fault. Notwithstanding at this, there was euer one of the honestest men of the civie, who had expresly the charge and gouernance of these boyes. He did deuide them in companies, & afterwards gaue the overfight of them to fuch a one of the boyes as was difereeteft, the manlieft, the most hardie, and of the best courage amongst them. They called the children that were past infancy two yeares, Irene: and the greatest boyes Melirenes as who would fay, readie to go out of boyerie. This boy who was made ouerfeer of them, was commonly twenty yeares of age. He was their captaine whethey fought, & did command them as his feruants when they were in the house: and willed them which were strongest and the most growne, to carrie wood when they should prepare dinner or supper; & those which were least and weakest, to go gather herbes, which they must steale or lacke them. So they went out to steale, some in gardens, some at the markets, other in the halles where the feasts were kept, and men did catetogether, into the which they conucyed them felues as closely and cunningly as they could deuise: for if they were taken with the maner, they were scourged terribly, because they were fo groffe and negligent, and not fine and cunning in their faculty. They stole also all other kind of meate, what foeuer they could get or lay hands on. They pried and fought at occafions how to take and steale meate handsomely, both when men were asseepe, or else that they were careleffe, or did not give good heed vnto them. But he that was taken with the maner, had his payment roundly, and was punished with fasting besides: for they had but a slender pittance; because necessity should drive them to venter boldly, and wit should find out all devices to steale finely. This was the chiefest cause, why they gave them so small a diet. The second cause was, that their bodies might grow vp higher in height. For the vitall spirits not being occupied to concoct and digest much meat, nor yet kept down, or spread abroad by the quantity or ouerburde thereof, do enlarge the selues into length, & shoot up for their lightnes: & for this reason they thought the body did grow in height and length, having nothing to let or hinder the rifing of the same. It feemeth that the felf fame cause made them fairer also. For the bodies that are leane & slender, do better and more easily yeeld to nature, which bringeth a better proportion & forme to energy member: and contrariwife, it feemeth thefe groffe, corpulent, and ouer-fed bodies do encounter nature, and be not fo numble and pliant to her, by reason of their heatic substance. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a litle before their time, & be somewhat cast before they should have bene borne, be smaller and fairer also, and more pure commonly then other that go their time: because the matter whereof the body is formed, being more supple and plyant, is the eafilier weilded by nature, which giveth them their shape and forme. Touching the naturall cause of this effect, let vs give place to other to dispute it that will, without our further deciding deciding of the fame. But to returne to the matter of the LACED EMONIANS children: They did robbe with fo great care, and feare to be discouered, that they tell of one, which having stolen a littlefoxe, did hide him vnder his cloke, and suffered him with his teeth and clawes to teare out all his belly, and neuer cried, for feare he should have bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he stood. This is not vncredible, by that we see young boyes do abide at this day: for we have seene diverse, which have bidden whipping even to death, vponthe altar of Diana, furnamed orthia. Now this vnder mafter, who had the charge of enery company of dildrens these boyes, vied after supper (fitting yet at the table) to bid one of them sing a song: to another exercises he put foorth a question, who was to be well aduised of his answer, as for example: Who is forest the honestest man in the cities or how thinkest thou by that such a one dids By this exercise they were enured from boyes state, to judge of things well or ill done, and to vaderst and the life and gouernement of their citizens. For which of them did not answer quickely and directly to these questions, Who is a good man, who is an honest citizen, and who not: they thought it was a figne of a dull wit, and carelesse nature, not given to any vertue, for defire of honour and estimation. Furthermore this vnder mafter was ever to waite for his answer, and to see it should be briefe and well knit vp in words : otherwise his punishment that answered crossely, or to little purpose, was, that his master bit him by the thumbe. This he did many times in the presence of the old men & magistrates of the citie, that they might see whether he punished them with reafon or not, and according to their deferuing. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone away, then was he himfelfe rebuked and panished, if he had corrected them too fore, or contrarily had favoured them too much. Moreover they did afcribe the good or ill opinion conceined of the children, vnto enery of their fanourers and louers, which did affect and entertaine them: in as much as they fay, a young boy vpon a time fighting with another, and a cry feaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yeeld, his fauourer and louer was straight condemned by the officers of the cities to a fire. Albeit this loue was athing euen incorporated into them, that the most honest and vertuousest women loued the young maides thus also: yet was there no icalousie nor suspition that grew The Lace. hereof, but rather to the contrarie, there grew a maruellous mutuall loue and kindnes betweene demonstrate them, which lived in one selfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, did denife boing. how to make the child they loued in common, the wifeft, the gentleft, and the best conditioned aboue all other. They taught these children to speake in such fort, that their speech had ever in it a pleafant grace, and in few words comprehended much matter. For Lyeurgus ordained, a great maile and weight of iron money, should be but litle worth, and of a small value, as we have told you before; and contrarily, that speech in few words, without any affectation, should hold much shore deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long filence, should freeth be briefe and nithin in their answers. For an the Good of inconvisions which are not had taught as be briefe and pithie in their answers. For as the seed of incontinent men which are too busic mang the with enery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bring foorth fruit: enen fo immoderate speech, full of words & busic tattle, bringeth forth as little sence. Hereof it cometh, that the answers of the Laconians were so short and wittie. As they say, king Agis answered on a day an ATHENIAN, who iesting at the swords the LACED EMONIANS did weare, faid they were fo short, that these tumblers and juglers did swallow them downe in the fight of all the world: And yet, faid Agis, we hurt our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of fpeaking : which is not to fpeake much, but when they speake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers understand them. I thinke also that Lyeurgus selfe, was short and quick in his talke. For so a man may conjecture by his answers which are written as that which he made to one who earnestly prayed him to stablish a popular state in Laced Emon, that the basest might haucas great authority as the highest. Beginne wife an. (quoth he) to do it first in thine own house. And as that also which he answered another who sweet. asked him, why he had appointed fo finall things, and fo little of value to be offered to the gods: Because (quoth he) we should never cease to honour them. And as that which he spake another Lecurgus time, touching fights and frayes, which was : that he did neuer forbid his citizens any of them, but to God but those wherein they vse to give their hand, as you would say, to yeeld. Men find also such band is to like answers, in some of his letters written to his citizens, as when they asked him: How can we confess defend our selues against our enemies? He answered: If ye be poore, and one doe couet no more then another. And in another letter that was fent, where he discourseth, whether it were

requifire to inclose the citie with walles: he faith, can that city be without walles, which is enuironed with men, though it be vncompassed with stone? Neuerthelesse it is hard to resolue, whether those letters, and other such like that are shewed, be to be beleeved, or discredited to be his. But that long foeech was much difliked, and reproved among the LACED AMONIAN s,it is manifeffly to be seene by the words, which some amongst them have hertofore answered. As king Leonidas faid one day to one that difcourfed with him many good things, but out of feafon: Friend, thou speakest many good words, but to litle purpose. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycureus, being asked why his yncle made to few lawes; Becaufe, faid he, to men of few words, few lawes will ferue. And Archidamidus faid thus to some which reproued Hecateus the Orator, for that being bidde to supper at one of their feasts, he spake not a word all supper time: He who can speak well knowethalfo when to fpeake. And where I have told before, that in their feate and quicke antiwers commonly there was some pretie grace, it may be well seene and knowne by thefe that follow. Demeratus answered a busic fellow who troubled him too much with vaine importunate questions, asking him still: who was the honestest man of LACED EMONE Even he that is least like thy felfe. And Agis faid to some which highly praised the Elilans for their vpright judgement, and inst dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in fine yeares space the Elians one day do good instice? And Theopompus likewise to a stranger, who as defirous to flew his affection he bare the LACED ÆMONIANS, told him how every body called him Philolacon (as to fay) a louer of LACHD EMON. It were more honeftic for thee (faid he) to be named Philopolites, a lower of her citizens. And Philonan the forme of Paulanias when an Oratour of ATHENS faid the LACED AMONIANS were vinlearned and ignorant: Thou fayeft true, quoth he, for we only of all the Grecians have learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamides to one that demanded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enow faid he to drive away the wicked. We may confecture also their manner of fpeaking, by their words in mirth, which they spake sometimes playing wise: for they did neuer vie to speake vaine words at randon, but it had alwaies some secret meaning in it, which required anothers good observation that would find it. As he which was defired to goe heare the Nightingale counterfeited naturally: I haue (faid he) heard the Nightingale it felfe. And another which having read this infeription vpon a tombe:

When as they had well quenched tyrannie Throughout their land, by worthy warlike power; Their hap was yet in wretched wife to die, By fealing Selynuntaes frongest tower.

They well deferred death, faid hee, that di our quench tyranny: they fhould have quite confumed it with fire. And one younger boy to another, promifing to give him fuch hardic cocks of the game, as should die in the place where they fough. O give me not those (faid he) which will die, but those which with fighting will kill others. Another seeing men fitting in coaches and litters as they went: God forbid (faid he) that I should euer six in a chaire, where I could not rise to my elders. Such were their answers and encounters. So that seme had reason which said heretofore, to fpeake LACONIAN like, was to be Philosopher like: as you would fay, more to exercife the mind, then the bodie. Berides all this, they did fludieto fing well, and to make goodly ditties and fongs. Then they spake most properly and featly. There was in their fongs also a certaine motion, I wote not what, which stirred vp the hearers hearts, and did kindle desire in them to do notable feats. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter grave and morall, containing for the most part the praise of those which were slaine in battell for the desence of their countrie, as being happiemen; and a shame to those that line, which for faint hearts refused foto die, to leade a miserable and vnfortunate life. Or else they sang how they were the patternes for time to come, or the right glory of the world, and the true representation of vertuous men; as the fong would best become their ages which did sing. It shall not be impertinent for the better vnderstanding hereof, to bring you here an example. For in their open feasts, there were alwaies three dances, according to the difference of the three ages. The dance of the old men, thus began first for to sing:

We have bene young and strong, yet valiant heretofore. Till crooked age did hold ws backe, and bad ws do no more.

The young men followed after, finging:

We yet are yong bold frong, and readie to maintaine, That quarrell still against all men that do on earth remaine.

The third was of children that came after and faid:

And we do hope as well, to passe you all at last, And that the world shall witnesse be, ere many yeares be past.

To conclude, who nearely will confider the works and makings of the Lacon Poets (whereof some are yet extant) and will mark also the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the found and meafire wherof they marched in arrays going to charge the enemy the shall find that Terpander and Pindarus, had reason to joyne hardinesse with musicke. For Terpander speaking of the LACE- Terpander DÆMONIANS, faith in a place:

This is that land where deeds of chinalrie, Did flourish most in many a martiall feate: where musicke made her choise of harmonie. And instrice kept her stately royall seate.

And Pindarus speaking of them, also saith:

There: grave aduife, is found in aged braines: There : gallant youths are luftie lads indeede. Which can both fing and dance in courtlike traines: Yet daunt their foes with many a doughtie deede.

By which testimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and described them to have loued mufick, and the warres together. For as another LACON Poet faith:

It fitteth well, and is a feemely thing, For such as spend their time in feates of warre: To have the skill, sweete sonnets for to fing, And touch the harpe without enlangling larre.

For this cause therfore in all their warres, when they should give battell, the King did first facrifice to the Muses, to put the souldiers in mind (as it should seeme) of the discipline and wisdome of the Mules that they had bene brought up in, to the end that when his fouldiers were in the most extreme danger, the Muses should present themselves before the souldiers eyes, to pricke them forwards to do fome noble acts of worthy memorie. In their time of war, they did tollerate their yong men a little of their hard and old accustomed life, and suffered them then to trim their haires, to haue braue armour, to were gay apparell, and tooke as great delight therein, Thelong to feethem gallant and lustie, as to behold yong neying and snorting horses; desirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did vie to weare long haire: yet Laconians. were they never to carefull to combe and brush their heads, as when they should to the battell. For then they did noint themselues with sweet oyles, and did shed their haire, remembring Lycurgus faying: who was wont to tell them, that haires to them which were faire, did make them more faire, and to them that were foule, they made them more vgly and dreadfull. The exercifes alfo of their bodies, were more casie and gende, and not so hard and straight in their warres, as they were in peace: and generally, their whole manner of life was nor then fo straightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they onely were the men of the world, to whom warres were made a rest from labour, which men ordinarily doe endure, to make them the began bate fitter for the warres. Afterwards when their armie was fet in battell ray, euen in the face of toll the enemies, the King did straight facrifice a goate vnto the gods, and forthwith commanded all his fouldiers to purtheir garlands of flowers on their heads, and willed show he rives flow I. all his fouldiers to put their garlands of flowers on their heads, and willed that the pipes should wheather found the fong of Castor, at the noise and tune whereof, he himselfe begaune first to marched marched. forward. So that it was a maruellous pleasure, and likewise a dreadfull sight, to see the whole battell march together in order, at the found of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confound their rankes, nor to be difinated nor amazed themselves, but to go on quietly and toyfully at the found of these pipes, to hazard themselues even to death. For it is likely, that such courages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercome with much furie; but rather they have an affured constancie and valiantnesse in good hope, as those which are backed with the affifting fauour of the gods. The king marching in this order, had alwaies some about him, which had before time wonne the prifes in games and iustes. And they fay there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great summe of mony at the games Olympicall, notto present himself at them, but he refused it, liking better with great paine to win the prife, then for much money ro lose his honour. Whereupon the one said vnto him, Lacon I an and what hast thougotten now to carry away the prife with fo much fivet? The LACONIAN answered him laughing: I shall fight in the battel, faith he before the King. When they had once broke into their enemics, they did ftill fiercely & fiercelier fet vpon them, and did neuer ceaffe, vntil their enemies gaue way & fled: and then they chased and followed them still, until such time as their overthrow and flight. had affured them of the victory. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, judge ing it to be no manhood, neither part of a noble mind, or of fo worthy a nation as the GRECI-ANS were to kill & hew in peeces men fo feattered & out of order having for faken all the hope of victory. This fell out not only honourable, but also very profitable for them. For they which were in battell against them, knowing they killed none but such as resisted stoutly, and how they did let other go which fled before them: they found it was more their benefit to flie, then to tarrie and abide the strokes. Hippias the sophister faith, that Lyonigus himselfe was a very good captaine, and a great fouldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fields; and Philostephanas afcribeth to him the device to put horfemen in troupes & companies, which they called oulames. whereof fifty men at armes was a troupe, whose maner was to put themselues in squadrons. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwife, that Lyourgus was ever at the wars, and that he made all his lawes and gouernement in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of wars during the plaies Olympical, which they fay he deuised, doth shew in appearace that he was a gentle natured man, and one that loued quietnes and peace. Some not withflanding (amongst whom Hermippus was one) fay, he was not with Iphius at the first beginning when he ordained the plaies Olympicall, but that by chance he happened to come thither, paffing by in his journey only, and that he stayed there to see the games: where he thought he heard the voice of a man behind him. faying, he maruelled much why he did not perfwade his citizens also to be partners of this new deuice: and turning backe to fee who it was that fpake to him, he faw no body. Whereupon he tooke a conceit that it was a speech from the gods : and went therfore presently to seek out Tobis. tus, with whom he made all the statutes and orders of the feast, which afterwards were far more famous, better ordered, & more stately then before. But to return eagain to the LACEDEMO-NIAN st their discipline and order of life continued still, after they were full growne men. For it was not lawfull for any man to line as helifted, butthey were within their city, as if they had bene a campe, where every man knoweth what allowance he hath to live withall, and what bufinesse he hath else to do in his calling. To be short, they were all of this mind, that they were not borne to ferue themselues, but to serve their countrey. Therefore if they were commanded nothing elfe, they went continually to fee what the children did, & to teach them formwhat which might profit the comon weale, or elfe they went to learne of those which were their elders. For one of the best and happiest things which Lyourgus cuer brought into his city, was the great rest & leifure which he made his citizens to haue, only forbidding them that they should not professe any vile or base occupation: and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goods were nothing profitable nor effected. For the Ilotes, which were made bodme by the wars, did till their grounds, & yeelded them a certain reuenue euery yeare. And as touching this matter, they tel of a LACED EMONIAN, who being on a day at ATHENS where the law was pleaded, did understand that a citizen there was condemned for idlenes, and how he went home to his house very forrowful, accompanied with his friends which were fory for him, and greatly lamented his ill hap: the Laced Amonian then prayed those which were about him, to shew him the man condemned for living nobly, and like a gentleman. I have alledged this, to fliew how he thought it a vile and feruile thing to exercife any handy craft, or to work any thing by hand to get money. For fuites in law, a man may be well affured they were banished with the gold & filter from LACED AMON, confidering now there was no more avarice nor couetoufneffe there, nor yet pouertie nor lack, but equality with abundance, and quiet life with sobriety. All other times but when they had warres, they followed dancing, feasts, playes, bankets, hunting, or other exercises of body, and meetings to passe the time away. For the young men yntill they came to thirty yeares of age, neuer went into the market to buy any prouision or things for the house, but did their fathers or their friends businesse; nay it was a stame for the oldest me, to haum the market too often. As to the contrary, it was honourable for them to be present at the fliew place the most part of the day, where they diversly exercised their bodies, & likewise to be at the places of affembly, there to fpend time with walking together, and discoursing honestly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffick, or mony. For all their talke (for the most part) was about the praising of some honest thing, or sporting wise to reproue some dishonesty, which alwaies caried with it some gentle less or monitio by the way. For Lycurgus was not such a sourc mã, as they neuer saw him laugh; but as Sosibius writeth, it was he that first sacrificcd to the litlegod of laughter, which is at LACED EMON, because he would mingle their feasts & affemblies with mirth, as a pleafant fawce to cafe the trouble of their strict & hard life. To be briefe, he did accultome his citizens fo, that they neither would not could line alone, but were in The Lagremaner as men incorporated one with another, & were alwaies in company together, as the bees demonstrate be about their master bee: still in a continuall loue to serue their country, to win honour, and to aduance the common-weale. Which affection of theirs is plaine and eafly seene to be imprinted shemselves in them by certain of their answers, as in that which Padaretus faid on a time, being left out of the inthecom. election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his house mery & iocond Pedaretus as might be, faid: It did him good to fee there were three hundred found better in the citie than faying. himself. Pissfratidas also being sent ambassador with certain other to the lieutenants of the kine of Persia, the Persian Lords asked him, if they came of their owne defire; or whether they were fent from the whole state: If we obtaine, said he, it is from the state: if we be denied; then we come of our selucs. And Argileonidathe mother of Brasidas, asked some that wetto visit her after they were returned home to LACED EMON from their journey to AMPHIPOLIS, if her fonne died like a man, & a worthy Spartan; and they straight commended him highly, daying: There was not left in all LACED EMON fuch a valiant man. She replied vnto them. Say not fo, my friends, I pray you: for Brasidas was indeed a valiant man, but the countrey of LACONIA hath many moe yet valianter then he was. Now touching their Senate, Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them. The first that were thereof, were Lyangus chiefe aiders and assisters of that erection, as we have declared before: but afterwards he ordained, that when any of those first The manshould happen to die, they should chuse in his place the most honest reported man in the citie, so "er of choohe were threefcore yeares old and aboue. This was the nobleft glory that could be among men, Senate in whea man bore the bel & praise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest amongst Sparta. the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for liberty to speake, sourraigne authority to gouerne, and princely power ouer the commonweale, the honor, the life, and the goods of the whole citizens: howbeit the election was made after this fort. The people first assembled in the market place, where there were some appointed & shut vp thereabout in a house, from whence they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assentbled, but only they might heare the noise which they made there: For the people by their crie & shout, did declare whom they did chuse, and whom they did resuse of the competitours; as they vsed to shew their liking by the like crie in other things. The competitours were not brought in, and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lotfel, paffed through the midst of the assembly of the people, and faid neuer a word. The people straight that liked, made a cric or shout aloud. The men appointed which were locked vp, had books or tables in which they wrote & noted the greatnes of the cry & shout the people made, as enery competitor passed by not knowing nor seeing who he was. These hidden men did only fet down in their books, the first, the second, the third, and so many more, as by shouts and cries they perceived did passe thus through the assembly. They noted also in their said books, which of those had the greatest cry & shout of people at their passing through: and him they came and declared to be Senator chosen. Then he wearing a garland of howers on his head, went to althe was to althe temples of the gods in the citie to give thankes, having a great traine of young men following, domethe seand praising of his vertues. There went also with him a maruellous company of women singing thosen. fongs of his praise, & how blessed he was that he had lived so vertuously. Then every one of his kinne prepared a banquet for him at home at their houses, and as he entred the house, they said vnto him: The citie honoureth thee with this banquet. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinary place of their eating, where he did in all things as he was accustomed, sauing he was serucd now at his table with a double allowance, whereof he referued the one. After supper; all his kinsewomen stood in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: so he called her whom he loued best, and gaue her his allowance he had faued, and said to her : This was given me intoken I was this day rewarded for my vertue; and even fo I give it thee for a like token of reward for thy vertue. Then was the brought home by all the women there to her house, euen in like fort as he was by the men. Touching burials, Lycurgus made a wife order: For first of all, to cut offall superstition of burying places, he commanded they should bury the dead within the citie, and that their graves should be round about their temples, that young persons might have them alwayes in their eyes, and not be affraid to fee a dead body, as if to touch a coarfe, or to paffe by their graues, it should defile a man. Then did he forbid them to bury any thing with the coarse, & willed they should only lap it vp in a red cloth, with olive leaves. It was not lawful to grave the name of any dead body vpon his graue, but only of fuch a man as died in the warres, or of some The sime of holy woman professed into their temples. Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very fhort. For it lasted not but eleuen daies, & on the twelf h day, they must do sacrifice to Proferfina, and so leave off their mourning. To conclude, hee left nothing idle, or vnworking in his citizens: for to all necessary things which men cannot lack, Lycurgus ioyned ever a certaine emulation of men; as to defire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furnished his city with many good precepts and examples, among which his citizens being fill borne and bred vp, and having the fame in enery place before their eyes wherethey went, they came to passe in time to be framed after the very patterne and mould of vertue it felfe. For this cause did he not suffer any to travell out of the country, or to go abroad as he would, without special licence, for scare less those which trauelled abroad for the ir pleasure, should bring home strange fashions and manners, & a corrupt disordered life, which by litle and litle might get way, and bring an alteration and change of the whole flate. Furthermore, he kept out of Sparta all flrangers, except those which had neces fary bufineffe there, or were come thither for fome profit to the country: not that he was a fraid they should learne something wherby to love vertue, or that they should defire to follow his fashion and manner of gouernement, as Thucydides was: but rather fearing they should teach his citizens some naughty manners, or some ill fauoured vice. For it must needs be, that strangers bring euer ftrange and new deuices with them: which new deuices bring with them also new o pinions: and new opinions beget new affections and minds, that many times are repugnant to the law, and to the forme of the common-weale established before, as discords do many times in an harmony of muficke, that before agreed very well together. Therfore he judged it a thing most necessary, to keep his city free and fafe from counterfaiting of any strangers manners or fashions, that were commonly as persons infected with some contagious sicknesse. Now in all we have spoken before, even to this place, there is no maner of token or shew of injustice, or lack of equity, wherewith fome feeme to burden Lyourgus in his lawes: by faying they were well made, to make men warlike and valiant, but not to be just and righteous. But concerning the law they call Cippiia, as much to fay, as their fecret: if it were of Lyourgus institution, as Aristotle faith, in might have caried Plato into the like opinion that Lyeurges had of his common-weale. This was the law: The gouernors which had the charge and ouerfight of the yong men, at certaine appointed times, did chuse out those they thought to have the best discretion, and sent them abroad into the country, some one way, some another way, who caried with them daggers, and some prouision to feed them. These young men being thus dispersed abroade in the country, did hide themschees all the day close in secret places, and there they lay and tooke their rest afterwards when night was come, they went to feek out the high waies, & killed the first of the ILOTE s that they met. Sometimes euen in the broad day, they went into the country to kill the strongest and stoutest of them:as Thueydides telleth in his history of the wars of Peloponnesvs, where he saith: That a certaine convenient number of the ILOTES were crowned, by a publike proclamatio of the Spartans: and being infranchifed for their good services they had done the commonweale, they were caried to all the temples of the gods for an honour. Within a while after, no man knew what was become of them, being about two thouland in number: fo that neuer man heard tell neither then nor fince, how they came to their deaths. How beit Aristotle aboue all others faith, that the Ephores, fo soone as they were placed in their offices, made warre with the ILOTE s, because they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardly. For they forced them fomtimes to drink wine without water out of meafure, till they had made them starke drunk. Then they brought them all into their common hals where they did eate, to make their children to behold them, and to fee what beaftlineffe it was for a man to be drunk. Likewife they made them fing fongs, and daunce daunces, vnfit for honest men, and such as were full of derision and mockery; and did forbid them expressly to sing any honest fongs. So it is reported, that in the journy the Therans made to LACONIA, many of the ILOTES were taken prisoners thereat, & when they were commanded to sing the verses of Terpander, or of Aleman, or of Spendon the Laconian, they would not do it: faying, they durft not fing Diedorm the for their masters. Wherfore he that first said in the courty of LACED EMONIA, he that is free is more free, and he that is bond, is more bond then in other places: knew very well the diverfity betweene the liberty and bondage there, and the liberty and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the LACED ÆMONIANS bega to vse these great outrages & cruckies, long time after the death of Lyourgus, and specially since the great earthquake that happened at Sparta, at which time the ILOTE's rose against them with the MESSENIANS, and did great mischiefethorough the countrey, and put the citie to the greatest distresse and danger that ever it had. For I cannot be perswaded, that cuer Lyourgus invented, or instituted, so wicked and mischieuous an act, as that kind of ordinance was: because I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and inflice we fee he vsed in all his other doings, and was witnessed besides by open oracle from the gods, for a iust and wise man. Furthermore, they say of him, that when he saw the chiefest points of his gouernement had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his commonweale went on; and was strong inough to maintaine and keepe it selfe on foot, like as Plato saith, Platoin that Godreioyccd greatly after he had made the world, and faw the fame turne and mouchis first moning: euen so Lycurgus taking singular pleasure and delight in his mind, to see his notable lawes put in vre, and so well established and liked of by experience, sought yetto make them immortal, as neere as he could possible, by any forecast of man, that no after time what socuer, might change or put them downe. To bring this to passe, he caused all the people to assemble, and told them he thought his civil policie & frate of common weale was already sufficiently established, for vertuous and happie life; yet there was one matter behind of greater importance then all the rest, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntill he had first asked counsell of the oracle of Apollo. And therfore in the meane time they should keepe and observe his lawes and ordinances Lycurgus inuiolably, without changing, remouing, or flaying any matter therein, vntill he were returned from the city of DELPHES, and then they should do that other thing behind, if the god then so fabishing couselled him. They all promised him to do it, and praied him to make hast to go on his journey. his lawer. But before he departed, he made the kings and fenators fweare first, and consequently at the people after, that they would keep his lawes & ordinances without changing or altering any thing, vntill he did returne againe. This done, he went to the city of DELPHES, where so soone as he arriued, he facrificed in the temple of Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man line an happie life. Apollo made him answer, his lawes were very good, and that his city keeping them, should be the most renowned of the world. Lyengus caused this oracle to be written, which he fent to Spanta. After he facrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leave of his friends, and of his son, he determined to die, because his citizens should neuer be released of the oath they had made betweene his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath strength inough to line longer; and yet was old inough also to die if he would. Wherfore finding himself happieto have obtained his defire, he willingly pined himfelfe to death, by abstinence and lacke of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit ever to the common-weale, and that the end of their life should be no more idle or unprofitabe, the the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious acts, to have their death extolled for worthinesse. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfectio & crown of his felicity, after he had made & ordained fo many good and notable lawes, for the honor and benefit of his country; and should be as a scale of cofirmation of his law, and the continuall preferuitour of his citie, confidering all his citizens had fworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceived of his hope, for his city was the chiefest of the world, in glory and honour of gouernement, by the space of trungus fine hundred yeares. For folong his city kept his lawes without any change or alteration by any of the Kings successions, virtil King Agis, the some of Archidamus began to reigne. For the King Agis the some of the kings successions, virtil King Agis, the some of Archidamus began to reigne. For the King Agis the some of the laws of Lycureus, but reducreation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor discontinue any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more straight and strict order: althogh it seemed at the first that the Ephores were ordained for the maintenance and defence of the liberty of the people, whereas indeed Money torthey did also strengthen the authority of the Kings and Senate. Now in the reigne of King Agis, gold and filter beganne first to creepe in againe to the city of SPARTA, by meanes of

Lysander. With money there came in straight couetousnes, and greedines to get and gather. And although Lysander was not defirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money : yet hee brought riches and couctousnesse into the countrey, and filled the same with all finenes, by bringing in great store of gold and filuer from the wars, directly against the lawes and ordinances of Lycurgus. The which folong as they were in force and vsc, it appeared that the gouernement of SPARTA seemed not to be a policie or common-weale, but rather a certain holy place and order of religion. And euen as the Poets faine, that Hercules went through the world with his club and Lions skinne, punishing cruell robbers, and vnnaturall tyrants, so in like case with a little scrole of parchment, and a poore cape, did the Spartans command and give lawes to all the rest of GRECE, even with their good liking and confent. And they chased the tyrants away, which vsur. ped tyrannicall power ouer any of their cities, and did decide all controuersies, and oftentimes pacified their seditions, without fending out one souldier, but only a simple poore ambassadour. At whose commandement, the people presently assembled like the bees, which gather together about their king, so soone as they spie him: they did then so greatly reuerence the good gouernment and inflice of the Spartans. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which fay, the city of LACED EMON could obey well, but not command: and for proofe they alledge words of king Theopompus, who answered one which faid, that SPARTA was maintained, because the kings could command wel. Nay, the rather (faid he) because the citizens can obey wel. For men com. monly disdaine to obey those which are not wise in commanding. So that the faithful obedience of the subjects, dependent much upon the sufficient comandement of the wise prince. For he that directeth wel, must needs be wel obeyed. For like as the art of a good rider, is to make his horse gentle, and ready at commandement: euen fo the chiefest point belonging to a Prince, is to teach his subjects to obey. Wherefore the LACED EMONIANS procured, that not only other people did willingly obey them, but also defired to be ruled and commanded by them. For they asked them, neither ships nor money, nor yet did send them any number of men of warre to compell them, but only they fent one citizen of Sparta to gouerne them, to whom all the other people fubmitted themselves, and were holpen by him in their necessity, as fearing & reverencing him. Inthis wife the Sicilians were holpen by Gylippus, the Chalcidonians by Brasidas, and al the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lyfander, Callicratidus, and by Agefilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of Princes, peoples and Kings, vnto whom they were fent here and there: but ever they had their eye vpon the city of Sparta, as vpo the most perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common-weale after. To this effect tended the mery word spoken in iest by Stratonicus: who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their facrifices, and the Elians to tend their games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACED EMONIANS should be well whipped. That was merily spoken, and in a lesting manner. But Antisthenes (the Philosopher and one of Socrates schollers) seeing the THEBANS growne very hawty and glorious, after that they had conquered the LACED EMONIANS in the journey of LEVCTRES: Mee thinketh, faid he, these Thebans here do like the schoole-boyes, which brag and reioyce, when they have a lttle beaten their master. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to have his city to command many. But he thought the felicity of a citie, as of a private man, confifted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, & in the vnity of the inhabitants therof. He framed his common-wealth to this end, that his citizens should be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintaine and keepe themselues long in safety. The selfe same intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in fetting forth their bookes, which they wrote of the gouernment of common-weales: and so had likewise many other great and learned men which haue written of the same matter. How beit they only left behind them words, and written books: but Lycurgus contrariwise, left no written bookes nor pamphlets, but stablished and left behind him a royall forme of gouernement, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainely see a whole citie line together, and gouerne it felfe philosophically, according to the true rules and precepts of perfect wisdome: which imagined that true wisedome was a thing hanging in the ayre, and could not visibly be seene in the world. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glory all those, which ever tooke vpon them to write or stablish the gouernement of a common-weale. And therefore faith Aristotle, that after his death they did him leffe honor in LACED EMONIA, the he had deserved albeit they did him all the honor they possibly could deuise. And yet they built a temple for him, and made solemne facrifice to him enery yearc, as vnto a god. More, they fay, that when the affies of his body were Divine last brought to Sparta, there fell straight lightning vpon his tombe where they were put, which Mourage Lythey had not often leene to happen to other men of name after their decease, fauing onely to war in the least the Poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neare the citie of ARETHYSA. The which is some manifest argument, for such as loue the Poet, to lay against them that somewhat depraue him, seeing this signe came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well beloued man of the gods. Some fay, Lyourgus died in the citic of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis faith, he died in ELIDA. Timeus and Arsfloxenus write, he ended his daies in CRETA. And Aristoneous saith further, that those of the Ile of CRETA doe shew his graue in the place which they call Pergamia, by the broade high wayes fide. He left one only begotten for named Antiorus, who died without iffue, to that his houte and name failed with him. But his neare kinfmen and familiar friends, did fet yn a company or brotherhood in memoria of him related.

Lycurgus men and familiar friends, did fet vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the daies wherein they affembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Ariftocrates (the sonne of Hisparchus) who faith, that he being dead in Chera, his friends burned his body, and afterwards threw his aftes into the fea, according as he had praied and requested them. For he feared, that if any part of him should at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitants would have faid he was returned againe, and thereby would have thought themselves discharged of their oath, and might have lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the discourse and end of Lycurgus life.

THE LIFE OF Numa Pompilius.

HE Historiographers differ maruellously of the time, in which Numa In what Pompilius reigned king, albeit some will deriue fro him many noble houfes descended in Rome. For one Clodius, who wrote the book intituled, Gierode the table of time, affirmeth that the ancient registers of the city of Rome Trigula were lost when it was taken and sacked by the GAVLES: and that those Liu Hawhich are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men de- lie, lib. 4. firous to gratifie fome, which have thrust in ancient houses and families of the first Romaines, that concerne nothing them whom they meant to represent. On the other side, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familiar friend and schollar of Pythagoras the Philosopher, yet some say he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. And yet maintaining that it is possible enough, that he was fo well borne, and had fuch perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer needed any mafter: and though he had needed, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this king vnto some other forreine personathat was more excellent then Pythagotas. Other fay, that Pythagoras the Philosopher was long time after the reigne of Numa, & well-nigh fine ages after him. Howbeit other fay, there was another Pythagoras borne in Sparta (who having won the prize in running at the games Olympicall, in the fixteenth Olympiad, & the third yeare of Nu. maes reigne) did come into ITALIE, where he kept much about Numa, and did affift and helpe tanghe Nu. him in the gouerning and ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many customes yet of the Laconians, mingled with the Romains, which this fecond Pythagoras was faid to haue taught him. Neuertheles it is not confessed that Numa was borne of the Sabynes, which they fay are descended from the LACED EMONIANS. So it falleth out hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was and chiefly for such as will follow the roll or table of those, which from Olympiades to Olympiades have won the prizes of games Olympicall: confidering the roll or table that they have at this present, was very lately published by one Hippins an Elian, who deliuereth no reason or argument of necessit, why it should be taken for an vindoubted troth, which he in that fort hath gathered. Y et we will not leaue to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meeteft. It was now fince Rome was built, feuen and thirty yeares (for fo long time reigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifth of the month of July (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a folemne facrifice without the city, neare to a certain place commonly called, the goate marsh. As all the whole Senate, with the most part of the people were present at this facrifice, suddenly there arose in the aire a very great tempest, and a maruellous darke thick cloud, which fell on the earth with fuch boysterous winds, stormes, lightnings, and thunder, that the poore common people being afraid of so fore a tempest, dispersed themselves suddenly, running here and there for fuccour, and therewithall king Romulus vanished away in such fort, that he was neuer after feene aliue nor dead. This brought the Senatours and Noblemen whom they called Patricians, into great fuspition, And there ran a foule tale among the common peopleshow they had long time borne very impatiently to be subjects to a king because themselves would have had & taken upon them some soueraign authority, and that for this cause they had killed king Romulus. Adding somewhat more vnto it, how a little before he had vsed them more roughly, and commanded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Neuertheles they found the meanes to quench all those brutes and murmurings, by doing divine honour and facrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but paffed to a better life. To confirm this, one of the noblest of Romulus men among them called Proclus came in, and by oath affirmed before all the people, that he faw he is named Romulus afcending vp into heaven, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voice fay: From thence foorth call him Quirinus. This being thus appealed, there sprang vp another trouble, to know at Rome 4= whom they should choose in his place. For the itrangers which were come then from other plafing of their ces to dwell in Rome, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne Romaines: in fo much, as the common people did not onely waver, and stagger vp and downe in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many, and of diverse nations) did enter into a suspition one of another. These things notwithstanding they all agreed in this, that of necessity they must choose a king howbeit in the rest they differed much, not onely whom they should choose, but also of what nation he should be. For those which were the first founders and builders of the citie of Rome with Romulus, could in no wifeabide nor fuffer that the Sabynes (to whom they had deuided part of their lands, and a moitie of their citie) should attempt and presume to command them, whom they did receive and affociate into their company and fellowship. The SABYNES alledged on the other fide for them, a good reason, and such as caried great probability. Which was, that neuer fince the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted king Romulus, but had suffered him to reigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being now deceassed, reason would that the new King should be chosen of their nation, And that albeit the Romaines had received them into their citie, they could not fay therefore, that in time of this affociation, they were leffe to be reckoned of in any thing, then themselves. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increased their might & power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deserved the honour and title of a citie. These were the causes of their contention. But to preuent that of this contention there might grow no confusion in the citie if it should remaine without any head to command: the Senators which were a hun- Lime faith dred and fiftie in number, gaue counsell that every one of them by turnes, one after another, should carriethe royall state of the king, and all the shewes and ornaments of his maiestie and Dionsius should do the ordinarie facrifices of the king, and dispatch all causes six hours in the day, & six houres in the night, as the king before had vied. Thus they thought it best to deuide the rule, that Thurs in the life of the rule, that the life of the rule of t one might have a fmuch power as the other, a swell in respect of themselves, as also for regard of Romulus the people. For they imagined, that the changing and remouing thus of this regall dignity, and greeth with Dispaffing it from manto man, would cleanetake away enuie among them, and make every of them minu. to rule temperatly, and vprightly see, that in one and the selfesame day and night, every of them should be a King and private personalso. The ROMAINE's call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would fay, rule for the time. Now albeit their gouernment was very Interregnum. modest and civill, yet the could not for all that keepe themselves from falling into the suspicion and flander of the people: who gaue it out straight, that this was a fine deuice of theirs, to change by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a few Noble mens hands, to the end that the whole authority and gouernment of al publike causes, should remaine still in themselues, because it grieued them to be libiect to a King. And in the end, the two parts of the city came to this agreement: that the one part should choose one of the body of the other, to be the King. This courfe they liked very well, aswell for the pacification of present stirre and dissention amongst themselues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and stirring vp a likenesse of good will in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen whereby he should loue the one part for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other part for that he was of their Nation. The SARYNES were the first, which referred the election to the Romaines choyce: and the Romaines whought it better to choose one of the Nation of the SABYNES, then to have a ROMAINE chofen by the SABYNES. After they had consulted, they determined amongst themselves : and did Numacle choose Numa Pompilsus one of the body of the SABYNES to bee King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at Rome, howbeit he was a man fo famous for his vertue, that the SAEYNEs fo foone as they named him, did receive him more willingly, then they who had chosen him. After they had thus published their election, the first and chiefest persons of the one and the other fide, were chosen out to go vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in Numa one of the chiefest and best cities which the SABYNEs had, called Cures, whereupon the Ro-MAINES and their followers the SABYNES were called afterward Quirites: and he was the fon Cures. of Pon-pontus a Noble man, the youngest of foure brethren: being by the secret working of the Quiries gods, borne on the very day, on the which Rome was first founded by Romelus, which was the whyse calone and twentieth day of April. This man being naturally given and inclined vnto all vertue, The ife & did yet increase the same by studie, and all kind of good discipline : and by the exercise thereof, and of true patience, and right philosophie, he did maruelously adorne himselfe and his manners. For he did not only cleare his foule and mind of all passions and vices commonly vsed in reigns. the world but he conquered in himselfe all heats, violence and couetousnesse. And would neither feeke nor vsurpe that which was another mans; a thing at that time honoured among the most barbarous people: but thought that to be the true and right victory in man, first to conquer and command himfelfe by judgement and reason, and then to subdue all couctous nesses and greedinesse. Having therefore this opinion, he would in no wise have in his house any supersuity or finenesse. He became to enery man that would employ him (aswell stranger as his own country man)a wise counseller, and an vpright judge. Hebestowed his leisure, not to follow his own delight, or to gather goods together but to serue the gods, and to behold their celestial nature & power, as much as mans reason and understanding could comprehend. Therby he got so great a name and reputation, that Tails (which was king of Rome with Romulus) having but one only daughter called Tatia, made him his son in law. Howbeit this marige put him in no such iolity, Tatia the that he would dwell at Rome with his father in law, but rather kept at home at his own house in the countrie of the Sandara there to serve and cherish his old father with his wife Tatia: who the countrie of the SABYNES, there to serve and cherish his old father with his wife Tatia: who for her part also liked better to live quietly with her husband being a private man, then to go to Rome where the might have lived in much honor and glory, by means of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13. yeares after she was maried. After her death, Numa leaving to dwel in the city, was better contented to liue in the country alone, & folitary, & gaue himself to walk much in the fields and woods consecrated to the gods, as one desirous of alone life, far from the company of men. Whereupon was raifed (in my opinion) that which is spoken of him, and of the goddesse Egeria: That it was not for any strangenesse, or melancholinesse of nature, that Nu. ma withdrew himselfe from the conversation and company of men, but because he had found another more honourable and holy focietie of the Nymph, and goddeffe Egeria, who had done him as they fay, that honour, as to make him her husband: with whom as his beloued darling it is faid he enioyed happie daics, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the loue and knowledge of all celestiall things. Surely, these devices are much like vnto certaine old fables of the Phrygians, which they having learned from the father to the fonne, do loue to tell of one Agu: of the Bithynians, of one Herodotus: of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion: and of many other fuch like men, who in their lines were taken for faints, and beloued of the gods. Notwithstanding, it is likely, that the gods loue neither birds, nor horse, but men, and have somtimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and do not disdaine sometime the conversation of fuch as be holy, religious and denout. But to beleeue the gods have carnall knowledge, and do delight in the outward beauty of creatures, that feemeth to carie a very hard beleefe. Yet the wife Æ GYPTIANS thinke it probable enough and likely, that the spirit of the gods hath giuen original of generation to women, & do beget fruit of their bodies: how beit they hold that a man can haue no corporall company with any divine nature. Wherein they do not confider. that every thing that joyneth together, doth deliver againe a like substance, to that wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithstanding, it is meet we should belecuethe gods beare good will to men, and that of it doth foring their loue, whereby men fay, the gods loue those whose manners they purifie and inspire with vertue. And they do not offend, which faine that Phorbas, Hyacinthus and Admetus, were sometimes the louers of Apollo, and also Hypolitus the Sicyonian : of whom they report, that ever when he paffed over the arme of the fea which lieth betweene the cities of Sicyona and of CIRRHA, the god which knew he came, rejoyced, and caused Pythia the Prophetesse to pronounce these heroycall verses:

I know full well, my deare Hypolytus Returnes by few my mind divineth thus.

It is faid also that Pan was in love with Bindaris and his verses, and that the gods honoured Who are beloved of the Poets Hesterdus and Archibocus, after open death, by the Muses. They say moreover that AEsculapius lay with Sophocies in his life time, and at this day they do yet shew many tokens therof and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honourably buried. Now if they grant, that fuch things may be true: how can we refuse to believe, that some gods have bene familiar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroastres, Lucus gus, Numa, and fuch other like perfonages, which have governed Kingdomes, and stablished Common-weales? And it is not valike that the gods indeed did company with them, to infpire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw neare vnto those Poets and plaiers of the harpe, that made and applyed many dolefall and toyfull ditties, at the least for their sport and pleasure onely, if euer they came neare them. Neuertheles if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large, as Bacchylides faid, to thinke and fay as he luft. For my felfe, I do find that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other fuch perfons, not to be without likely hood and probabilitie: who having to gouerne rude, churlish, and stiffe-necked people, and purposing to bring in strange nouclties, into the gouernements of their countries, did faine wifely to have conference with the gods, confidering this faining fell to be profitable and beneficiall to those themselues, whom they made to beleeue the fame. But to returne to our history: Numa was forty yeares old, when the ambassadors of Rome Proclus & were fent to present the kingdome vnto him, and to intreat him to accept therof. Proclus & Velebassadors to sus, were the ambassadors that were sent. One of the which the people looked should have bene offer Numa chosen for King, because those of Romulus side, did fauor much Proclus: & those of Tatius part sauoured Velesus. Now they vsed no long speech vnto him, because they thought he would have beneglad of such a great good fortune. But cotrarily it was indeed a very hard thing, & required great perswasions, & much intreaty, to moue a man which had alwaies lived quietly, and at case, to accept the regiment of a city, which as a man would fay, had bene raifed vp & grown by wars and martiall deeds. Wherefore he answered them in the presence of his father, and one other of the ambas. his kinsmen called Martius in this sort: Change and alteration of mans life is ever dangerous: but for him that lacketh nothing necessary, nor hath cause to coplaine of his present state, it is a great folly to leave his old acquainted trade of life, and to enter into another new and vnknowne, if there were no other but this only respect that he leaueth a certainty, to venter vpon vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the dangers and perils of this kingdome which they offer me, are not altogether vicertaine, if we will looke back what happened vito Romulus: who was not vufulpected to have laid wait, to have had Tatius his fellow and companion murdered: and now after Remulus death, the Senatours felues are mistrusted to have killed him on the other fide by treason. And yet they fay it, and sing it enery where: that Romulus was the son of a God, that at his birth he was miraculoufly preferued, & afterwards he was as incredibly brought vp. Whereas for my owne part, I do confesse, I was begotten by a mortall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men, as you know; and these few qualities which they praise & commend in me, are conditions faire vnmeet for a man that is to reigne. I ever loved a folitary life, quiet and fludy, and did exempt my felfe from worldly causes. All my life time I have sought & loued peace abone all things, and neuer had to do with any warres. My convertation hath bene to company with men, which meet onely to ferue and honor the gods, or to laugh and be meric one with another, or else to spend their time in their private affaires, or otherwise sometime to attend their passures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my Romaine lords) hath lest you many wars begun, which peraduenture you could be contented to spare: yet now to maintaine the fame, your citie had need of a martiall King, actine, and strong of body. Your people moreouer, through long custome, & the great increase they are growne vnto by seates of armes. defire nought elfe perhaps but warres and it is plainely feene, they feeke still to grow, and command their neighbours. So that if there were no other confideration in it, yet were it a meere mockerie for me, to goe to teach a city at this present to serue the gods, to loue instice, to hate wars, and to fly violence: when it rather hath need of a conquering Captaine, then of a peaceable king. These & such other like reasons & perswasions Numa alledged, to discharge himself of the kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit, the ambaffadors of the Romaines most humbly befought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he wold not be the cause of another new ftir & commotion among them, feeing both parts in the city haue given their confent & liking to him alone, and none other to be their king. Moreouer, when the ambaffadors had left him vppon this fuit, his father, and Martius his kinfinan, began also privately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good & godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and defired to be no richer then he was, nor coucted no princely honour nor glory, because he fought onely most famous vertue: yet he must needs think, that to rule well, was to do the gods good feruice, whose will it was to employ the instice they knew in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refule northerefore (quoth they) this royall dignity, which to agraue and wife man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable works and fruits. There you may do noble feruice to the gods, to humble the hearts of these marriall people, and to bring them to be holy & religious: for they readily turne, and eafily conformethemselues vnto the nature of their Prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a stranger: they have confecrated a memory to Rorealiss with divine honours, which they make vnto him at this day. And it may be, that the people feeing themselues conquerors, will be full enough of wars; and the Romaines being now full of spoiles and triumphes, will be glad to have a gentle Prince, & one that loueth inflice, that they may thenceforth line in peace under good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hearts be still full of heat and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their defire to make wars fome other way, when a man hath the bridle in his own hands to do it, and to be a meane in the meane time to joyne the country, and all the nations of the Sarvies in perpetual loue and amirie, with fo mightie and flourishing a citie? Befides all these perswasions and reasons. there were many fignes also (as they say) which promised him good luck, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne country citizens. Who, so some as they understood the coming and commission of the ambassadours of Rome, they importunately desired him to go thither, and to accept the offer of the kingdome: that he might more straightly vnite and incorporate them together with the Romaines. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then simethbia porate them together with the Komaines. Whereupon, Numa accepted the kingdome. I then after he had done facrifice to the gods, he fet forwards on his journey towards Rome: where with the the people and Senate went out to meete him, with wonderfull defire to fee him. The women at his entrie, went bleffing of him, and finging of his praises. They did sacrifice for him, the gods. in all the temples of the gods. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to bee as ioyfull and glad, as if a new Realme, and not a new King, had bene come to the citie of Rome.

Numain. duceth ciwill and aniet life Rep.lib.2.

Thus was he brought with this openioy and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election; and fo by one consent he was chosen king, with all the voices of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himfelf commanded they should be staid a while, saying: He must first be confirmed King by the gods. Then he took the wise men and priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which at that time was Muna was yet called mount Tarpeian. And there, the chiefest of the fouthfayers called Augures, turned him towards the fouth, having his face covered with a veile, and stood behind him, laying his right hand vpon his head, and praying to the gods that it would pleafe them to declare their wills by flying of birds, or some other token concerning this election; and so the southfayer cast his eyes all about, as farre as he could possibly discerne. During all this time there was a maruellous silence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were affembled there together, attending with great denotion what the iffue of this dinination would be wrill there appeared vnto them on the right hand, good and luckie birds, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his royall robes, came downe from mount Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people received him with wonderfull shouts of ioy, as a man the most holy and best beloued of the gods that they could have chosen. So having taken the royall seat of the Kingdome, his first act was this: that he discharged the guard of the three hundred souldiers, which Romulus had alwaics about his person, called Celeres, saying: He would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which should mistrust him. His secondact was, that he did adde to the two priests of Iupiter and Mars, a third in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the ancient Romaines also called their priests, instituted in the old time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle narrow hats which they did weare on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in greeke fignifieth a hat. And at that time(as they fay) there were many mo Greeke words mingled with the Latine, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did weare Lanas. And Iuba faith, that it is the very fame which the GRECIANS call Chlanas & that the young boy which was a feruant in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS do yet call the god Mercurie, because he is seruant of the gods. Now Numa having done these things at his first entrie into his kingdome, still to win further fauour and good wil of the people, began immediatly to frame his citizens to a certaine civility, being as iron wrought to softnesse, and brought them from their violent and warlike defires, to temperate and civill manners. For out of doubt, Rome was properly that, which Plate afcribeth to a city full of trouble & pride. For, first it was founded by the most couragious and warlikemen of the world, which from al parts were gathered theretogether, in a most desperat boldnes, and afterwards it increased, and grew strong, by armes & cotinuall wars, like as piles driuen into the ground, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and flick the faster. Wherfore Numa indging it no small nor light enterprise, to pluck down the haughty stomacks of so fierce & violent a people, and to frame them vnto a sober and quiet life, did feeme to work it by meanes of the gods, with drawing them on therto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their hot and fierce courages to fight, with facrifices, feafts, dancings, and common processions, wherin he celebrated euer himself. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled now & then pastime & pleasure; and somtimes he laid the terror & searce of the gods before their eyes, making the beleeue that he had seen strange visions, or that he had heard voices, by which the gods did threaten them with some great troubles & plagues, alwaics to pull downe and humble their hearts vnto the feare of the gods. This was the cause why they thought afterwards that he had learned his wisdome of Pythagoras the Philosopher:because the greatest part of the philosophy of the one, and of the gouernment of the other, consisted in such ceremonies & dinine studies. They report also that Numa did put on the outward shew & semmuch diske. blance of Pythagoras holinesse, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they fay, made an Eagle fo tame and gentle, that she would stoupe & come downe to him by certaine voices, as she slew in the aire ouer his head. And that passing through the assembly of the games Olympical, he shewed her thigh of gold, and many other prety feats & deeds they tel of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasian hath written these verses of him: Pythagoras which loued to dwell in dignity,

And hath an heart to glory bent, and past in policy.

Much like a man which fought, by charming to enchaunt, Did vee this art to win mens minds which unto him did haunt: His grane and pleasant tongue, in sugred speech did flow,

Whereby he drew most minds of men, to bent of his owne bow. Euen so the fained fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the loue of a goddesse, or some Nymph of the mountaine: with whom he seemed to have certaine secret meetings and talke, whereof we have spoken before. And it is said, he much frequented the Muses in thewoods. For he would fay, he had the most part of his reuclations of the Muses, and he taught the Romaines to reuerence one of them aboue all the rest, who was called Tacita, as ye would Nime fay, Lady Silence. It feemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did fo specially command and recommend silence virolfie schoolers. Against styre considerable and recommend silence virolfie schoolers. ally command and recommend filence vnto lfis schollers. Againe, if we consider what Numa of the Maordained concerning images, and the representation of the gods, it is altogether agreeable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that God was neither fenfible nor mortall, but inuifible, incorruptible, & only intelligible And Numa did forbid the ROMAINE salfo to beleeue, fibelersto that God hath euer forme or likeneffe of beaft or man. So that in those former times, there was in Rome no image of God, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred opinion of threefcore and ten yeares, that they had built temples and chappels vnto the gods in Rome, and yet there was neither picture nor image of God within them. For they took it at the first for a facriledge, to present heauenly things by earthly formes, seeing we canot possibly any way attaine of God. to the knowledge of God, but in mind and understanding. The very facrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreeable and like vnto the maner of ferning of the gods, which the Pythagorians vsed. For in their facrifices they spilt not the bloud, but they did theirs comonly with a litle meale, a litle shedding of wine and milke, and with such other light things. Such as affirme that those two men did much companie & were familiar together, do lay further proofes & argum ets for the same. The first is this that the ROMAINES did make Pythagoras a free man of the Proofesfor of Rome, as Epicharmus the Comicall poet an ancient writer (and sometimes one of Pythather one of Pythather Comicall poet and dedicated ways Antonia The or has proceed in the top werfation gorus schollers) saith in a book he wrote and dedicated vnto Ameror. The other proofe is: that of Nama Numa having had four echildren, called one of them Mamerous, after Pythagoras fonnes name, and Pathafrom whom, they fay, is descended the house of the AEmilians, which is the noblest of the Patricians: for the king gaue him the name of AEmilius, because of his sweete tongue and pleasant voice. Furthermore, I my selfe have heard fay many times in Rome, that the Romaines having receited an oracle, which commanded them to fet vp images in their city, to the wifest and valiantest man that euer was among the GRECIANS, caused two statues of brasse to be set up in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to strine about this matter any further, feeing there are so many doubts, me thinketh it were but vaine. Moreouer they attribute to Numa, the first creetion of the colledge pontificall: and fay, he himselfe was the first Pontifex that cuer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, some flument will fay they were fo called, because they chiefly were ordained and appointed for the fernice of the Almightie: for this word Potens in the Romaine tongue, betokeneth mightie. Webs food-Other thinke this name was giuen to them by their founders, as to exempt persons out of the lad. world: who enjoyned them to do all the feruice and facrifices to the gods they could possibly, and yet notwithstanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most part doc bring out another derination of this name, wherein me thinks there is little reason. As that they should be called Pontifices, because they had the charge and maintenance of the bridge. For that which the G_{RE} CIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem that is, a bridge. And to fay truly, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the Bishops: as well as the keeping of the most holy and vnchangeable ceremonies. For the Romaines thought it not onely a thing vnlawfull, but tooke it for a most damnable and wicked act, to destroy or breake the bridge of wood, which was onely ioyned together (as they fay) with pinnes of wood, and with- The work. out any yron at all, by the commandement of an old oracle. But the stone bridge was desbridge built long time after the reigne of Numa, and in the time of the reigne of his nephew (Mar- at Resid.) tins. Now the first and chiefest of these bishoppes, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the high Priest and master of their pontificall law: who should be carefull, not onely about all publicke facrifices and ceremonies, but also biffue, about such as were private, and to see that no man privately should breake the ancient ceremo. nies, nor bring in any new thing into religion, but rather every man should be taught by him, how, and after what fort he should serue and honour the gods. He also hath the keeping of the holy virgins which they call Vestales. For they do give Numa the first foundation and consecrating of them, and the inflitution also of keeping the immortal fire with honor and reverence, which these virgins have the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to committhe subflance of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the cuftody of cleane and vncorrupt maids : or else because he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, & bringeth forth nothing) was fittest and most proper vnto virgins. For in GRECE, where they kept continual fire likewise (as in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the maidens do not keepe the fame, but old women which are past mariage. And if this fire chace to faile, as they say in Athen s the holy lamp was put out in the time of the tyranny of Antion: and in the city of DELPHES it was put out, when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME also, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINES had against king Mithridates: and in the time of the civill warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and confumed together: hey fay that it must not be lighted againe with other common fire, but must be made anew, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the Sunne, and that they do in this maner. They have a hollow veifell made of a peece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two fides alike: fo that from all parts of his compaffe and circumference, it falleth into one point. Then they fet this veffell right against the beames of the Sun. To that the bright Sunne beames come to affemble & gather together in the center of this veffel. where they do pietee the ayre fo ftrongly, that they fet it on fire: & when they put to it any drie matter or substance, the fire taketh it straight, because the beame of the Sunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drie matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thinke that thefe Veftall virgins keepe no other thing but this fire, which never goeth out. Other fay there are other holy things also, which no body may lawfully see but they whereof we have written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the least so much as may be learned and told. The first maidens which were vowed and put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they fay) Gegania & Ve. renia: and after them, Canulcia and Tarpeia. Afterwards king Servius increased the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vnto this day. Their rule and order fet down by king Numa was this: that they should vow chastity for the space of thirty yeares. In the first ten yeares they learne what they haue to do: the next ten yeares following, they do that which they haue learned and the last ten yeares, they teach yong nonices. After they haue passed their thirty yeares, they may lawfully mary if they be difposed, and take them to another maner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very few of them which haue taken this liberty, and fewer also which have joyed after they were professed, but rather have repented themfelues, and lived ever after a very grievous & forrowfull life. This did to fray the other Vefals, that they were better contented with their vowed chaftitie; and fo remained virgines, until they were old, or else died. He gaue them also great priviledges & prerogatives: as, to make their will and testament in their fathers life time; to do all things without any gardian or ouerleer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they go abroad, they cary maces before them to honour them. And if by chance they meete any offendor in their way going to execution, they faue his life: howbeit the professed Vestall must affirme by oath, that she met him you wares, and not of fet purpose. If any man presume under their chaire, whereupon they are caried through the city, he shal die for it. Also when they themselues do any fault, they are corrected by the great Bishop, who sometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and quality of their offence) in a dark place, and vnder a curten. But she that hath defloured her virginity is buried quick by one of the gates of the city, which they call Colling gate: where within the city there is a mount of earth of a good length, & with the Latines is faid to be raifed. Under this forced mount, they make a litle hollow vault, and leaue a hole open, whereby one may go downe; and within it there is fet a litle bed, a burning lampe, and some victuals to suffaine life withal. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honors fake: to the end they would not be thought to famish a body to death, which had bene consecrated by the most holy and denout ceremonies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer ftrongly, and close it vp with thicke leather, in fuch fort, that no body can fo much as heare her voice, and fo they carie her thus shut vp through the market place.

city more feareful to behold, then this neither is there any day wherein the people are more forrowful, then on fuch a day. Then after she is come to the place of this vawt, the screens straight vnlose these fast bound couerings: and the chiefe Bishop after he hath made certaine secret praiers vnto the gods, and lift his hands vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Pestall. muffled vp close, and so putteth her vpon the ladder, which conveyeth her downe into the vawr. That done, he withdraweth, and all the priests with him: and when the filly offendour is gone downe, they straight pluck vp the ladder, and cast abundance of earth in at the open hole, so that they fil it vp to the very top of the arch. And this is the punishment of the Vestals which de- The temfile their virginity. They thinke also it was Numa that built the round temple of the goddesse ple of vesta Vesta, in which is kept the euerlasting fire meaning to represent not the forme of the earth, which the signer they say is Vesta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middest whereof (according to the Py- of the world, thagoreans opinion) remaineth the proper seate and abiding place of fire, which they call Vesta, fire abidish, and name it the Vnitie. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmooueable, nor yet that it is fet in the middeft of the world, neither that the heaven goeth about it: but fay to the cotrary, that the earth hangeth in the aire about the fire, as about the ceter therof. Neither wil they grant, that the earth is one of the first and chiefest parts of the world: as Plate held opinion in that age, that the earth was in another place then the very middest, and that the center of the world, as the most honourablest place, did appertaine to some other of more worthic substance than the earth. Furthermore, the bishops office was to shew those that needed to be taught, all the rites, maners, and customes of buriall: whom Numa taught not to beleeue that there was any corruption or dishonesty in burials, but rather it was to worship and honour the gods of the all. earth, with vsuall and honourable ceremonies, as those which after their death receive the chiefest feruice of vs they can. But aboue all other in burials, they did specially honour the goddesse bourseday the chiefe course and professions of the chiefe course and professions of the chiefe course and professions of the chiefes course and professions of t called Libitina, that is faid, the chiefe gouernour and preserver of the rites of the dead: or be it funerals, Proferpina, or Venus, as the most learned men among the Romaines do judge, who not without cause do attribute the order of the beginning and end of mans life, to one selfe god, and power diuine. Numa ordained also, how long time euery body should mourne in black. And for a child from three yeares to ten yeares, of age, that died: he ordained they should mourne no more moneths then it had lived yeares, and not to adde a day more. For he commanded, that the longest time of mourning should be but ten moneths onely, and so long time art he least he willed the women should remaine widowes, after the decease of their husbands or else she that would mary within that time, was bound by his order to facrifice a whole bullock. Numa also erected many other orders of priests: of two forts whereof I will only make mention. The one less Plutar. shall be the order of the Salli, and the other of the Feciales: for me thinkes, both the one Problet. and the other doth manifestly shew the great holinesse, and singular deuotion which he had in him. The Feciales are properly those, which the Grecians callrenophylace s, as who Feciales would fay, peacekeepers. And in my judgement, they had their right name according to their office, because they did pacific quarrels with reason by way of order, and did not suffer (as much as in the lay) that any matter should be tried by violence, vitil they were past al hope of any peace. For the GRECIANS call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, & decide their controuerfie with reason, & not with sword. Euen so those which the Romain's called the Feciales, went many times in person to those that did the Romains injury, and sought to perswade them with with reagood reason, to keepe promise with the Romaines, and to offer them no wrong. But if they sommittee would not yeeld to reason, whom they sought to perswade, then they called the gods to the wit- the sword. nesse thereof, and prayed them, that if they did not most earnestly incense the Romaines, to purfue that most inftly appertained vnto their right, that all euils and mischiefes of the warres

gainst such enemies. And if the FECIALES would not consent to open warres, and did happen to speake against them, it was not lawfull in that case, neither for private person, nor for the king himselfe to make any wars. But like a just Prince, he must have leave by their sufferance to make the warres. Then did he confider, and confult, by what meanes he might best procure and profecute the fame. Concerning this matter, they judge that the il hap which came to the ROMAINS, of this holy inftitution. For at that time the barbarous people befieged the city of the CLVST. NIANS: and Fabius Ambustus was sent ambassador vnto them, to see if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill answer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embaffie had bene ended, and being formwhat hor, and rash in defence of the CLUSINIANS, game defiance to the valiantest GAV LE there, to fight with him man to man. Fortune fauoured him in this chalenge: for he flue the GAVLE, and stripped him in the field. The GAVLE's sceing their man flaine, fent immediatly an herald to Rome, to accuse Fabius, how against all right and reafon he began warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The Feciales being then consulted with thereabout, diddeclare, he ought to be delivered into the hands of the GAVLEs, as one that had broken the law of armes, and had deferued it: but he made friends to the people which fauoured him very much, and by their meanes escaped his deliuery and punishment. Neuerthelesse, the GAVLES within short time after, came before Rome with all their power: which they tooke, facked, and burnt enery whit, fauing the Capitoll, as we have written more amply in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Priests that were called Salightey say he did institute them vpon this occasion. In the eight yeare of his reigne, there came a pestilent disease through all ITALIE and at the length it crept also into Rome. Whereat every man being greatly affraid and discouraged, they say there fell from heaven a target of copper, which lighted betweene the hands of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King himfelfe affir. med he heard of the Nymph Egeria, and the Mules; to wit, that this target was fent from heaven for the health and preservation of the citie: and therefore he should keepe it carefully, and cause eleuen other to be cast and made, all like vnto the same in fashion and greatnesse, to the end that if any would enterprise to steale it, he should not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he faid, he was commanded to consecrate the place to the Muses (in the which he did oftentimes companie with them) and also the fields which were neare thereabouts: and likewise to give the fountaine that sprang in that place, vnto the Vestals professed, that every day, they might draw water at that Well, to wash the sanctuary of their remple. The successe hereof proued his words true, for the ficknes ceassed incontinetly. So he assembled al the chiefe crafts men then in Rome, to proue which of them would take vpon him to make one like vnto that. Euery - man despaired to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellentest workma that was in those daies did make them all so suite-like, that Numa himself did not know the first target, when they were all layd together: So he ordained the priefts Salin, to have the custody of these targets, to see them safe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of Salian borne in SAMOTHRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as some have vntruly alledged, who first invented the maner of dancing all armed: but they were so called, of their fashion and manner of dancing and leaping. For in the moneth of March, they go skipping and leaping vp and downe the city, with those targets on their armes, apparelled in red cassockes without sleeues, and girded about with broad leather sword girdles, studded with copper, having helmets of copper on their heads, and striking vpon their targets with short daggers, which they cary in their hands. Morcouer, all their dancing confisteth in mouing of their feet: for they handle them finely, making turnes about ground and beneath, with a fodaine measure, and a maruellous force of agility. They call these targets Ancylia, because of their fashion, which is not altogether compasse: for they are not all round as other common targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many foldes, and one so neare another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon, Or elfe they are so called, because Ancon fignifiethan elbow, vpon which they cary them. Al these derivations are writte in the history of Iuba. who in any case will haue this word Ancylia to be drawne out of the Greek tong. And it may be also they were so called, because the first came fro aboue, which the GRECIANS cal Anecathe; or els for healing the fick, which is called Acelis: or els for ceasing of the drynes, which in Greek is called Anshmon Lysis: or for the ending of all discases and enils, for which cause the Athenians call Caftor and Pollux, Anacas: if they lust to give this word his derivation from the Greektong. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldfinith had for making of these targets was that the Salij vnto this day do make mention of him in their fong, which they fing going through the city, and dancing of their dance all armed. Howbeit somethinke they say not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, ancient memory. But Numa after he had ordained and instituted these ling palace Orders of priests, built his palace neare vnto the temple of Vesta, which holdeth his name Regia at this day, to fay, the kings palace. In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to sacrifice to the gods, or to teach the Priests what they should do, or how with them he should best contemplate all heavenly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this day, Quirinall, the place wherof is yet to be seene. But in all these facrifices, ceremonies, & The maner processions of the Priests, there were alwaies husshers that went before, crying to the people, of the Re-Keepe filence, and tend vpon divine fervice. For they fay the Pythagoreans thought it good, that worlding the good, that worlding the good, that worlding the good to the good men should not worship the gods, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other ping of the thing: but they thought it meet, that men should of purpose goe out of their houses, to serve and sold. pray vnto them. Euen so king Numa thought it not meet, that his subjects should come to see, & gream oheare divine service negligently, as it were for a fashion, &only to be rid of it, as heeding another pinion thing:but he would have them fer afide all other bufinesse, and employ their thoughts and hearts touching only vpon the principall service of religion, and devotion towards the gods. So that during feruice time, he would not have heard any noise, any knocking, bouncing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in al artificers shops of occupation, wherofarthis day yet they see some signes and tokens remaining in their facrifices at Rome. For althetime the Angur beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any facrifice, the vergers crie alowd: Hoc age, which meaneth, ted watchpord this. And it is awarning to those that are prefent, to cal their wits home, & to think on that which solend diis in hand, Alfothere are many of his orders like the precepts of the Pythagoreans. For as they did """ The fimile "The fimile "The fimile" "The fim warne men, not to fit vpon a litle bushell, not to cut fire with a sword, not to looke behind them stide of Nno when they go abroad: to facrifice to the celeftiall gods in odd number, and to the gods of the maand by earth in an euen number, of which precepts they would not hauethe common people to haue any knowledge or vnderstanding. Euen so there are many institutions of Numa, the reasons wherof are hidden and kept fecret: as not to offer wine to the gods of the vine neuer cut, and not to facrifice vnto them without meale: & to turne a turne about when they do reuerence to the gods, and to fit downe after they have worshipped them. And as touching the two first ordinances, it feemeth that by them he did recommend elemency & humanity, as being a part of the deuotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make that worship the gods, they fay it presenteth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thinketh it should rather come of this for that the temples being set to the East, he that worshippeth entring into the temple, sheweth his backe to the West, and for this cause turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth againe rowards God:doing the whole turne, & ending the confummation of his praier, by this double adoration which he maketh before & behind. Vales peraducture that he meant fecretly to fignifie, & give the to vnderstand by this turning & changing of their look, that which the ÆGYPTIAN'S figured by their wheeles: in shewing thereby, that these worldly things were neuer constant and in one state: and therefore, that we should take it thankfully, and patiently beare it, in what fort focuer it pleased God to change or alter our life: And where he comanded that they should sit after they had worshipped God: they said it was a toke of a good hope vnto the that prayed that their prayers shold be exalted, & that their goods should remaine safe, & stick by them. Other say, that this case & sitting, is a separating them from doing: & therfore he would they should fit in the temples of the gods, to shew they had done that which they had in had before, to the end to take of the gods the beginning of another. And it may wel bealfo that it was referred to ŷ thing we spake of a litle before: That Numa wold accustom his people, not to serue the gods, nor to speake to the atal, as they passed by, or did any other thing, or were in haste: but would have them pray vnto the gods when they had time & leifure, & al other businesse at that time set apart. By this good instruction and training them vnto religion, the city of Rom E by litle and litle came to be so tractable, & had the great power of king Numa in such ad- By what miration, that they took alto be as true as the Gospel that he spake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, the tales deuised of pleasure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpossible to him, if he wold haue it. And for proofe herof, there goeth a tale of him, that he having Romaines biddena great company of the citizens of Rome to come & sup with him, caused them to be ferued with plaine groffe meat, & in very poore & homely vessel. And when they were set, & bega The wonto fal to their meate, he cast out words lodainly vnto them, how the goddesse with whom he accompanied, was come to fee him euen at that inftant, and that fodainly the hall was richly furnished, & the tables couered with al forts of excellent fine & delicate meats. Auentine was not at that time inhabited, nor inclosed within the wals of Rome, but was full of fprings and shadowed groues, whither commonly repaired to solace themselues, the two gods. Picus and Faunus, which otherwife might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titanian; fauing it is faid, that they went through all ITALY, doing the like wonders and miracles in phyficke, charmes and art magick, which they report of those the GRECIANS call Idees Datyles, There they fay that Nama tooke them both, having put into the fpring both wine and honie. where they yied to drink. When they faw that they were taken, they transformed themselues in. to divers formes, difguifing and disfiguring their naturall shape, into many terrible and fearefull fights to behold. Neuertheleffe in the end, perceiuing they were fo fast, as to escape there was no The purify- reckoning: they reucaled vnto him many things to come, and taught him the purifying against ing of thin-lightning and thunder, which they make yet at this day with onions, haire, and pilchers. Other fay, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Inpiter out of heaven, with their coniuring and magicke: whereat Inpiter being offended, answered in choler, thathe should make it with heads. But Numa added straight, of onions: Initer replied, of men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a little away the crucky of the commandement. What haires: Iupiter answered, quicke haires. And Numa put too pilchers also. And it is reported that this was the goddeffe Ege. ria, that taught Numa this lubriltie. This done, inputer returned appealed: by reason whereof the place was called Ilicium. For Ilico, in the Greeke tongue fignifieth appeared, and fauourable; and this purifying was afterwards made in that fort. These tales not only vaine, but full of mocketie alfo, do fliew vs yet plainly the zeale & denotion men had in those times towards the gods: vnto which Numa through custome had won them. And as for Numa himselfe, they say that he so firmely putall his hope and confidence in the helpe of the gods: that one day when he was told his enemics were in armes against him, he did but laugh at it, and answered: And I do sacrifice. It is he (as fome fay) that first built the temple to Fauth and Terme, and which made the ROMAINS vinderstand, that the most holy and greatest oath they could make, was to sweare by their faith, which they keepe yet at this day. But Terme, which fignifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they do facrifice, both publikely and privately, vpon the limits of inheritance, and now they facrifice vnto him line beafts. Howbeir in old time they did facrifice vnto him without any bloud, through the wife inflitution of Numa: who declared and preached vnto them, that this god of bounds was fincere, and vpright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witnesse of instice, and keeper of peace. It was he, which in my opinion, did first limite out the bounds of the territorie of ROME, which Romulus would never doe, for feare left in bounding out his own he should confesse that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding & measuring, to him that will keepe it justly is a bond that bridleth power and defire but to him that forceth not to keepe it, it is a proofe to flew his iniuffice. To fay truly, the territory of Rome had no great bounds at the first beginning, and Romulus had got by conquest the greatest part of it, and Numa did wholy deuide it vnto the needy inhabitants to relieue them, and to bring them out of poucrty: (which carieth men headlong into mulchiefe, & discourageth them to labor) to the end that plowing vp the faid land, they should also plow vp the weeds of their own barennes, to become civill and gentle. For there is no exercise nor occupation in the world, which so fodainly bringetha manto loue and de fire quietnes, as doth husbandry & tillage: and yet to defend a mans own, there is in it courage & hardines to fight. But greedy defire, violently to take from others & vniuftly to occupy that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husbandmen. And therefore Nama hauing brought in husbandry among st his subjects, as a medicine & meane to make them love quietneffe, was defirous to enure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble and gentle of condition, then to increase them in riches. He deuided all the territory of Rome into certaine parts which he called Pagos as much to fay as villages. And in enery one of them he ordained controllers and vifiters, which should survey all about: and he himselfe sometimes went abroad in person, coniecturing by their labour the manners and nature of enery man. Such as he found diligent, he advanced them vnto honour, and gave them countenance and authoritie: other which he faw flothfull and negligent, by rebuking and reprouing of them, he made them amend. But amongst all his ordinances which he made, one aboue all the rest caried the praise and that was, that he deuided his people into fundry occupations. For the city of Rome feemed yet to be made of two nations, as we have faid before; and to speake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one; being altogether impossible to take away all factions, and to make there should be no quarrels nor contentions betweene both parts. Wherefore he confidered that when one will mingle two bodies or fimples together, which for their hardnesse and contrary natures cannot well suffer mixture: then he breakes and beates them together, as small as may be. For, so being brought into a smaller & leffer powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen so he thought it was best to deuide the people also into many finall parts: by meanes whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more eafily take away the first and the greatest part, when it should be deuided and separated thus into fundry sorts. And this division he made by arts and occupations: as minstrels, goldsmiths, carpenters, diers, shoomakers, tawers, tanners, belfounders, and pot-makers, and fo forth through other crafts and occupations. So that he brought euery one of these into one body, and company by it selfe; and ordained vnto enery particular mystery or craft, their feafts, affemblies, and feruices, which they should make vnto the gods, according to 2000 at 100 fe the dignity and worthinesse of enery occupation, And by this meanes, he first tooke away all faction: that neither fide faid, nor thought any more, those are Sabynes, these are Romaines, thesearc of Tatius, these are of Romulus. Insomuch as this division was an incorporating, and Tatim. an uniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinances, they did much commend his reforming of the law, that gaue liberty vnto fathers to fell their children. For he did except childrenalready maried, fo they were maried with their fathers confent and good will : indging it to be too cruell and ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had maried a free man, Theords. fhould find her selfe to be the wife of a bondman. He began alioto mend a litle the calendar, nor them meths foexactly as he should have done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the reigne of Ro- of Numaes mulus, they vied the moneths confusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them influencem. 20. dayes and leffe, and others 35. dayes and more, without knowing the difference betweene the course of the Sunne and the Moone; and onely they observed this rule, that there was 360.

Saipr. 13. dayes in the yeare. But Numa confidering the inequality stood vpon 11. dayes, for that the 12. revolutions of the Moone are runne in 354. dayes, and the revolution of the Sunne, in 365. dayes, he doubled the 11. dayes, whereof he made a moneth: which he placed from 2. yeares to 2. yeers, after the moneth of February, and the ROMAINES called this moneth put betweene, Mercidinum, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correction that Numa made, which fince hath had a farre better amendment. He did also change the order of the moneths. For March which before was the first, he made it now the third : and Ianuary the first, which vnder Romulus was the cleuenth, and February the twelfth and last. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added thefe two, Ianuary and February. For the Romaines at the beginning had but ten moneths in the yeare: as some of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yeare. And Thereare the ARCADIAN'S amongst the GRECIAN'S have but four monoths for their years. The Acar-NANIANS haue fix to the yeare. And the ÆGYPTIANS had first but one moneth to their yeare: and afterwards they made foure moneths for their yeare. And this is the cause why they seeme (albeit they inhabit a new countrey) to be neuerthelesse the ancientest people of the world: for that in their Chronicles they reckon up fuch infinite number of yeares, as those which count the moneths for the yeares. And to proue this true, that the ROMAINES at the beginning had butten moneths in the yeare, and not twelue, it is easie to be judged by the name of the last, which they call at this day December. And that the moneth of March was also the first, may be coniectured by this; for the fifth moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the fixt Sextilis, and so the other in order following the numbers. For if Ianuary and February had then bene the first, of necessity the moneth of July, which they call Quintilis, must have bene named September: confidering also that it is very likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was also by him ordained to be the first. The second was Aprill: so called of the name Aphrodite, that is to fay, Venus, vnto whom they make open facrifice in this moneth. And on the first day of the same, women do wash themselves, having a garland of myrtle vpon *Peradtheir heads. Howbeit some other say, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was one ly colled a dayle hospital than is the chief of Some and Command a Solle for the party was one ly colled a dayle hospital than is the chief of Source and Command a Solle for the party was one ly colled a dayle hospital than is the chief of Source and Command a Solle for the party was one ly colled a dayle hospital than it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it must reade was onely called Apriles. because then is the chiefest force and strength of the spring, at which inthe Greek feason the earthdorh open, and the seeds of plants and hearbes begin to bud and shew foorth, which the word it felfe doth fignific. The moneth following next after this, is called May: after the name of Maia the mother of Mercury, vnto whom the moneth is consecrated. * The ferefile moneth of Iune is fo called alfo, because of the quality of that scason, which is as the youth of the time.

vegre. Although fome will fav, that the moneth of May was named of this word Majores, which fignifieth as much as the elders; and the moneth of June, of Juniores, which fignifies the yonger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order. Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, Nonember, and December. But Quintilis, was after called Inling, of the name of Inling Cafar, who flew Pompeins: and Sextilus was named Angulus of Octa. uius Cafar his fuccessour in the empire, who was also surnamed Augustus. It is true also that Do. mitian would they should call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanieus and the other Domitianus, But that held not long: for so soone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recoursed their ancient names againe. The two last moneths only, have ever continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which W uma added, or at the least translated, the moneth of February doth fignific as much as purging, or at least the deriuation of the word foundeth neere it. In this moneth, they do facrifice of plants, * and do celebrate the feast of the Lypencales, in which there are many things agreeable and like to the facrifices made for purification. And the first, which is Ianuary, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherefore me thinkes that Numa tooke away the moneth of March from the first place. and gaue it vnto Ianuary: because he would have peace preferred before war, and civill things before martiall. For this Janus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very civill and politike. For he changed the life of men, which before his time was rude, cruell, and wild and brought it to be honeff, gentle, and civill. For this cause they do paint his image at this day with two faces, the one before, and the other behind, for thus changing the lines of men. And there is in Rome a temple dedicated vnto him, which hath two doores, that be called the doores of war: for the custome is to open them, when the Romaine's have any warres in any place, and to flut them when they be at peace. To have them flut, it was a rare thing to fee, and happened very feldome: by reason of the greatnesse of their empire, which on all sides sides was enuironed with barbarous nations, whom they were compelled to keepe under with force of armes. Notwithstanding it was once shut vp in the time of Augustus, after he had slaine Antonie. and once before also in the yeare when Marcus Attilius and Titus Manlius were Consuls. But that continued not long, for it was opened againe incontinently, by reason of wars that came vpon them foone after. Howbeit during the reigne of Numa, it was never one day opened, but remained thut continually by the space of three and forty yeares together. For all occasions of warres, were then veterly dead and forgotten: because at Rome the people were not onely through the example of inflice, elemency, and the goodnesse of the King, brought to be quiet, and to loue peace; but in the cities thereabouts, there began a maruellous change of maners, and alteration of life, as if some gentle aire had breathed on them, by some gracious and healthfull wind blowne from Rome to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens minds such a hearty defire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, and to ferue the gods truly: that almost through all ITALY, there was nothing but feasts, playes, sacrifices, and bankets. The people did trafficke and frequent together, without feare or danger, and visited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the springing fountaine of Numaes wildome many prety brookes and Areames of good and honest life had run ouer all IT ALY, and had watered it and that the mildnesse of his wisdome had from hand to hand bin dispersed through the whole world. Insomuch, as the ouer excessive speeches the Poets accustomably do vse, were not sufficient inough to expresse the peaceable reigne of that time. There: (piders weave, there cobwebs day and night

In harnesses, which wont to serue for warre: There: cancred ruft doth fret, the steele full bright Of trenchant blades, well whet in many a iarre. There: mighty speares, for lacke of wse are eaten, With rotten wormes: and in that country there. The braying trompe doth neuer feeme to threater Their quiet eares with blasts of bloudy feare. There: in that land no drowfie sleepe is broken

With hot alarmes which terrors do betoken.

For during all king Numaes reigne, it was never heard that ever there were any warres, civil diffention, or innouation of gouernement attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmity or maliceborne him, neither any conspiracy once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of displeasing the gods, (which visibly seemed to take him into their protection) or for the reuerent regard they had vnto his vertue, or for his prosperous & good successeall the time he reigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he fought to keepe men still pure, and honest, from all wickednesse, and laid most open before the eyes of the whole world, a electe example of that which Plate long time after did affirme, and fay, concerning true gouernement: which was: That the onely meane of true quietnesse, and remedy from all cuill (which cuer troubleth men) was: when by fomediume ordinance from about there meeteth in one person, the right maieflie of a King, and the mind of a wife philosopher, to make vertue gouernesse and ruler ouer vice. living of a For indeed happy is fuch a wife man, and more happy are they, which may heare the graue weale, counfell, and good leffons of fuch a mouth: and there (me thinkes) needeth no force, no compulfion, no threats, nor extremity to bridle the people. For men feeing the true image of vertue in their visible Prince, and in the example of his life, do willingly grow to be wife, and of themselues do fall into loue, liking, and friendship together, and do vie all temperance, inst dealing, and good order one towards another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other:which is the chiefe point of felicity, and the most happy good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wildome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners such a good disposition; and this, Numa about all other, seemed best to know and vnderstand. Furthermore, touching his wines and children, there are great contrarieties among the historigraphers. For some of them say, he neuer maried other wife then posterier. Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one onely daughter, and she was called Pompilia. Pompilia. Pompilia. Other write to the contrary, that he had foure fonnes, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus, of Nomaes euery one of the which (by fuccession from the father to the sonne) have descended the noblest races, and most ancient houses of the Romaines. As the house of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the house of the Pinarians, of Pinus: the house of the Calphurnians, of Calpus: and the house of the Mamercians, of Mamercias. All which families by reason of their progenitor have kept the furname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which do reproue the two first saying, that they did write to gratifie the families, making them fallely to descend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is faid, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martins, the fonne of the fame Martins which perfivaded him to accept the kingdome of Rome. For he went with him to Rome, to remaine there: maried to caire Marwhere they did him the honour to receive him into the number of the Senators. After the death tim corioof Nama, Martius the father stood against Tullus Hostilius for the succession of the Realme, and Martius the being ouercome, he killed himselfe for forrow. But his fon Martins, who maried Pompilia, continued still at Rome, where he begot Ancus Martius, who was king of Rome, after Tullus Hosti- made Selius, and was but fine yeares old when Numa died. Whose death was not sudden. For he died Rome. confuming by little and little, as well through age, as also through a lingring disease that waited Ancus on him to his end, as Pifo hath written: and Numaat his death was little more then fourescore the north of the name and honour done were him at his financial mode his life was a the fon of yeares old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funerals, made his life yet more Caim Marhappy and glorious. For all the people his neighbours, friends, kinfmen, and allies of the Ro- time Corne-MAINES came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publick contributions to honor The death his obsequies. The noble men selues of the city (which were called Patricians) caried on their of Numa. shoulders the very bed, on which the corfe lay, to be conneyed to his graue. The Priests attended also on his body, and so did althe rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his tombe, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with teares, fighs, and mournings: not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their dearest kiniman, and nearest friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, because (as some say) he commanded the contrary by his will and testament: but they made two cossins of stone, which they buried at the foot of the hill called Iniculum. In the one they layd his body, and in the other the holy bookes which he had written himselfe, much like vnto those, Numan which they that made the lawes among the GRECIANS did write intables. But because in books. his life time he had taught the priests the substance of the whole contained in the same, he willed the holy tables which he had written, should be buried with his body. For he thought it not reasonable that so holy matters should be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens maners and exercises. And he followed herein they say, the Pythagorians, who would not put their works in writing, but did print the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and sccrets of Geometry, which had not bene worthy of them, then they faid the gods by manifest tokens would threaten to reuenge such sacriledge and impicty. with fome great destruction and misery. Therefore, seeing so many things agreeable and altogether like betweene Numa and Pythagoras, I eafily pardon those which maintaine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted and conversant together. Valerius Anias the historian writeth, there were twelve books written concerning the office of Priests. and twelue other containing the phylosophy of the GRECIANS. And that four hundred years after (in the fame yeare when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus Bebius were confuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earth, and discouered these coffins: and the lids and couers thereof being caried away, they found the one altogether voide, having no manner of likelihood, or token of a body that had layen in it: and in the other they found these bookes. which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Præror) who had the charge to read them ouer, and to make the report of them. But he having perufed them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not convenient the matters contained in them should bee published vnto the fimple people; and for that cause they were caried into the market place, & there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and just men, than they are farre more praifed and effeemed after their death, then before because that enuy doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding, the misfortunes which chanced afterwards vnto the fine Kings which reigned at Rome after Numa, have made his honour shine, with much more noble glory then before. For the last of them was driven out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very old: and of the o. ther foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tullus Hostilius which reigned after Numa, deriding and contemning the most part of his good and holy inflitutions, and chiefly his deuotion towards the gods, as a thing which made men lowly & faint hearted: did as soone as euer he came to be king, turne al his subjects hearts to the wars. But this madde humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a strange and most grieuous disease that followed him, which brought him to change his mind, and did farre otherwise turne his contempt of Religion, into an over fearefull superstition, which did nothing yet refemble the true Religion and deuotion of Numa: and befides he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconvenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was striken and burnt with lightening.

HVS having written the lives of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be somewhat hard to do, that we comparing the one with the other, should set out the difference betweenethem. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deeds do shew it sufficiently. As in their temperance, their denotion to the gods, their wifedome in gouerning, and their difereet handling of their people, by making them believe that the gods had revealed the lawes vnto them, but their which they effablished. And now to come vnto their qualities, which decided are directly and severally commended in gither of them Their God are diverfely, and severally commended in either of them: Their first quality is, that Numa accepted the kingdome, and Lourgus gaue it vp. The one received it, nor feeking for it; and the other having it in his hands did reftore it againe. The one being a stranger and a private man, was by strangers elected and chosen their Lord and King. The other being in possession a King, made himselfe againe a private person. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtaine Realme by inflice : but it is a goodlier thing to esteeme instice about a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputation, that he was judged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred so noble a mind in the other, that he esteemed not to be a king. Their second quality is, that like as in an instrument of musick, the one of them did tune and wrest vp the slacke strings which were in Sparta: fo the other flackened, and fet them lower, which were two high mounted in Roma. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater. For he did not perswade his citizens, to what Pluck off their armor & curates, nor to lay by their fwords; but only to leave their gold and filuer, to forfake their foft beds, their fine wrought tables, and other curious rich furniture, & not to leaue off thetrauell of warres, to give themselves onely vnto feasts, sacrifices, and playes; but to the contrary, to give vp banquetting and feafting, and continually to take paines in the wars, yeelding their bodies to all kind of paines. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did bearehim, easily perswaded all that he would: and the other, by putting himselfe in danger, and being hurt also, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpose and desire. Numa his muse was so gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now so tractable and civill, that he taught them to love peace and inflice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongst the lawes and ordinances of Lyourgus, that which we have written touching the ILO-TE 1, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I must of force confesse that Numa was much wifer. more gentle, and civill in his lawes, confidering that even vnto those which indeed were borne flaues, he gaue some little tast of honour, and sweetnesse of liberty, having ordained, that in Slaves sate the feasts of Saturne, they should sit downe at meate at their masters owne table. Some hold with their opinion that this custome was brought in by king along will deband of the band of the saturnes. opinion, that this custome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, should have some pleasure thereof to make good feels cheere with the fruits of the same. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembrance of twelfare the equality which was amongst men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither mafter nor feruant, but all men were alike equall, as brethren or kinfmen. To conclude, it feemeth either of them took a direct course, thought best to themselues, to frame their people vnto temperance, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre best, and the other instice: vnlesse it were that men would say, that for the diversitie of the nature or custome of their people (which were almost contrary in manners) they were both compelled to vse also contrary and diverse meanes from other. For it was nor of a faint hart, that Numa took from his people the vie of armes, and defire to be in warres: but it was to the end they should not do any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus also study to make his people fouldiers and warlike, to hurt others : but for feare rather that others should hurt them. And so, to cut off the excesse in the one, and to supply the defect of the other, they were both enforced to bring in a strange manner of gouernement. Furthermore, touching their feuerall kind of gouernement, and dividing of their people into states and companies: that of Numa was maruellous meane and base, and framed to the liking of the meanest people, making a body of a city, and a people compounded together, of all forts, as goldsmiths, minstrels, founders, shoemakers, and of all forts of crafts men and occupations together. But that of Lycurque was directly contrary: for his was more seucre and tyrannicall, in gouerning of the Nobility, casting all crafts and base occupations upon bondmen and strangers, and putting into the hands of his citizens the shield and launce, suffering them to exercise no other art or science, but the art and discipline of wars, as the true ministers of Mars: which all their life time neuer knew other science, but onely learned to obey their captaines, and to command their enemies. For to have any occupation, to buy and fell, or to trafficke, free men were expressely forbidden; because they should wholly and absolutely be free. And all sciences to get money was lawfull for flaues, and the ILOTES: being counted for as vile an occupation as to dreffe meate, and to bea feullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amongst his people, but only tooke away couctous defire to be rich by wars: but otherwise, he did not forbid them to get goods by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regard to bring all to equality, and to be alike wealthy, but fuffering enery manto get what he could, taking no order to preuent pouerty, which crept in, and spread farre in his city: which he should have looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequality amongst them, and that his citizens for substance were in manner equall one with another: for then was the time when he should have made head against avarice, to have stopped the mischiefes and inconveniences which fell out afterwards, and they were not litle. For that onely was the fountaine and roote of the most part of the greatest enils and mischiefes, which happened afterwards in Rome. And as touching the denission of goods, neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality to the one, was a ground & foundatio of his common-wealth, which he afterwards instituted and to the other, it could not be. For this division being made not long before the time of his predeceffor, there was no great need to change the first, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching mariages, and their children to be in common, both the one and the other wisely sought to take away all occasion of icalousie: but yet they tooke not both one course. For the Romain a husband, having children inough to his contentation, if another that lacked children came vnto him, to pray him to lend him his wife, he might grant her vnto him, and it was in him to giue her altogether, or to lend her for a time, and to take her afterwards againe. But the Laconian keeping his wife in his house, and the mariage remaining whole and vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to have children by her nav furthermore, many (as we have told you before) did themselves intreate men, by whom they thought to haue a trim brood of children, and layd them with their wives. What difference I pray you was betweene these two customes? fauing that the custome of the LACONIANS shewed, that the husbands were nothing angry, nor grieued with their wives for those things. which for forrow & iealousic doth rent the hearts of most maried men in the world. And that of the Romaines was a simplicity somewhat more shamefast, which to couer, it was shadowed yet with the cloake of matrimony and contract of mariage:confessing that to vse wife and chil-Numaer or. dren by halfes together, was a thing most intollerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of maidens to be maried by Numaes order, was much straighter, & more honorable for womanhood: and Lycurgus order having too much scope and liberty, gave Poets occasion to speake, and to

And indeed to fay truly, the fides of their pericotes were not fewed beneath: fo that as they went, they flewed their thighs naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth eafily declare by thefe verses:

The fong which you shall fing, shall be the former fand By Hermony lufty lase, that strong and sturdy maide: Which trust her peticote about her middle short,

And fet to shew her naked hippes, in francke and freendly fort. And therfore it is faid, the Lacon wives were bold, manly, and flour against their husbands, The Lacon vnlesse it were in the presence of their husbands. In so much as it is reported, that a woman chancing one day to pleade her cause in person, openly before the Judges: the Senate hearing of it, did fend immediatly vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognosticate to the city. And therfore Numathought the memory of the naughty women, would much commend the great humility, getlenes, & obediece of the good. For like as our GRECIAN historiographers do note namely the first. For they were wholy mistresses in their house, and abroad yea they had law on minuters their side also, to vtter their minds frankly concerning the chiefest matters. But Numa euer referued the honor & dignity vnto the women, which was left them by Romalus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken the away perforce, disposed themselves to vie them as getly as possibly they could neuerthelesse, he added otherwise thereto great honesty, and took away all curiofity from them, and taught them sobriety, and did enure them to speake little. For he did mine wovtterly forbidthem wine, and did prohibit them to speake, although it were for things necessary, men series those which were the first that killed any of their citizens, or haue fought with their brethre, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen fo the ROMAINES doe note that Spurius Caruilius was Thefre the first that forsook his wife, two hundred & thirty yeares after the first foundation of Rome, discrete at which was neuer done by any before. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalea, was the Rome. first which ener brauled or quarrelled with her mother in law called Geeata, in the time whe Tarquin furnamed the proud reigned: fo well and honeftly were the orders of Numa deuised cocerning mariage. Moreouer, the age and time of marying of maids, which both the one & the other ordained, doth agree with the rest of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they should be maried, till they were of good yeares & women grown, to the end that they knowing the copany of man at fuch time as nature requireth, it should be a beginning of their pleasure and loue, & not ofgriefe & hate, when she should be copelled vnto it before time agreeable by nature; & because their bodies also should be more strong & able to beare children, & to endure the mothers painfull throwes & trauel in child-bearing, confidering they are maried to no other end, but to beare children. But the Roman s to the contrary, doe marry them at twelue yeares of age and vnder: faying, that by this meanes their bodies & manners be wholly theirs which do marry them, being affured that no body else could touch them. By this reason it is manifest, that the one is more natural, to make the strong to beare children: & the other more morall, to give the the forme & maner of conditions, which a man wold have the to keepe all their life time. Moreover touching orders for education of children, that they should be brought vp, instructed, & taught, vnder the felfe fame masters and gouernors, which should have an eye to make them drink, cate, play, and exercise themselves have the property and exercise themselves have the property and and disc. exercise themselues honestly & orderly together: Numa made no more prouision for the same, pline is then the least maker of lawes that ever was, & nothing in comparison of Lycurgus For Numa left worth. the parents at liberty, to vse their discretio (according to their couetousnes or necessity) to cause their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they wold put them to be labourers, carpenters, founders, or minstrels. As if they should not frame the maners of children, and fashion them from their cradle all to one end : but should be as it were like passengers into one ship, which being there, some for one busines, other for another purpose, but all to diverse ends, do neuer meddle one with another, but in a rough storme or tempest, when every man is affraid of his own life. For otherwise, no mã careth but for himself. And other makers of lawes also, are

ple newly gathered together, which did contrary him in nothing: whereto should he most ply his study and indeuour, but to cause children to be well brought vp, and to make yong men exercife themselves, to the end they should not differ in manners, nor that they should be trouble. fome, by their diuerse manner of bringing vp, but that they should all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one selfe trade; and fashioned vnder one selfe patterne of vertue? That good education, besides other commodities, did also serve to preserve the state of their oath which they had made, had bene of small effect, if he were flabis. Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their oath which they had made, had bene of small effect, if he had not through institution, and education (as it were) died in wooll the maners of children, and had not made them from their nurses breasts in manner, sucke the iuyce and loue of his lawee and civill ordinances. And this was of such force, that for the space of fine hundred yeares and more. Lycureus chiefe lawes and ordinances remained in full perfection, as a deepe worded die which went to the bottome, and pierced into the tender wooll. Contrariwife, that which was Numaes chiefe end and purpose, to continue Rome in peace & amity, died by and by with him.

For he was no fooner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he fo carefully had kept shut all his reigne, as if indeed he had kept in wars there, under lock and key. and they filled all ITALIE with murther and bloud: and this his godly, holy, & iust gouernment which his realme enjoyed all his time, did not last long after, because it had not the bond of education, and the discipline of children which should maintaine it. Why, may aman say to me here: harh not Rom z excelled still, and preuailed more and more in chiualry. This question requireth a long answer, and specially vnto such men as place felicity in riches, in possessions, and in the greatnesse of empire, rather then in the quiet safety, peace, and concord of a commonweale, and in clemency and inflice, joyned with contention. Neuerthelesse, how so enerit was.

that maketh for Lycurgus also, that the Romaine's after they had changed the state which they had of Numa, did fo maruelloufly increase and grow mighty : and that the LACED EMONIANS to the contrary, so soone as they began to breake Lyeurgus lawes, being of great authoritie and fway, fell afterwards to be of small account. So that having lost the sourcing and commandement ouer GREECE, they stood in great hazard also to be ouerthrowne for euer. But in trothic was some divine thing in Numa, that he being a meere stranger, the Romains did seeke him to to be pre make him king, and that he could fo change all, and rule a whole city as he lifted (not yet iowned) fere Lyeure together) without need of any force or violence: as it was in Lyeurgus, to be affifted with the best of the city, in resisting the commons of LACED EMON, but he could never otherwise haue kept them in peace, and made them lone together, but by his onely wildome

TDY MV S the Grammarian, in a little bookethat he wrote, and dedicated vnto Asclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of solon, alledgeth the words of one Philocles, in which he speaketh against the common opinion of those that have written, that solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the sonne of Execestides, a man but reasonably to live, although otherwise he was of the nage. noblest and most ancient house of the city of ATHENS. For of his fathers fide, he was descended of King Codius: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, she was cofin germaine vnto Pyfistratus mother. For this cause cuen from the beginning there was great friendship betweenethem, partly for their kindred, and partly also for the courteste and beauty of Pylistratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of state and gouernement: yet this square bred no violent inconvenience solon and betweene them, but they referred in their hearts fill their ancientamity, which continued the Pyffraim. memory of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That solon was no stayed man to withstand beauty, nor any great doer to prevaile in love, it is manifest to all, as well by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by a law of his owne: wherein he did forbid bondmen Affature to perfume themselues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this law among honest matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better fort, and forbidding it to the basest. They men. fay also that Pysistratus selfe was in love with Charmus, and that he did set vp the little image of loue, which is in Academia, where they were wont to light the holy candle. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) having spent his goods in liberality and deeds of courtesse, though he might cafily have bene relieved at diverse mens hands with money, he was yet ashamed to take any, because he came of a house which was wont rather to give and relieve others, then to take solongane themsclues: so being yet a yong man, he deuised to trade merchandise. Howbeit other say, that himselfein Solon trauelled countries, rather to see the world, and to learne, then to trafficke, or gaine. For rade mer fure he was very desirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifestly: for that being now old, he estandise.

I growold, learning fill. Also he was not couetously bent, nor loued riches too much: for he said in one place:

SOLON.

Who fo hath goods, and gold inough at call, Great heards of beafts, and flockes in many a fold, Both hor (e and mule yea flore of corne, and all That may content each man about the mould: No richer is for all those heapes and hoords. Then be which hash, sufficiently to feede, And cloth his corpes with fuch as God afoords. But if his ioy, and chiefe delight do breede, For to behold the faire and heavenly face Of some sweete wife, which is adornd with grace, Or elle some child of beauty faire and bright. Then bath he cause (indeed) of deepe delight.

And in another place also he saith:

Indeed I do desire, some wealth to have at will: But not wnlesse the same be got by faithfull dealing still. For fure who fodefires by wickednesse to thrine : Shall find that inflice from fuch goods, will instly him deprine.

Howbeit, as an honest man is not to busic himselfe ouermuch in scraping together of supersuous and vnnecessary goods; so nothing letteth but that he may have a care to store himselfe with fuch things as he shall have need of.

In those daies no state was discommended, as faith Hesiodus, nor any art or science made any difference betweene men; but merchandise they thought an honorable state, as that which deliuered meanes to trafficke into strange and farre countries, to get acquaintance with states, to modities of merchädise procure the loue of Princes, and chiefly to gather the experience of the world. So that there A merchant haue bene merchants, which heretofore haue bene founders of great cities: as he which built MARSILIA, after he had obtained the friendship of the GAVLES, dwelling by the riner of Rhosne. And they say also, that Thales Milesius the wife did trafficke merchandise, and that Hippocrates the mathematike did euen fo: and likewife that Plato trauelling into AGYPT, did beare the whole charges of his journey, with the gaines he made of the fale of oyle he caried thither. They remember also that Solon learned to be lauish in expense, to fare delicately, and to speake wantonly of pleasures in his Poems, somwhat more licentiously then became the gravity of a Philosopher, only because he was brought up in the trade of merchandise, wherein for that men are maruellous subject to great losses and dangers, they seeke otherwhiles good cheere to drive these cares away, and liberty to make much of themselves. Yet it appeareth by these verfes, that Solon accounted himselfe rather in the number of the poore, then of the rich. Rich men (oft times) in lewdest lines do range.

Poucrty with vertue better then riches.

And often seene, that vertuous men be poore: Tet would the good their goodnesse neuer change With level estate, although their wealth be more. For wertue stands alwayes both firme and stable: When riches rone, and seldome are durable.

How Solon This poetry at the beginning he yied but for pleasure, and when he had leisure, writing no matter of importance in his veries. Afterwards he did fet out many graue matters of philosophy, and the most part of such things as he had deuised before, in the government of a commonweale, which he did not for hiftory or memories fake, but only of a pleafure to discourse: for he fleweth the reasons of that he did, and in some places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And some affirme also he went about to write his lawes and ordinances in verse, and do recite his preface, which was this:

Vouch (afe o mighty love of heaven and earth high King: To grant good fortune to my lawes, and heasts in enery thing. And that their glory grow, in such triumphant wife, As may remaine in fame for aye, which lines and neuer dyes.

He chiefly delighted in morall philosophy, which treated of government and commonweales: as the most part of the wisemen did of those times. But for natural philosophy, he was very groffe and fimple, as appeareth by these verses:

The clattering baile and foftly falling fnow Do breed in aire, and fall from clouds on bie, The dreadfull claps, which thunderbolts do throw, Do come from heanen, and lightnings bright in skie. The fea it felfe by boifterous blafts doth rore, Which (were it not prouoked fo full fore) Would be both calme and quiet for to paffe, As any element that ener was.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the fenen wife men of GRHCH, who fearched further the contemplation of things in common vse among men, than he. For setting him apart, all the others got the name of wisedome, onely for their understanding in matters of state and gouernement. It is reported that they met on a day all seuen together in the city of DEL-PHES, and another time in the city of CORINTH, where Periander got them together at a feast that he made to the other fixe. But that which most increased their glory, and made their fame most spoken of, was the sending backe againe of the three footed stoole when they all had refufed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, how certaine fisher-men of the Ile of Co, cast their nets into the sea, and certaine strangers passing by, that came from the city of MILETVM, did buy their draught of fish at aduenture, before thenet was drawne. And when they drew it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed floole of massie gold, which men say, Hellen (as she did returne from TROY) had throwne in that place, Hellen in memorie of an ancient Oracle the called then vnto her mind. Thereupon the strangers and three foote of fisher-men first fell at strife about this three footed stoole, who should have it : but afterwards gelddrawn the two cities tooke part of both fides, on their citizens behalfe. In fo much as wars had like to have followed between them had not the prophere for a white given a like Oracle water them. to haue followed betweene them, had not the prophetesse Pythia giuen a like Oracle vnto them both: That they should give this three footed stoole vnto the wifest man. Whereupon the men of Co, sent it first to Thales in the city of MILETYM, as being willing to grant that vnto a primate person, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales faid, hee thought Bissa wifer man then himself: and so it was sent vnto him. He likewise sent it againe vnto another, as a wifer man. And that other, fent it also vnto another. So that being thus posted from man to man, and through diverse hands, in the end it was brought backe againe vnto the city of MILETVM, and delinered into the hands of Thales the fecond time: and last of all was caried vnto THEEEs, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Ifmenian. Howbeit Theophraflus writeth, that first it was sent to the city of PRI and, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the city of MILETVM, by Bias consent. And after that it had passed through all their hands, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and lastly it was sent to the city of DELPHES. And thus much have the best and most ancient writers written: sauing that some say in stead of a three sooted stoole, it was a cup that King Crassus sent vnto the city of DELPHES. Other say, it was a peece of plate which Bathyoles left there. They made mentio also of another private meeting betwixt Anacharsis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharsis being ariued at Athens, went to knock at Solons gate, saying that he was a stranger Anatharwhich came of purpose to see him, and to desire his acquain ance and friendship. Solon answered & and sehim, that it was better to feeke friendship in his owne countrey. Anachar sis replied againe: Thou then that art at home, and in thine owne countrey, begin to shew me friendship. Then solon wondering at his bold ready wit, entertained him very courteoufly, & kept him a certaine time in his house, & made him very good cheere, at the selfe same time wherin he was most busie in gouerning the common-weale, and making lawes for the state thereof. Which when Anacharsis vnderstood, he laughed at it: to see that solon imagined with written lawes, to bridle mens couctousnesse and iniustice. For such lawes, said he, do rightly resemble the spiders cobwebs: because Anatharsis they take hold of litle flyes and gnats which fall into them, but the rich and mighty will breake faire of and runne through them at their will. Solon answered him, that men do inftly keepe all couenants written and bargaines which one make with another, because it is to the hinderance of either partie to lawes. breake them: and euen so, he did so temper his lawes, that he made his citizens know, it was more for their profit to obey law and inflice, then to breake it. Neuerthelesse afterwards, matters proued rather according to Anacharsis comparison, then agreeable to the hope that Selon had conceiued. Anacharsis being by hap one day in a common assembly of the people at ATHENS, said that he maruelled much, why in the confultations and meetings of the GRECIANS wife men propounded matters, and fooles did decide them. It is faid moreouer, that Solon was fomtime in the city of MILETYM at Thales house, where he said that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would never marry to have children. Thales gave him never a word at that prefent; but with. in few dayes after he suborned a stranger, which said that he came but newly home from A. THENS, departing from thence but ten dayes before. Solon asked him immediatly, What newes there. This stranger whom Thales had schooled before, answered: None other there, sauing that they caried a young man to buriall, whom all the city followed: for that he was one of the greatest mens sonnes of the city, and the honestest man withall, who at that present was out of the countrey, and had bene a long time (as they faid) abroad. O poore vn fortunate father, then faid solon: and what was his name. I have heard him named, faid the stranger, but I have forgotten him now: fauing that they all faid, he was a worthy wife man. So solon ftill trembling more and more for feare, at every answer of this stranger in the end he could hold no longer, being full of trouble, but told his name himselfe vnto the stranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the fonne of Solon which was buried. The very fame, faid the stranger. Solon with that like a madde man straight began to beate his head, and to fay, and do, like men impatient in affiiction, and o. uercome with forrow. But Thales laughing to fee this pageant, staid him, and faid: Lo, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children; which is of fuch a violence, that thou feeft it hath now ouercome thee, although otherwise thou art strong, and able to wrestle with any. How beit for any thing he hath faid vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it is but a tale and nothing fo. Hermippus Writeth, that Patzens (he which faid he had Afops foule) reciteth this ftory thus. Neuertheleffe it lacketh judgement, and the conrage of a man also, to be affraid to get things necessary, fearing the losse of them: for by this reckoning he should neither esteeme honor, goods, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to lofe them. For we feethat vertue it falfe, which is the greatest and sweetest riches a man can haue, decayeth of times through sickneffe, or elfe by physick and potions. Furthermore Thales felf, although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, vnlesse be would confesse that he neither loued friends, kinfmea, nor country: howbeit Thales had an adopted fon, called Cybeffus, which was his fifters fon. For our foule having in it a naturall inclination to love, & being borne as well to love, as to feel. The mind to reason, or vnder Hand, and to remember: having nothing of her owne whereupon she might bestow that naturall love, borroweth of other. As where there is a house of inheritance without lawfull heires, many times strangers, and base borne children, do creepe into the kind affection of the owner, and when they have once won and possessed his love, they make him ever after to be kind and tender over them. So that ye shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that move them to marry, and get lawfull children; and yet afterwards are ready to die for feare and forrow, when they fee their bastards (that they have gotten of their flaues or concubines) fall ficke or die, and doe vtter words far vnmeet for men of noble courage. And fome such there be, that for the death of a dog, or their horse, are so out of heart & take such thought, that they are ready to go into the ground, they look so pitifully. Other some are cleane contrary, who though they have loft their children, forgone their friends, or fome gentleman deare vnto them, yet no forrowfull word hath come from them, neither haue they done any unfeemely thing: but have passed the rest of their life likewise, constant and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weaknes, which breedeth these extreme forrowes, & exceeding feare. in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they love & desire, by reason of the cotinuals trouble, feare & griefe they feele, by thinking how in time they may be depriued of it. Now we must not arme our sclues with pouerty, against the griefe of losse of goods: neither with lacke of affection, against the losse of our friends: neither with want of mariage, against the death of children: but we must be armed with reason against misfortunes. Thus have we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIAN'S having now fustained a long and troublesome warre against the MEGARIANS, for the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA, were in the end weary of it, and made proclamation, straightly commanding vpon paine of death, that no man should presume to prefer any more to the councell of the city, the title or question of the possession of the le of SALAMINA. Salon could not beare this open shame, & seeing the most part of the lustiest youths desirous still of warre, though their tongues were tied for feare of the proclamation, he fained

himselfe to be out of his wits, and caused it to be given out that solon was become a soole: and fecretly he had made certaine lamentable verses, which he had cunned without booke, to sing abroad the city. So one day he ranne suddenly out of his house with a garland on his head, and got him to the market place, where the people straight swarmed like Bees about him: and getring him vpon the stone whereall proclamations are vsually made, out he singeth these Elegies he had made, which began after this fort:

There present my selfe (an Herald) in this case, Which come from Salamina land, that noble worthy place. May mind in pelting profe. Shall never be exprest. But sung in werse Heroisall, for so I thinke it best.

Solons Elegies of the

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, and containeth an hundred verses, which are excellently well written. And these being openly sung by Solon at that time, his friends incontinently praifed them beyond measure, and specially Pylistratus and they went about perswading the people that were present, to credit that he spake. Hercupon the matter was so handled among st them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they began to follow the wars with greater fury then before, appointing Solon to be Generall in the same. But the common tale & report is, that he went by fea with Pyfistratus vnto the temple of Venus, surnamed Coliade, where he found all the women at a solemne feast and sacrifice, which they made of custome to the goddesse. He nus coliad. taking occasion thereby, sent from thence atrustie man of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, Strablib. which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to faine himselfe a revolted traitour, and that fan of the he came of purpose to tel them, that if they would but go with him, they might take al the chiefe dihenians. ladies and gentlewomen of ATHENS on a fudden. The MEGARIANS eafily believed him, and solon first shipped forthwith certaine fouldiers to goe with him. But when Solon perceived the ship vnder tageme. faile coming from SALAMINA, he commanded the women to depart, and in stead of them he put lusty beardlesse springals into their apparell, & gaue them litle short daggers to conuey vnder their cloakes, commanding them to play and dance together vponthe fea fide, vntill their enemies were landed, and their ship at anker, and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being deceived by that they faw afarre off, affoone as ever they came to the shore side, did land in heapes, one in anothers necke, euen for greedinesse, to take these women but not a man of them escaped, for they were slaine enery mothers son. This stratageme being finely handled, and to good effect, the Athenians tooke sea straight, and coasted ouer to the Isle of Salamina: Selon was which they tooke voon the fudden, and wanne it without much refistance. Other fay that it was not taken after this fort: but that Apollo Delphions gaue Solon first such an Oracle:

Thou shalt first winneby vowes and sacrifice, The helpe of Lords and demy gods full bright : Of whose dead bones, the dust engraved lyes, In wester ne sayle, Asopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night paffed ouer to SALAMINA, and did facrifice to Peripoemus, and to Cichris, demy-gods of the country. Which done, the ATHENIAN's delinered him fine hundred men, who willingly offered themselues: and the city made an accord with them, that if they tooke the Isle of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authority in the commonweale. Solon imbarked his foldiers into divers fisher boats, & appointed a galliot of thirty owers to come after him, & he ankered hard by the city of SALAMINA, under the point which looketh towards the Isle of Negrepont. The Megarians which were within Salamina, having by chance heard some inkling of it, but yet knew nothing of certainty, ren presently in hurly burly to arme them, and manned out a ship to descry what it was. But they fondly coming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS under hatches fast bound, & in their roomes put aboord in their ship the choisest fouldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commanding them to settheir course direct vpon the citie, and to keepe themselues as close out of sight as could be. And he himselse with all the rest of his souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the field. Now whilst they were fighting together, solons men whom he had fent in the MEGARIANS ship, entred the hauen and wan the towne. This is certainely true, and testified by that which is shewed yet at this day. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a ship of Athens arriveth quietly at the first, and by and by those that are in the ship make a great shout, and a man armed leaping out of the ship, runneth ting continually with the of-spring of Megacles. These factions were greatest & highest in Solons time: who being of authority, and leeing the people thus deuided in two parts, he stepped in betweene them, with the chiefest men of ATHENS, & did so perswade & intreat those whom they celled the abiects and excommunicates, that they were contented to be judged. So 300.0fthe chiefest citizens were chosen judges to heare this matter. The accuser was Myron Phlyeian, This matter was heard and pleaded, & by fentence of the judges, the excommunicates were condemned. Those that were aliue, to perpetual exile: & the bones of the that were dead, to be digged vp, & throwne out of the confines of the territory of ATHENS. But whilft the cicy of ATHENS was occupied with these vprores, the MEGARIANS wisely caught hold of the occasion deliuered,& fet vponthe ATHENIANS, took from them the hauen of NISEA, and recouered againe out of their hands the Ile of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the city was possessed with a certaine superstitious feare: for some said, that spirits were come againe, and strange sights were seene. The ported also that Epimenides when he saw the hauen of Munychia, and had long considered of it:

told those about him, that men were very blind in foreseeing things to come. For if the ATHE-NIANS (faid he) knew what hurt this hauen would bring them, they would cate it (as they fay) with their teeth. It is faid also that Thales did prognosticate such a like thing, who after his death commanded they should bury his body in some vile place of no reckening, within the territory being maruelloufly effeemed of enery man for these causes, was greatly honored of the ATHE-NIANS, & they offered him great presents of mony and other things, but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to give him a bough of the holy olive: which they granted him, and so he into fo diuers pares and factions, as there were people of fundry places and territories within the country of ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines, the people of the vallies, and the people of the sea coast. Those of the mountaines, tooke the common peoples part for their liues. Those of the valley, would a few of the best citizens should cary the sway. The coast-men would that neither of them should preuaile, because they would have had a mean government & mingled of them both. Furthermore, the faction betweene the poore & rich, proceeding of their vnequality, was at that time very great. By reason whereof the city was in great danger, and it seemed there was no way to pacifie or take vp these cotrouersies, vnlesse some tyrant hapned to rise, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For al the common people were so fore indeb-

(for which cause they were called Hestemorijand servants) or elsethey borrowed mony of them at vsurie, vpon gage of their bodies to serue it out. And if they were not able to pay the, the were they by the law deliuered to their creditors, who kept the as bondmen & slaues in their houses, or else they sent them into strange countries to be sold: & many euen for very pouerty were for-

of the MILESIANS, faying, that one day there should be the place of a city. Epimenides therfore.

showing towards the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme land: and hard by the same is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the ME-GARIANS in battell from whence he fent back againe those prisoners that he had taken (which were faued from the flaughter of the battel) without any ranfome paying. Neuertheles, the ME-GARTAN'S were sharpely bent still to recouer SALAMINA againe. Much hurt being done and fuffered on both fides: both parts in the end made the LACED EMONIANS judges of the quarrell. But vpon judgement giuen, common report is, that Homers authority did Solon good service. because he did adde these verses to the number of ships, which are in the Iliads of Homer, which he rehearled before the Judges, as if they had bene indeed written by Homer:

.. Aiax that champion flout, did leade with him in charge, Twelve Ships from Salamina Soyle, which he had left at large, And even those selfe same ships in battell did he cast, And place in order for to fight, with enemies force at last, In that same very place, whereas it seemed then,

The manall with the Mega the Athe.

Solon defendeth the Delphes.

The captaines which from Athens came imbatteld had their men. Howbeit the ATHENTAN's felues thinke, it was but a tale of pleafure: and fay that Solon made it appeare to the judges, that Phileus, and Eury faces (both Aiax fons) were made free denizens of ATHENS. Wherupon they gaue the Isle of SALAMINA Vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of Attica: and the other in a town called MILETVM. And for due proofe thereof, they fay there is yet a certaine canton or quarter of the country of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Phileides, after the name of this Philewww.where Pyfiftratus was borne. And it is faid moreouer, that solon (because he would throughly conuince the Megarians) did alledge that the Salaminians buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS maner, but after the Athentans maner. For in Megarathey bury the dead with their faces to the East: and in ATHEN's their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denyeth it faying that the MEGARIAN'S did bury them also with their faces towards the West:alledging moreour, that at ATHEN'S cuery corfe had his owne beere or coffin by it felf, & that at MEGARA they did put three or foure corses together. They say also there were certaine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly help Solon by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their strife was judged by five Arbitrators, all Spartan's borne: that is to fay, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypscobidas, Anaxilas, and Cleomenes. Solon undoubtedly won great glory and honor by this exploit, yet was he much more honored and efteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the temple of Apollo, in the city of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be fuffered, that the CYRRH ÆTANS, should at their pleasure abuse the sanctuary of the Oracle, and that they should ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reucrence of Apollo. Whereupon the councell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his words and perswassions, proclaimed warres against the CYRRHÆIANS, as divers others do witnesse, and especially Aristotie, in the storie he wrote of those that wan the Pythian games, where he ascribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neuerthelesse Hermippus saith, Solon was not made Generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Alchines the Orator wrote no fuch thing of him: and in the Chronicles of the DELPHIANS they find, that one Aleman, and not Solon, was the Generall of the ATHE-NIANS. Now the city of ATHENS had a long time bene vexed and troubled through Cylons hainous offence, euer fince the yeare that Megatles (governor of the city of ATHENS) did with faire words handle so the confederats of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken fanctuary within the libertie, of the temple of Minerua: that he perswaded them to be wise, and to present themselves before the Iudges, holding by a threed, which they should tye about the base of the image of the goddesse where she stood, because they should not lose their liberty. But when they were come to the place of the honourable goddeffes so called, (which be the images of the Furies) coming down to present themselves before y Ludges, the threed brake of itself. Then Megaeles, & other officers his companions, laid hold on them prefently, faying, that it was a manifest figne that the goddesse Minerua refused to faue them. So those they took, and all they could lay hands on were immediatly stoned to death without the city: the rest which took the altars of refuge, were slain there also. And none were faued, but such as had made meanes to the governours wives of the city, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, & comonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the iffues of the rebels that rose with cylon, prognofticators also said, they perceived by their facrifices the city was defiled with some abominable and wicked things, which were of necessity to be purged and throwneout. Hereupon they fent into CRETA for Epimenides Phastian, whom they reckned the scuenth of the wisemen, Epimenides at the least such as will not allow Per iander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuout Phastus taman, and very wife in celestiall things, by inspiration from about; by reason whereof, men of his of the 7 sa. time called him the new Curetes, that is to fay, Prophet: & he was thought the fon of a Nymph ges, exclucalled Balte. When he was come to ATHENS, and growne in friendship with Solon, he did helpe him much, and made his way for eftablishing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENI-ANS to make their facrifices much lighter, and of leffe coft and brought the citizens to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting off certaine seuere and barbarous ceremonies, which the most part of women observed in their mourning; and he ordained certaine sacrifices which he would have done immediatly after the obsequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the rest, was, that by vsing the citizens vnto holinesse and denotion, daily sacrifices, prayers vnto the gods, purging of themselues, and humble offerings: he wan mens hearts by litle and litle, to yeeld them more conformable to instice, and to be more inclined to concord and vnity. It is re-

Now that this sedition of Cylon was veterly appealed in A- solon pair THENS, for that the excommunicates were banished the country, the city fell againe into their fields for old troubles & dissentions about the gouernment of the common-weale; and they were deuided dissent ditors. Infomuch that many of the luftieft and flouteft of them, banded together in companies & incouraged one another, not to fuffer and beare any longer fuch extremity, but to chule them a front and trufty captaine, that might fet them at liberty, and redeeme those out of captivitie, which were judged to be bondmen & feruants, for lack of paying of their dets at their daies appointed; and fo to make againe a new division of all lands and tenements, and wholly to change and turne vp the whole state and gouernment. Then the wifest men of the citic, who save Solon only neither partner with the rich in their oppression, neither partaker with the poore in their necessity, made suite to him, that it would please him to take the matter in hand, and to appeale & pacific all these broiles and sedition. Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he vsed a subtilty, whereby he deceived both the one and the other fide, concerning the common-weale. For he feererly promised the poore to deuide the lands againe; and the rich also, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. Howfoeuer it fell out, it is very certaine that solon from the beginning made it a great matter, and was very ferupulous to deale betweene them: fearing the couetoufnetic of the one. and arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was chosen governor after Philobrotus, and was made reformer of the rigour of the lawes, and the temperer of the state & common-weale. by confent and agreement of both parties. The rich accepted him, because he was no begger: the poore did alto like him, because he was an honest man. They say moreouer, that one word and fentence which he spake, (which at that present was rife in enery mans mouth) that equality did breed no strife, did aswell please the rich and wealthy, as the poore and needie. For the one fort conceived of this word equality, that he would measure all things according to the quality of the man: and the other tooke it for their purpole, that hee would measure all things by the number, and by the polle only. Thus the captains of both factions perfwaded and prayed him. boldly to take vpon him that four-aigne authority, fithens he had the whole city now at his commandement. The neuters also of enery part, when they faw it very hard to pacifie these things with law and reason, were well content that the wifest, and honestest man, should alone haue the royall power in his hands. Some fay also that there was such an oracle of Apollo:

Sit thou at belme as governour to feere. To guide our course, and rule the rowling ship: For thou halt fee, full many Athenians there. Will take thy part, and after thee will trip.

But his familiar friends about all rebuked him, faying he was to be accompted no better then a Solon refu- beaft, if for feare of the name of tyrant, he would refuse to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the most iust and honorable state, if one take it vpon him that is an honest man. As in old time, Tinnondas made himselfe King of those of Ne GREPONT, with their consent: and as Pittaces was Then presently of those of Metelin. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they fay that hee answered his friends, that principalitie and tyranny, was indeed a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entred into ir. And in certaine verses that he wrote to Phocus, thus hee faid:

I neither blush, nor yet repent my selfe, That have preserved my native soyle alwaies. And that therein (to hoord up trash and pelfe) No tyrants thought could once eclipse my praise. Nomight could move my mind to any wrong, Which might beblot the glory of my name: For fo I thought, to line in honour long, And farre excell all other men of fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablish new lawes, he was then of great countenance and authority. But he himselfe writeth, that many said of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyrannie:

Sure Solon was a foole, and of a bashfull mind. That would refuse the great good hap which gods to him assignd. The prey was in his hands, yet durft be never draw The net therefore: but stood abasht, and like a dastard daw.

For had not that so bene, be would (for one daies reigne, To be a king in Athens towne) himselfe (all quicke) have slaine. And eke subnerted quite, bis familie withall. So sweete it is to rule theroft, yelad in princely pall.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Now, not with standing he had refufed the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remisse nor soft therefore in governing, neither would he bow for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking that had chosen him their reformer. For where the mischiese was tollerable, he did not straight pluck it vp by the rootes:neither did he so change the state, as he might have done, lest if he should have attempted to turne vpfide downe the whole gouernment, he might afterwards have bene neuer able to settle & stablish the same again. Therfore he only altred that, which he thought by reason he would perswade his citizens vnto, or else by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he faid, foure with sweete, and force with instice. And herewith agreeth his answer that he made afterwards vnto one that asked him, if he had made the best lawes he could for the A. THENIANS? Yea fure, faith he, fuch as they were to conceine. And this that followesh alfo, they haue cuer fince observed in the Athenian tong to make certaine things pleasant, that be hateful, finely conveying them vnder colour of pleafing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions:garrifons, guards:prifons, houses. And all this came vp first by Solons inuention, who called clearing of debts, Se fachtheian: in English, discharge. For the first change and reformation sweet werds he made in government was this: he ordained that all manner of debts past should be cleare, and cleaning of no body should aske his debtour any thing for the time past. That no man should thenceforth first law. lend money out to vsurie, vpon couenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Vsurie for. Howbeit some write (as Androison among other) that the poore were contented that the interest bidden ? onely for vsurie should be moderated, without taking away the whole debt:and that Solon called the body this easie and gentle discharge, Seisachtheian, with crying vp the value of money. For he raised the The value pound of filuer, being before but threescore and thirteene Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: fo they which were to pay great sums of mony, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with lesse solon. number of peeces then the debt could have bene payed whe it was borowed. And so the detters gained much, and the creditors lost nothing. Neuerthelesse the greater part of them which have written the same, say, that this crying vp of mony, was a general discharge of al debts, conditios and couenants vpon the same: whereto the very poems themselues, which solon wrote, do seeme to agree. For he glorieth, and breaketh forth in his verses, that he had taken away all bawkes and marks that separated mens lands through the country of Attica; and that now he had set at liberty, that which before was in bondage. And that of the citizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of paiment of their debts had bene condemned for flaues to their creditors, he had brought many home againe out of strange countries, where they had bene so long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall tongue: and other which remained at home in captiuity, he had now set them all at good liberty. But while he was in doing this, men say a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruelloufly. For having framed an Edict for clearing alders, and lacking only a litle Language to grace it with words, & to giue it some pretie preface, that otherwise was readie to be proclaimedihe opened himself somewhat to certaine of his familiars whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, ill they be and Hipponicus) and told them how he would not meddle with lands and possessions, but would rubbled. only cleare and cut off all maner of debts. These men before the proclamation came out, went the confidence of the confi presently to the money-men, and borowed great sums of mony of them, and laid it out straight enter by vpon land. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the lands they had purchased, but refored not the mony they had borrowed. This foule part of theirs made Solon very il spoken of, & wrongfully blamed:as if he had not only fuffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong and iniustice. Notwithstanding he cleared himself of this slanderous report, losing fine ralents by his owne law. For it was well knowne that fo much was due vnto him, and he was the first that following his own proclamation, did clearely release his debtours of the same. Other say he was beginnesh owing fifteene talents, and among the fame, PolyZelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Not- te downsite withstanding they euer after called Solons friends, Greocopides, Cutters of debts. This law neither liked the one nor the other fort. For it greatly offended the rich for cancelling their bonds: and it much more misliked the poore, because all lands and possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, and enery body alike rich and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the

LACED AMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleventh descended of the right line from Hercules. and had many yeares bene King of LACED EMON, where he had gotten great authority, and made himselfe many friends: all which things together, did greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wifely had imagined for the order of the Common weale. Yet also he vsed more perfwafion then force, a good witnesse thereof the losse of his eye: preferring a law before his priuate injurie, which hath power to preferue a citie long in vnion and concord, and to make citizens to be neither poore nor rich. Solon could not attaine to this, for he was borne in a popular state, and a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one feeking to winne no credit with his citizens, but onely by his counfell. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the city, by his proclamation which he made, he him felf doth witneffe it faying:

Euen those which earst did beare mee friendly face, And spake full faire where euer I them met: Gan now beginne, to looke full grim of grace, And were (like foes) in force against me (et. As if I had done them some spite or scorne, Or open wrong , which were not to be borne.

Neuertheleffe he faith immediatly after, that with the fame authority and power he had, a man possibly

Could not controll the peoples minds:

Nor still their braines, which wrought like winds.

But flortly after, having a feeling of the benefit of his ordinance, and every one forgetting his private quarrel, they altogether made a common facrifice, which they called the facrifice of Sei. fachtheia, or discharge, and chose solon generall reformer of the law, and of the whole state of the common-weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will: as the office of state common assemblies, voices in election, judgements in justice, and the body of the Senate. And they gaue him also full power and authority, to seife & taxe any of them, to appoint the number, what time the fesse should continue, and to keepe, confirme, and disanull at his pleasure, any of the ancient lawes & customes then in being. To begin withal, he first took away all Dracons bloudy lawes, fauing for murther, & manflaughter, which were too feuere & cruell. For almost he did ordaine but one kind of punishment for all kind of faults and offences, which was death. So that they which were condemned for idleneffe, were judged to dye. And pety larcenie, as robbing mes hortyards & gardens of fruit, or herbes, was as feuerely punished, as those who had committed facilledge or murder. Demades therefore encountred it pleafantly, when he faid: that Dracons lawes were not written with inke, but with bloud. And Draco himselfe being asked one day, why his punishments were so vnequall, as death for all kinds of faults, he answered:Because he thought the least offence worthy so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being defirous to have the chiefe offices of the city to remaine in rich mens hands, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authority of gouernment in such fort, as the meaner people might beare a little sway, which they neuer could before; he made an estimate of the goods of every private citizen. And those which he found yearly worth 500. bushels of corne, & other liquid fruits and vpwards, he called Pentacosiomedimnes: as to say, fine hundred bushell men of reuenue. And those that had 300 bushels a yeare, and were able to keep a horfe of feruice, he put in the fecond degree, & called them knights. They that might difpend but two hundred buthels a yeare, were put in the third place, and called Zeugites. All other vnder those, were called Thetes, as ye would say, hirelings, or crafts me liuing of their labor; who he did not admit to beare any office in the city, neither were they taken as free citizens, fauing they had voices in elections, and affemblies of the city, & in judgements, where the people wholy judged. This at the first feemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpose, for hereby the most part of private quarrels and strife that grew among them, were in the end laid open before the people. For he suffered those to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong judgement in their causes. Furthermore because his laws were written somwhat oblaw increase scurrely, & might be diversly taken & interpreted, this did give a great deale more authority and power to the ludges. For confidering all their controuerfies could not be ended and judged by she ludges. Expresse law, they were driven of necessity alwaies to run to the Judges, and debated their mat-of the publike authority, in a place of his poefies, were he fayth: Such power have I given, to common peoples hand, As might become their meane estate, with equitie to stand: And as I have not pluckt, from them their dignitie, So have I not too much increase'd their (mall authoritie. Vnto the rich likewife, I have allowed no more, Then well might seeme (in inst conceite) sufficient for their store. And so I baue for both provided in such wife,

That neither shall each other wrong nor seeme for to despise. Yet confidering it was meete to provide for the povertie of the common fort of people, hee fuffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence of any poore mans cafe that had the wrong. For if a man were hurt, beaten, forced, or otherwise wronged, any other man that would might lawfully fue the offendor, & profecute law against him. And this was a wise law ordained of him, to custome his citizens to be sorie for anothers hurt, and so to feele it, as if any part of his owne body had bene injured. And they fay he made an answer on a time agreeable to this law. For, being asked what citie he thought best gouerned, he answered: That citie where such as receiue no wrong, do as carnestly defend wrong offered to other, as the very wrong and injury had bene done vnto themselues. He erected also the councell of the Areopagites, of those magistrates The coun. of the city, out of which they did yearely chuse their gouernour; and he himself had bene of that cellostibe number, for that he had bene gouernor for a yeare. Wherefore perceiuing now the people were drespagness growne to a stomack & haughtines of mind because they were cleare discharged of their debts, he set up for matters of state, another Councel of an hundred, chosen out of every tribe, whereoffoure hundred of them were to confult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people; that when the great Councell of the people at large should be assembled, no matter should be put forth, vales it had bene before well confidered of, & digested, by the councell of the fourthundred. Moreouer, he ordained the higher court should have the chiefe authority and power ouer althings, and chiefly to fee the law executed and maintained: supposing that the common weale being fetled, & flaied with these two courts (as with two strong anker holds) it should be the lesse turmoiled and troubled, and the people also better pacified & quieted. The most part of writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the councell of the Areapagites, as we have faid, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in al his lawes and ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but alwaies speaketh to the Ephetes (which were Iudges of life and death) when he spake of murther, or of any mans death. Notwithstanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of solon faith thus, in these very words: All such as have other laws bene banished or detected of naughtic life, before Solon made his lawes, shalbe restored agains to of Solon. their goods and good name, except those which were condemned by order of the councel of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open court, for murther, and death of any man, or for aspiring to vsurp tyrannic. These words to the contrary seeme to proue & testific that the councell of the Areopagites was before Solon was chosen reformer of the lawes. For how could offendors and wicked men be condemned, by order of the councell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the first that gaue it authority to judge? vnlesse a man will say peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obscure and darke, and would supply that they lacked, with expounding of the same by them. Those which shall be found attainted and connicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the councell of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernors of the city, when this law shall come forth, shall stand condemned still, and all other shall be pardoned, restored and set at liberty. Howsoever it is, sure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore among the rest of his lawes, one of them indeed was of his own deuice: for the like was neuer stablished elsewhere. And it is that law, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnhonest, who in a civill vproare among the citizens, sitteth still a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither fide. Whereby his mind was, as it should appeare, that priuate men should not be only carefull to put themselves and their causes in safetie, nor yet should be carelesse for other mens matters, or thinke it a vertue not to meddle with the miseries and misfortunes of their countrey, but from the beginning of enery fedition that they should io yne

with those that take the instell cause in hand, and rather to hazard themselves with such, then to tary looking (without putting themselues in danger) which of the two should have the victory. There is another law alto, which at the first fight me thinketh is very vnhonest and fond: That if any man according to the law hath matched with a rich heireand inheritour, and of himfelfe is imporer, & vnable to do the office of a husband, the may lawfully lie with any whom the liketh of her husbands nearest kinfmen. Howocit some affirme, that it is a wife made law for those which knowing themse lues vnmeet to entertaine wedlocke, will for concroushesse of lands, marie with rich heires and potlessioners, and mind to abuse poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of law; and will thinketo force and restraine nature. For, seeing the law suffereth an inheritor or possessioner thus ill bestowed, at her pleasure to be bold with any of her husbands kin, men will either leane to purchase such mariages, or if they be so carelesse that they will needs marie, it shall be to their extreme shame and ignominy, and so shall they deferuedly pay for their greedy couetoufnes. And the law is made well alfo, because the wife both not scope to all her husbands kins. men, but vnto one choide man whom the liketh best of his house: to the end that the children that shall be borne, shall be at the least of her husbands bloud and kindred. This also confirmeth the fame, that fuch a new maried wife should be shut vp with her husband, and care a quince with him: and that he also which marieth such an inheritor, should of duty see her thrife a moneth at the least. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honor the husband doth to his wife. arguing that he taketh her for an honest woman, that he loueth her, and that he esteemeth of her. Befides, it taketh away many millikings and displeafures which oftentimes happen in fuch cafes. and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it die not vtterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tookeaway all joynters and dowries in other mariages, and willed that the wines should bring their husbands but three gownes only, with some other litle moucables of smal value, and without any other thing as it were vetterly forbidding that they should buy their husbands, or that they should make merchandize of mariages, as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman should merie together for islue, for pleasure, and for loue, but in no case for money. And for proofe hereof, Dianylius the tyrant of Sicilia, one day answered his mother (which would need be maried to a young man of Syracysa) in this fort: I have power (faith he) to breake the lawes of Syracvsa, by having the kingdome: but to force the law of nature, orto make mariage without the reasonable compasse of age, that passeth my reach and power. So is it not tollerable, and much lesse allowable also, that such disorder should be in well ordered cities, that fuch vincomely and vinfit mariages should be made, betweene couples of vincquall yeares: confidering there is no meete nor necessary end of such matches. A wife gouernor of a citie, or a Judge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well fay to an old man that should marie with a yong maide, as the Poet faith of PhiloEtetes:

Ah filly wretch, how trimme a man art thon, At these yong yeares, for to be married now?

And finding a young man in an old rich womans house, getting his living by riding of her errands, and waxing fat, as they fay the partridge doth, by treading of the hens: he may take him from thence, to bestow him on some yong maide that shall have neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another law of Solons, which forbiddeth to speake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to think, that they ought not to touch the dead, no more than to touch holy things: and men should take great heed to offend those that are departed out of this world: besides, it is a token of wisdome and civility, to beware of immortall enemies. He commanded also in the selfe same law, that no man should speake ill of the liuing, specially in Churches, during divine service, or in councel chamber of the city, nor in the Theaters whilest games were a playing upon paine of three filter* Drachmes to be payed to him that was injured, and two to the common treasury. For he thought it too much shamelesse boldnes, in no place to keepe in ones choler; and moreouer, that fuch lacked civilitie and good manners:and yet altogether to suppresse and smother it, he knew it was not onely a hard matter, but to some natures vnpossible. And he that maketh lawes, must have regard to the common possibility of men, if he wil punish litle, with profitable example, and not much without some profit. So was he maruelloufly well thought of, for the law that he made touching wils and testaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their heires whom they would, but the goods came to the children or kinred of the testator. But he leaving it at liberty, to dispose their goods where they thought good, so they had no children of their own: did therein preferre friendship before kindred, and good wil and fanor before receffiny and constraint, and so made energy one lord and matter of his own goods. Yet he did not fimply & alike allow of al forts of gifts, how focuer they were made, but those only which were made by men of found memory, or by those whose wits failed them nor by extreme ficknes, or through drinks, medicines, poitonings, charmes, or other fuch violence and extraordinary meanes, neither yet through the inticements & perfivations of women. As thinking very wifely, there was no difference at albetween those that were enidently forced by conflraint, and those that were compatled & wrought by subornation at length to do athing against their will, taking fraud in this case equall with violence, & pleasure with forrow, as pathons withmadnes, which commonly have as much force the one as the other, to draw and drine men from reason. He made another law also, in which he appointed women their times to Alarfor go abroad into the fields, their mourning, their feafls and facrifices, plucking from them all diforder & wilfull liberty, which they yied before. For he did forbid that they should carrie out of ing abroad, the citie with them aboue three gownes, and to take victuals with them aboue the value of an halfe penny, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite high and specially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their coach, and that a torch should be carried before them. He did forbid them alto at the buriall of the dead, to teare and spoile themselves with blowes, to make lamentatios in verfes, to weepe at the funerals of a franger not being their kinfinan, to facrifice an oxe on the grane of the dead, to bury about three gownes with the corfe, to go to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corfe all which or the most part of them, are forbidden by our lawes this day. Moreouer, those lawes appoint a penaltic vpon such women as of fend in the fame, to be diffrained for, by certain officers exprelly named, to controll & reforme the abutes of women, as womanith perfons and faint harted, which fuffer themselues to be overcome with fuch pattions and fondnesse in their mourning. And perceiving that the citie of A. THESS began to replenish daily more and more, by mens repairing thirder from all parts, and by reason of the great assured safety and liberty that they found there and also considering how the greatest part of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffiquing the feas, are not wont to bring any merchandize to those which can give them nothing againe in exchange: he began to practife that his citizens should gine themselves vnto crasts and crasts and occupations, and made a law, that the fon should not be bound to relicue his father being old, occupations vnlette he had fet him in his youth to fome occupation. It was a wife part of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a city where was no refort of ftrangers, and had fo great a territorie, as could have furnished twife as many people, as Euripides faith, and moreouer on all sides was environed with a great number of flaues of the I LOTES, whom it was needfull to keepe still in labour and work continually) to haue his citizens alwaies occupied in exercises of seates of armes, without making them to learne any other science, but discharged them of all other miserable occupations and handy-crafts. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, and not things vnto lawes, when he faw the countrey of Attick folcane and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to fuffaine those that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impossible to keepe so great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requifite to fet vp occupations, and to give them countenance and estimation. Therefore he ordained, that the councell of the Circopagites, thould have full power and authority to enquire how every man lived in the citic, and also to punish such as they found idle people, and did not labour. But this was thought council of too senere and straight a law which he ordained, (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlots and ftrumpets should not be bound to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainly sheweth that he tooke not a wife to have children, but onely to fatisfie his luft and pleafure; and fo fuch a one hath his just reward, and is disappointed of the reverence that a father ought to have of his children, fince through his owne fault the birth of his child falleth out to his reproach. Yet to fay truly, in Solons lawes touching women, there are many abfurdities, as they fall out ill fauouredly. For he maketh it lawful for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the fact. But he that rauisheth or forcibly taketh away a free woman, is only condemned to pay a hundred filuer*drachmes. And he that was the *Drachma. Pandar to procure her, should onely pay twenty drachmes; vnlesse she had bene a common frumpet or curtifan, for such do instifie open accesse to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he abusing themselves before mariage. Me thinketh it is far from purpose and reason, with severity to punish a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to passe it ouer in another: or to set some light fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to discharge him, as it were but a matter of sport. Vnlesse they will excuse it thus, that money being very hard and scant at that time in ATHENS, those fines were then very great and gricuous to pay. For in fetting out the charges of offerings which should be made in sacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a convenient offering, and he settetha bushell of come at a filure drachine. More he ordained, that they which won any of the games at ATHENS, should pay to the common treasurie an hundred drachmes. And those that wonne any of the games Olympicall, five hundred drachmes. Also he appointed that he which brought he woolfe, should have five drachmes, & him one drachme for a reward of a she woolfe. Where of as Demetrius Valerian writeth, the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For touching the rates he ordained in the fixteenth table of his lawes meete for burnt facrifices, it likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet not withstanding the price which he setteth, is very litle in comparison of that which they are worth at this day. Now it was a custome cuer amongst the ATHENIANS to kill their woolues, because all their country lay for pasture, and not for tillage. Some there be that say, the tribes of the peo ple of ATHENS have not bene called after the names of the children of lon, as the common op nion hath bene; but that they were called after their divers trades and maners of living, which they tooke themselves vnto from the beginning. For such as gaue themselves vnto the warres were called oflites: as who would, fay, men of armes. Those that wrought in their occupations were called Ergades: as much to fay, as men of occupation. The other two which were husband men, & followed the plough, were called Teleontes: 2s you would fay, labouring men. And those that kept beafts and cattell, were called Agicores as much to fay, as heardmen. Now, for a fmuch as the whole province of Attica was very drie, and had great lacke of water, being not full of rivers, runing streames, not lakes, nor yet stored with any great number of springs, in so much as they are driven there to vie(through the most part of the countrey) water drawne out of wellmade with mens hands:he made fuch an order, that where there was any Well within the space of an Hippicon, that every body within that circuite might come and draw water onely at that Well, for his vie and necessity. Hippicon is the distance of foure furlongs, which is halfe a mile & those that dwell further off, should go feek their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yards deepe in the ground, & could find no water in the bottome, in thi case, they might lawfully go to their next neighbors wel, and take a pot full of water containing fix gallons, twife a day undging it great reason that necessity should be holpen, but not that idle nesse should be cherished. He appointed also the spaces that should be kept and observed by those that would set or plant trees in their ground, as being a man very skilfull in these matters For he ordained, that who focuer would plant any kind of trees in his ground, he should fet them five foot afunder one from another; but for the fig tree and olive tree specially, that they should in any case be nine foot asunder, because these two trees do spread out their branches farre off. and they cannot stand neare other trees but they must needs hurtthem very much. For besides that they draw away the fap that doth nourish the other trees, they cast also a certaine moisture and steame vpon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that whose euer would digge a pit or hole in his ground, should digge it as far off from his neighbours pit as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would fet up a hiue of bees in his ground, he should set them at the least three hundred foot from other hiues set about him be fore. And of the fruits of the earth, he was contented they should transport and fell onely oyle out of the Realmeto strangers, but no other fruit or graine. He ordained that the gouernor of the citic should yearely proclaime open curses against those that should do to the contrary, or else he himself making default therein, should be fined at an hundred drachmes. This ordinance is in the first table of Solons lawes, and therefore we may not altogether discredit those which fay, they did forbid in the old time that men should carie figges out of the country of ATTICA and that from thence it came that these pick-thankes, which bewray and accuse them that trans ported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another law alfoagainst the hurt that beasts might do vnto men. Wherein he ordained, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him should deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tied to a logge of timber of foure cubites long & this was a very good deuice, to make men lafe from dogs. But he was very straight in one law he made, that no stranger might be made denizen & free man of the city of ATHENS, vhlessehe were a banished man for ever out of his country, or else that he should come and dwell there with all his family, to exercise some craft or science. Notwithstanding, they say he made not this law so much to put strangers from their freedome there, as to draw them thither, affuring them by this ordinance, they might come and be free of the city and he thought moreouer, that both the one and the other would be more faithfull to the common-weale of Athens. The one of the, for that against their wils they were drive to forsake their country: & the other sort, for that aduifedly and willingly they were contented to forfake it. This also was another of solons laws which he ordained for those that should feast certain daies at the town house of the city, at other Feast for mens cost. For he would not allow that one man should come often to feasts there. And if any man were inuited thither to the feafts, and did refuse to come, he did set a fine on his head, as reprouing the miserable niggardlines of the one, and the presumptuous arrogancie of the other, to of Athens. contemne and despise common order. After he had made his lawes, he did stablish them to continue for the space of an hundred yeares, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones. Axones. which were made more long then broad, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine fome monuments yet in our time, which are to be feen in the towne hall of the city of ATHENS. Aristotle saith, that these tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus also the Comicall poet saith in cirbes. one place, of Solon & Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veffel or pan wherein they did frie millet or hirfe. Howbeit other fay, that Cyrbes properly were thetables, which contained the ordinances of the facrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the common-weale. So, al the councels & magistrates together did sweare, that they would keepe solons lawes themselves, and also cause them to be observed of others throughly and particularly. Then every one of the Thesmo. The moule thetes (which were certaine officers attendant on the councell, and had speciall charge to see the lawes observed) did solemnly sweare in the open market place, neare the stone where the proclamations are proclaimed; and enery of them both promifed, and vowed openly to keepe the fame lawes, and that if any of them did in any one point breake the faid ordinances, then they were content that fuch offender should pay to the temple of Apollo, at the city of DELPHES, an image of fine gold, that should wey as much as himselfe. Moreouer, solon seeing the disorder of the moneths, and the mouing of the Moone, which followed not the course of the Sunne, and vied not to rife and fall when the Sunne thin, but oft times in one day it doth both touch and passe the Sunne: he was the first that called the change of the Moone, Ene cai néa, as much to say, as old and new Moone. Allowing that which appeared before the conjunction, to be of the moneth past:and that which shewed it self after the conjunction, to be of the moneth following, And he was the first also (in my opinion) that vnderstood Homer rightly, when he said: Then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the change, he called Neomenia, as much to say, as the new moneth, or the new Moone. After the twentieth day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckned not the rest of the moneth, as increasing, but as in the wane: and gathered it by seeing the light of the Moone decreasing, virtill the thirtieth day. Now after his lawes were come abroad, and proclaimed, there came some daily vnto him, which either praised them, or misliked them, and praied him either to take away, or to adde something vnto them. Many againe came and asked him, how he vnderstood some sentence of his lawes: and requested him to declare his meaning, and how it should be taken. Wherefore considering that it were to no purpose to refuse to doe it, and againe that it would get him much enuie and ill will to yeeld thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to winde himselfe out of these briers, and to flie the groanings, complaints, and quarrels of his citizens. For helaith himselfe:

Full bard it is, all minds content to have, And specially in matters hard and grave.

So, to conucy himself a while out of the way, he tooke vpon him to be master of a ship in a certaine voyage, and asked licence for ten yeares of the ATHENIANS to go beyond sea, hoping by that time the Athenians would be very wel acquainted with his lawes. So wer he to the leas, and the first place of his arrivall was in Ægypr, where he remained a while, as he himself saith. well.

Euenthere where Nilus, with his crooked crankes, By Canobe, fals into the fea bankes.

He went to his booke there, and did conferre a certaine time with Pfenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wifest priests at that time that were in AGYPT: whom when he heard rehearle the flory of the Iles Atlantides as Plato writeth, he proued to put the same into verse, & did send it abroad through GRECE. At his departure out of ÆGYPT he went into Cy-PRVS, where he had great courtefie and friendship of one of the Princes of that country, called Philocyprus, who was Lord of a prety litle citie which Demophon (The fus fonne) caused to be built vpon the river of Clarie, & was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane & barren countrey. Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deale to remoue it out of that place. into a very faire and pleasant valley that lay vnderneath it, and there to make it larger & flatelier then it was: which was done according to his perswasion. And solons self being present at it was made ouerfeer of the buildings, which he did help to deuise and order in good fort, as wel in respect of pleasure, as for force and defence: infomuch as many people came from other places to dwel there. And herein many other Lords of the country did follow the example of this Philocr. prus, who to honor Solon, called this city Soles, which before was called Apia. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his words vnto Philocyprus, as followeth:

led Soles.

So grant the gods, that thou, and thine of - (pring May clime to great and passing princely state: Long time to line in Soles flourishing. And that they graunt, my Ship and me good gate, When I from hence by feas shall take my way: That with her harpe, dame Venus do wouch fafe To waft me still wntill she may conkey My felfe againe, into my countrey (afc. Since I have bene the onely meane and man, Which here to build, this citie first began.

And as for the meeting and talke betwixt him and king Crasus, I know there are that by distance of time will proue it but a fable, and deuised of pleasure: but for my part I will not reject, nor condemne fo famous an historic, received and approoued by fo many grave testimonies. Moreover it is very agreeable to solons manners and nature, and also not vnlike to his wisedome and magnanimitie: although in all points it agreeth not with certaine tales (which they call Chronicles) where they have bufily noted the order and course of times which evento this day, many have curioufly fought to correct, and could yet never difcuffe it, nor accord all contrarieties and manifest repugnances in the same. Solon at the defire and request of Cresus, went to see him in the circie of SARDIS, When Solon was come thither, he feemed to be in the felfe fame taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne and bred vpon the maine land, and had neuer seene the sea neither farre nor neare, did imagine euery river that hee faw had bene the fea. So Solon passing alongst Crasus pallace, and meeting by the way many of the Lords of his Court richly apparelled, and carying great traines of leruing men, and fouldiers, about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill he was brought vnto Crafus felfe. Who was passing richly arrayed, what for precions stones and iewels, and for rich coloured filkes, layed on with curious goldsmiths worke, and all to show himselfe to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiving by Solons repaire to his prefence, that he shewed no manner of signe, nor countenance of wondring, to fee fo great a state before him, neither had given out any word neare or likely to that which Crafus looked for in his owne imagination, but rather had deliueredspecches for men of judgement and vnderstanding to know, how inwardly he much did mislike Cress foolish vanity and base mind: then Cress commanded all histreasuries to bee opened, where his gold and filuer lay: next, that they should shew him his rich and sumptuous wardrobes, although that needed not: for to fee Crafus felte, it was enough to differen his nature and condition. After he had feene all ouer and ouer, being brought againe vnto the presence of the King: Crefus asked him, if ever he had seene any man more happy than himfelfe was ? Solon answered him, I have: and that was one Tellus a citizen of ATHENS, who was a maruellous honest man, and had left his children behind him in good estimation, and well to liue: and laftly, was most happie at his death, by dying honourably in the field, in defence of his countrey. Crafus hearing this answer, began to judge him a man of little wit, or of groffe vnderstanding, because hee did not thinke that to have store of gold and filter, was the onely joy and felicity of the world, and that he would preferre the life and death of a meane and private man as more happie, then all the riches and power of so mighty a king. Notwithstanding all this, Crasus yet asked him again: What other man beside Tellus he had seen happier then himfelf? Solon answered him, that he had feene Cleobis and Biton, which were both bre- cloobis and thren, and loued one another fingularly well, and their mother in fuch fort, that vpon a folemne py men. festivall day, when she should go to the temple of tune in her coach drawne with oxen: because they taried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoaked themselves by the necks, and drue their mothers coach in flead of the oxen, which maruelloufly rejoyced her, and she was thought most happy of all other, to have borne two such sons. Afterwards when they had done facrifice to the goddeffe, and made good cheare at the feaft of this facrifice, they went to bed-but they rose not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurt or forrow, after they had received fo much glory and honor. Crass then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in choler, faid vnto him: Why, doft thou recken me then in no degree of happy mene Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increase his heate, but answered him thus: O king of Lydians, the gods have given vs GRECIANs all things in a meane, and solon comamongst other things chiefly, a base and popular wisdome, not princely nor noble: which consists mendeth dering how mans life is subject to infinite chaces, doth forbid vs to trust or glory in these worldly riches. Fortime bringeth daily misfortunes vnto man, which he neuer thought of, nor looked for. But when the gods have continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we think that man Noman happy and bleffed, and neuer before. Otherwife, if we should judge a man happy that liveth, confidering he is euer in danger of change during life; we should be much like to him, who judgeth him the victory before hand, that is still a fighting, and may be our come, having no furery yet to cary it away. After Solon had spoken these words, he departed from the kings presence, & returned back againe, leaving king Crasus offended, but nothing the wifer, nor amended. Now A. fope that wrote the fables, being at that time in the city of SARDIS, and ient for thither by the king, who entertained him very honorably, was very fory to feethat the king had given Solon no better entertainment: fo by way of aduice he faid vnto him: O Solon, either we must not come to princes at all, or elfe we must feeke to please and content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, answered him: Either we must not come to princes, or else we must needs tell them truly, from Eand countell them for the best. So Crasus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he solon had lost the battell against Cyrus, and that his city was taken, himselfe become prisoner, and was bound fast to a gibbet, ouer a great stack of wood, to be burnt in the fight of all the Persians, and of Cyrus his enemie: he then cryed out as loud as he could, thrice together: O Solon. Cyrus being abashed, sent to aske him whether this Solon he onely cryed vpon in his extreme miscrie, was a god orman. Crefus kept it not fecret from him, but faid: He was one of the wife men of for rods GRECE, whom I fent for to come vnto me a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which of Soion I stood in need of, but only that he might witnesse my felicity, which then I did enjoy: the losse banging whereof is now more hurtfull, then the enioying of the same was good or profitable. But now betto bee (2las) too late I know it, that the riches I possessed then, were but words and opinion, all which burns. are returned now to my bitter forrow, and to present & remedilesse calamity. Which the wise GRECIAN confidering then, and forefeeing afarre off by my doings at that time, the instant mi- and spinion fery I suffer now : gaue me warning I should marke the end of my life, and that I should not too far prefume of my selfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glory of opinion of happinesse, the ground thereof being fo flippery, and of fo litle furetie. These words being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wifer then Crajus, and feeing Solons faying confirmed by fo notable an example: he did not only deliner Cr.esus from present perill of death, but ener after honored him to long as he lined. Thus had solon glory, for fauing the honor of one of these Kings, and the life of the other, by his graue and wife counsell. But during the time of his absence, great seditions rose at ATHENS a- Sedition at mongst the inhabitants, who had gotten them seuerall heads amongst them; as those of the vallie Soons about the second of the vallie Soons about the second of the second had made Lyeurgus their head. The coast men, Megaeles, the sonne of Alemaon, And those of the fonce. mountaines, Pyfiftratus: with whom all artificers & crafts men lining of their handy labour were ioyned, which were the stoutest against the rich. So that notwithstanding the city kept solons lawes & ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a change, & defired to fee things in another state:either parties hoping their condition would mend by change, and that enery of the should be better the their aduersaries. The whole comonweale broiling thus with troubles, solonta-Solon arrived at ATHENS, where every man did honour and reverence him: howbeit he was no dibras,

more able to speake aloud in open assembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, because his age would not suffer him and therefore he spake with enery one of the heads of the seuerall factions apart, trying if he could agree & reconcile them together againe. Wherunto Pylistratus scemed to be more willing then any of the rest, for he was courteous, & maruel. lous faire spoken, and shewed himselfe besides, very good and pirifull to y poore, and temperate also to his enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he did so finely counterfeir itathat men imagined it was more in him, then in those that naturally had it in them indeed. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aspiring no higher, and hating those which would attempt to change the present state of the common weale, and would practise any innovation. By this art and fine maner of his, he deceived the poore common people. Howbeir Solon found him ftraight, and faw the marke he shot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and fought still to win him, and bring him to reason, saying of times, both to himselfe and to other: That who fo could pluck out of his head the worme of ambition, by which he aspired to be the chiefest, and could heale him of his greedy desire to rule, there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better citizen then he would proue. About this time began Thespis to set out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the people for the rarenesse therof, being not many Poets yet in number, to striue one against another for victory, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally defirous to heare and learne, and by reason of his age seeking to passe his time away in sports, in musick, & making good cheare more then euer he did, went one day to see Thes. pa, who plaid a part himself, as the old fashion of the Poets was, and after the play was ended he called him to him, & asked him: If he were not ashamed to lye so openly in the face of the world. The spis answered him, that it was not materiall to do or say any such things, considering all was but in sport. Then Solon beating the ground with his staffe he had in his hand: But if we comend lying in sport (quoth he) we shal find it afterwards in good earnest, in al our bargains & dealings. Shortly after Pylistratus having wounded himself, and bloudied al his body over, caused his men to carry him in his coach into the market place, where he put the people in an vprore, & told the that they were his enemies that thus traiteroufly had handled and araied him, for that he flood with the about the gouerning of the common-weale: infomuch as many of them were maruelloufly offended, & mutined by and by, crying out, it was flamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere faid vato him: O thou fon of Hippocrates, thou dost ilfauouredly counterfet the person of Homers Vlyffes: for thou hast whipped thy self to deceive thy citizes, as he did teare & scratch him felf, to deceive his enemics. Notwichstanding this, the common people were still in vprore, being ready to take armes for Pyliliratus; and there was a generall councell affembled, in the which one Arefion spake, that they should grant siftie men, to carry halbards and maces before Pysistratus for guard of his person. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, stoutly inueyed against it and perswaded the people with many reasons, like vnto these he wrote afterwards in verse:

Each one of you (o men) in prinate acts Can play the foxe, for flie and subtill craft: But when you come, yfore (in all your facts) Then are you blind, dull witted and bedaft: For pleasant speech and painted flattery Bequile you still the which you never spie.

But in the end, seeing the poore people did tumult still, taking Pysistratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way also, saying: He had shewed himselfe wiser then some, and hardier then other. Meaning, wifer then those which saw not Pysistratus reach and fetch: and hardier then they which knew very well he did afpire to be king, and neuerthelesse durst not refist him. The people went on with the motion of Ariston, and authorifed the same, touching the grant of halbarders: limiting no number, but suffered him to have about him, and to affemble as many as he would, vntil fuchtime as he had gotten possession of the castle. Then the city was maruelloufly afraid and amazed; and prefently Megacles, and all those which were of the house of the Alemeonides did flie. Solon, who for yeares was now at his last cast, and had no man to flicke vnto him, went notwithstanding into the market place, and spake to the citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beast linesse, and faint cowardly hearts, and encouraged them. notto lose their liberty. He spake at that time notably, and worthy memorie, which euer after was remembred. Before, said he, you might more easily have staied this present tyrany; but now that it is already fashioned, you shall win more glory veterly to suppresse it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken vnto him, they were all so amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his house, and laid them before his gate in the middest of the street, saying: For my part, I have done what I can possible, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my country. So from that time he betooke himselfe vnto his ease, and neueraster dealt any more in matters of state, or common weale. His friends did counfell him to flic but all they could not perfwade him to it. For he kept his house, and gaue himself solons 11. to make verses: in which he fore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, saying:

If presently your burden heavie be, Yet murmure not against the gods therefore. The fault is yours, as you your selues may see. Which granted have of mighty Mars the lore To fuch as now by your direction Do hold your neckes in this Subjection.

His friends hercupon did warne him, to beware of fuch speeches, and to take heed what he said: lest if it came to the tyrants cares, he might put him to death for it. And further they asked him wherein he trusted, that he spake so boldly. He answered them; In my age. Howbeit Pysistratus after he had obtained his purpose, sending for him vpon his word and faith, did honour and entertaine him fo well, that solon in the end became one of his councell, and approoued many things which he did. For Pyfistratus himselfe did straightly keepe, and caused his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Infomuch as when he was called by proces into the court of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrant, he presented himselfe very modestly to answer his accusation, and to purge himselse thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Pyfiftratus himfelfe alfo did make new lawes, as this: That he that had bene maimed, a good law and made lame of any member in the wars, should be maintained all his life long at the common for reward charges of the citie. The felfe same was before decreed by Thersippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perswasion: who did preferre it to the councell. Pysistratus afterwards tookehold of the motion, and from thenceforth made it a generall law. Theophrastus faith alfo, it was Pyfiftratus, and not Solon, that made the law for idlenesse: which was the onely cause that the countrey of ATTICA became more fruitfull, being better manured: and the citie of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon having begunto write the storic of the Isles ATLANTIDES in verse (which he had learned of the wife men of the citie of SAIs in AGYPT, and was very necessary for the A-THENIANS) grew wearie, and gaue it ouer in mid way: not for any matters or bufinesse that troubled him, as Plato faid, but onely for his age, and because he feared the tediousnesse of the worke. For otherwise he had leysure enough, as appeareth by these verses, where he saith:

I grow old, and yet I learne still. And in another place where he faith:

Now Venus yeelds me sweet delights. And Bacchus lends me comfort still:

The Muses ekerefresh my sprights, And much releeve my weary will.

These be the points of perfect case, Which all mens minds oft times do please.

Plats afterwards for beautifying of the Hory and fables of the Isles ATLANTIDES, was defirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of speech haue broken vpa field or lay land of his owne, or that this gift had descended to him of right from Solon. He began to raise vp a stately front vnto the same, and enclosed it with high wals, and large squared courts at the entry thereof: such was it, as neuer any other worke, fable or poeticall invention had ever so notable, or the like. But because he began a litle too late, he ended his life before his worke, leaving the readers more forrowfull for that was left vnwritten, then they tooke pleasure in that they found written. For even as in the city of ATHENS, the temple of Iupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: so the wisdome of Plato (amongst many goodly matters of his that have come abroad) lest none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Isles Atlantibes. Solon lived long time after Pysistratus had vsurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Ephesian writeth, that he lived not aboue two yeares after. For Pysistratus vsurped tyrannicall power in the yeare that Comias was chiefe gouernor in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that So. lon dyed in the yeare that Hegestratus was gouernour, which was the next yeare after that. And where some say, the ashes of his body were after his death strewed abroad through the Isle of SALAMINA, that seemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuerthelesse it hath bene written by many notable Authors, and amongst others, by Aristotle the Philosopher.

The end of Solons life.

Tarquinius Superbus

the Kings.

OW we have declared what Solon was, we have thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the Romaine people for an honor gaue that furname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, descended from that ancient Valerius, who was one of the chiefest workers and meanes to bring the ROMAINES and the SABYNES, that were mortall enemies, to joyne together as one people. For it was he that most mooued the two Kings to agree, and iowne together. Publicola being descended of him, whilest the Kings did rule yet at Rome, was in very greate-stimation, as well for his eloquence as for his riches: vsing the one rightly & freely for the maintenance of inflice, and the other liberally and courteously for the releefe of the poore. So that it was manifest, if the Realme came to be converted into a publike state, he should be one of the chiefest men of the same. It chanced that king Tarquine surnamed the proud, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarily by indirect and wicked waies, and behaving himselse not like a king, but like a cruell tyrant, the people much hated and detested him, by reafon of the death of Lucretia (which killed her felfe for that she was forcibly rauished by him) and fo the whole city arose & rebelled against him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head & captaine of this insurrection and rebellion, did ioyne first with this Valerius: who did greatly fauour and affift his enterprise, and did helpe him to drive out king Tarquine with al his house and familie. Now whileft they were thinking that the people would choose some one alone to be chiefe ruler ouer them, in stead of a king: Valerius kept himselfe quiet, as yeelding willingly vn-

to Brutus the first place, who was meetest for it, having bene the chiefe author and worker of their recouered liberty. But when they faw the name of Monarchy (as much to fay, as four raignty alone) was displeasant to the people, and that they would like better to have the rule denided vnto two, and how for this cause they would rather choose two Consuls: Valerius then began to hope, he should be the second person with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him. For against Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was chosen Confull with him:not because he was a man of greater vertue, or of better estimation then Valerius but the noble men of nine collethe city fearing the practifes of those of the kings bloud, which sought by all the faire and flatte- tinus conring meanes they could to return eagaine into the citie, did determine to make fuch a one Confull, whom occasion forced to be their hard and heavie enemy, perswading themselves that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeeld vnto them. Valerius tooke this matter grienously, that they had a mistrust in him, as if he would not doe any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: for that he had neuer any private injurie offered him by the tyrants. Wherefore he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for prinate men, and wholly gaue vp to meddle in matters of state: infomuch as he gaue many occasion to thinke of his absence, and it troubled fome men much, who feared left vpon this his misliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the kings fide, & so bring al the city in an vprore, confidering it flood then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who stood in iclousie of some, would by oath be assured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day folemnly to take their oathes upon the facrifices: Valerous the with a good checreful countenance came into the market place, and was the first that took his oath he would leaue nothing vndone that might prejudice the Tarquines but with all his able power he would fight against them, and defend the liberty of the city. This oath of his maruelously rejoyced the Senate, and gaue great affurance also to the Consuls, but specially, because his deeds did shortly after performe his words. For there came ambaffadours to Rome which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of sweet and lowly speeches to win the fauor of the people, with commission of king to vse all the mildest meanes they could, to dulce and soften the hardned hearts of the multitude: largume who declared how the king had left all pride and cruelty, and meant to aske nought but reasonable things. The Confuls thought best to give them open audience, and to suffer them to speake Realme. to the people. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might peril the state much, and deliver occasion of new stir vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more afraid of wars, then of tyranny. After that, there came other ambassadours also, which said that Tarquine would from another thenceforth for euer giue ouer and renounce his title to the kingdome, and to make any more from Larwars, but befought them only, that they would at the least deliver him and his friends their mo- gunedeny and goods, that they might have wher withall to keepe them in their banishment. Many came by page and were very ready to yield to this request, and specially Callaring one of the Con on a pace, and were very ready to yeeld to this request, and specially Collations, one of the Confuls who did fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a fast and resolute man, and very fierce in his heate, ran immediatly into the market place, crying out that his fellow Consul was a traitor, and contented to grant the tyrants matter and meanes to make war vpon the city, where indeed they deserved not so much as to be relieved in their exile. Hereupo the people assembled together, & the first that spake in this affembly was a prinat man called Gains Minutius, who speaking of that demand, he fecretly corrupted the people, and practifed treason, which his ambassadors followed presending only to get the kings goods & his foregreeness that the first ambassadors ambassado followed, pretending only to get the kings goods & his fauorers together, faying, that they had dripped already fold some part, and some part they kept, and sent them daily. So as by delaying the time the tree.

in this fort with fuch pretences, they had corrupted two of the best and ancientest houses of the city:to wit, the family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senators: and the family of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senators: all which by their mothers, were Conful collations and Pitellians nephewes. The Vitellians also were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their own sister, & had former, traismany children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawn to their string two of the eldest of them, because they familiarly frequented together, being cosin germains, who they had entised their countries.

to be of their conspiracie, allying them with the house of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perswade themselues to rise to great honour and preferment by meanes of the king, rather then trust to their fathers wilfull hardnesse: for they called his seueritie to the wicked, hardnesse: for that he would neuer pardon any. Furthermore, Brutus had fained himself mad, and a foole of long time for safety of his life, because the tyrants should not put him to death: so that the name of Brutus only remained. After these two yong men had giuen their consentto be of the confederacie, & had spoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great and horrible oath, drinking the bloud of a man, & shaking hands in his bowels, whom they would facrifice. This matter agreed vpon betweene ari king of them, they met together to put their facrifice in execution, in the house of the Aquilians. They had fitly pickt out a dark place in the houseto do this facrifice in, & where almost no body came: yet it happed by chance, that one of the feruants of the house called Vindicius, had hidden himfelfe there, vnknowing to the traitors, and of no fet purpose, to spie and see what they did, or that he had any manner of inkling thereof before: but falling by chance vpon the matter: euen as the traitors came into that place with a countenance to do some secret thing of importance, fearing to be seene, he kept himself close, and lay behind a coffer that was there, fo that he saw al that was done, and what they faid and determined. The conclusion of their counsell in the end was this. The condo- that they would kil both the Confuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertifing the fame. which they gaue vnto his ambaffadors, being lodged in the house of the Aquilians, and were prefent at this conclusion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out also as secrely as he could, being maruellously troubled in mind, and at a maze how to deale in this matter. For hethought it dangerous (as it was indeed) to go and accuse the two sonnes vnto the father which was Brutus of so wicked and detestable a treason, and the nephewes vnto their vnele, which was collatinus. On the other fide also, he thought this was a secret, not to be imported re any private person, and not possible for him to conceale it, that was bound in duty to reueale it. So he resolued at the last to go to Valerius to bewray this treason, of a speciall affection to this man, by reason of his gentle and courteous vsing of men, giving easie accesse and audience vnto any that came to speake with him, and specially for that he disdained not to heare poore mens causes. Vindicius being gone to speake with him, and hauing told him the whole conspiracie before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abashed and searefull withail: whereupon he stayed him less the should slip away, and locked him in a chamber. charging his wife to watch the doore, that no body went in or out vnto him. And willed his brother alfo, that he should go and beset the kings palace round about, to intercept these letters if it were possible, and to see that none of their servants fled. Valerius himself being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friends and people that waited on him, went straight vnrothe house of the Aquilians, who by chance were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he found the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquins ambaffadors lay. Whileft he was thus occupied, the Aquilians having intelligence thereof, ran home immediatly, and found Valerius coming out at their gate. So they would have taken those letters from him by force and strong hand : but Valerius and his company did refift them, and moreouer hooded them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought the (do what they could) into the market place. The like was done also in the kings palace, where Marcus Valerius found other letters also wrapt vp in certaine fardels for their more fafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place all the Kings feruants he found there. There the Confuls having caused silence to be made, Valerius sent home to his house for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Consuls: then the traitours were openly accused, and their letters read, and they had not the face to answer one word. All that were present, being amazed, hung downe their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durst once open his mouth to speake, excepting a few, who to gratiste Brutus, beganne to say that they should banish them: and Collatinus also gaue them some hope, because he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his fonnes by their names: Come on (faid he) Titus and thou Valerius, why do you not answer to that you are accused of: and having spoken thrife vnto them to answer, when he saw they stood mute, and faid nothing: he turned him to the Sergeants, and faid vnto them: They are now Brutus sons in your hands, do instince. So soone as he had spoken these words, the Sergeants layed hold immediatly upon the two yong men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound their hands behind them, and then whipped them with rods: which was fuch a pitifull fight to all the people. that they could not find in their hearts to behold it, but turned them selues another way, because they would not fee it. But contrariwife, they fay that their own father had never his eye off them. neither did change his auftere and fierce countenance, with any pinie or naturall affection towards them; but fledfastly did behold the punishment of his owne children, vntill they were punished layed flat on the ground, and both their heads stricken off with an axe before him. When they were executed, Brutes arose from the bench, and left the execution of the rest vnto his fellow Confull. This was fuch an act, as men cannot fufficiently praife, nor reproduce nough. For either Brutus, it was his excellent vertue, that made his mind fo quiet, or else the greatnesse of his miserie that tooke away the feeling of his forrow: whereof neither the one nor the other was any small for the matter, but passing the common nature of man, that hath in it both divin nesse, and sometime death of his beaftly brutishnesse. But it is better the judgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their judgements should diminish his vertue. For the Romains holdopinion, it was not fo great an act done of Romalus first to build Rome, as it was for Brutus to recouer Rome, and the best libertic thereof, and to renew the ancient government of the fame. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was don. The Aquilians ftraight grew bold, for that they faw the other Confull Collations proceede gently collations and mildly against them: and so made petition they might have time given them to answer to the sessing and mildly against them: articles they were accused of, and that they might have their slave and bondman Vindicins deliuered into their hands, because there was no reason he should remaine with their accusers. The Confull feemed willing to yeeld thereto, and was ready to breake vp the affembly thereupon. But Valerius faid, he would not deliner Vindicius (who was among the affembly that attended vpon his person;) and staied the people besides for departing away, lest they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly sought to betray their countrie; vntill he himself had layed Valering hands vpo them, calling vpon Bruius to ailist him, withopen exclamation against Collatinus, that peacheth he did not behave himselflike a just and true man, seeing his fellow Brutus was forced for justice collatinus fake to see his own sons put to death: and he in contrary manner, to please a few women, sought of ininstities. to let goe manifest traitours, and open enemies to their countrie. The Confull being offended herewith, commanded they should bring away the bondman Vindicius. So the sergeants making way through the prease, laid hands vpon him to bring him away with them, and began to strike at them which offered to result them. But Valerius friends stept out before them, & put them by. The people shouted straight, and cryed out for Brutus: who with this noise returned againe into the market place, and after filence made him, he spake in this wise: For mine own children, I alone haue bene their sufficient Iudge, to see them haue the law according to their deseruings: the rest I have left freely to the judgement of the people. Wherefore (said he) if any man be disposed to speake, let him stand vp, and perswade the people as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more words, but onely to harken what the people cried: who with one voice and confent condemned them, & cried execution, & accordingly they had their heads striken off. Now was Conful Collatinus long before had in some suspicion, as allied to the kings, & disliked for his sur- Collatinus name, because he was called Tarquinius: who perceiving himself in this case much hated and miftrusted of the people, voluntarily yeelded vp his Consulship, and departed the city. The people ship, and then assembled themselues, to place a succession in his roome: they chose Valerius in his stead, without the contradiction of any, for his faithful trauel & diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerins judging that Vindicius the bondman had well deserved also some recompences caused him not onely to be manumissed by the whole grant of the people, but made him a free full in his man of the city befides: and he was the first bondman manumissed, that was made citizen of Place. Rome, with permission also to give his voice in all elections of officers, in any company or tribe the first he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the bondman common people, made it lawful for bondmen manumifled, to give their voices also in elections, as other citizens did: and vnto this day the perfect manumiffing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free-man. These things thus Vindicta so passed ouer, the goods of the kings were given to the spoile of the people, and their palaces were razed and ouerthrowne. belonging vnto king Tarquine: the same they consecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, and not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The sheaues being yet in shocks in the field. they thought they might not grinde the wheat, nor make any commoditie of the profit therof: wherfore they threw both corne and sheaues into the riuer, and trees also which they had hewen downe and rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, should be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. These sheaues thus throwne into the riuer, were caried downe by the streame not far from thence, vnto a foord and shallow place of the water, where they first did stay, and did let the other which came after, that it could goe no further: there these heapes gathered together, and lay so close one to another, that they began to sink and settle fast in the water. Afterwards the streame of the river brought downe continually such mud and granell, that it cuer increased the heape of come more and more, in such fort, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather foftly preffing and driving it together, did firme and harden it, and made it grow fo to land. Thus this heape rifing still in greatneffe and firmeneffe, by reason that all that came downe the river staied there, it grew in the endand by time to spread so farre, that at this day it is called the holy Iland in Rome: in which are wherefile many goodly temples of diverse gods, and fundry walkes about it, and they call it in latine, Inter duos pontes, in our tongue, Betweene the two bridges. Yet some write, that this thing fell not out boly !land at that time when the field of the Tarquines was confecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwards, when one of the Vestall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adiovning vnto Tarquins field. For which liberality and bounty of hers. they did grant her in recompence many primiledges, and did her great honour besides. As amongst others, it was ordained, that her word and witnesse should stand good, and be allowed in matters iudiciall: which priviledge neuer woman besides herselse did enioy. By speciall grace of the people allo, it was granted her, that the might mary if the thought it good : but yet the would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the report how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being pass hope of euer entring into his kingdome againe, went yet vnto the THYSCANES for fuccour, which were very glad of him: and so they leavied a great armie grest pow together, hoping to haue put him in his kingdome againe. The Confuls also hearing thereof. Thuscanes went out with their armie against him. Both the armies presented themselues in battell ray, one against another, in the holy places consecrated to the gods: wherof the one was called the wood battell with Arfia, and the other the meadow AFfunia. And as both armies began to give charge vpon each other, Arnus the eldest son of King Tarquine, and the Consul Brutus encountred together, not by Arfa Sylva chance, but fought for of set purpose to execute the deadly fode and malice they did beare each other. The one, as against a tyrant and enemie of the liberty of his country: the other, as against Arnsu and him that had benechiefe author and worker of their exile and expulsion. So they set spurres to Rrut HI CH their horses, so soone as they had spied each other, with more furie then reason, and fought so and fl.e each other. desperatly together, that they both fell starke dead to the ground. The first onset of the battell being so cruell, the end thereof was no leste bloudie: vntill both the armies having received and done like damage to each other, were parted by a maruellous great tempest that fellypon them. Now was Valerius maruellously perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wanne the field that day: feeing his fouldiers as forrowfull for the great loffe of their men lying dead The Victor men, whom the Romaines tooke prisoners every one, and had the spoile of their campe. The carkaffes were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were flaine in the battell, eleuen before them, as they were glad of the flaughter and victory of their enemies. For, to view the multitude of the flaine bodies of either fide, the number was fo equall in fight, that it was very hard to judge, of which fide fell out the greatest slaughter: so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were perswaded in their opinion, that they had rather lost then won, coniecturing afar off the fall of their enemies. The night being come, such things fell out as may be looked for after fo terrible a battell. For when both campes were all laied to rest, they say the wood wherein they lay incamped, quaked and trembled; and they heard a voice fay, that only one man more was flaine on the THVSCANES fide, than on the ROMAINES part. Out of doubt this was some voice from heaven: for the ROMAINES thereupon gaue a shrill shout, as those whose hearts received a new quickning spirit or courage. The THYSCANS on the contrary part were so afraid, that the most part of the sole out of the camp, and scattered here and there: and there remained behind about the number of fine thousand

This battel was fought (as they fay) the last day of February, & the Conful Valerius triumpled, being the first of the Confuls that ever entred into Rome triumphing vpon a chariot drawne conful that with foure horses, which fight the people found honourable & goodly to behold, and were not eutriumoffended withal (as some seeme to report) nor yet did enuie him for that he began it. For if it had

They much commended also the honor he did to his fellow Confull Brutus, in fetting out his funerals and obsequies, at the which he made a funeral oration in his The field bei praise. the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praising the dead at their funerals, was Anaximenes first of all instituted by Solon. But they did most enuy Valerius, & beare him grudge, because Bru- nessaith, tus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their liberty) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twife, that they should appoint Valerius fellow Confull with him. Confull with him, and fearing left through enuie or ignorance, the partie might thwart his purposeand meaning: employed his sole power and authority whilest he ruled alone, vpon high and noble attempts. For first of al he supplied up the number of the Senatours that were greatly decayed because king Tarquin had put some of them to death not long before, and other also had bene lately flaine in the wars, in whose places he had chosen new Senatours, to the number of a hundred threefcore and foure. After that, he made new decrees and laws which greatly did adnance the authority of the people. The first law gane liberty to all offenders, condemned by indgement of the Confuls, to appeale vnto the people. The fecond, that no man vpon paine of death should take upon him the exercise of any office, unlesse he had come to it by the gift of the people. The third was, all in fauor of the poore, that the poore citizens of Rome should pay no more custome, nor any impost whatsoever. This made every man the more willing to give himselse to some craft or occupation, when he saw his trauell should not be taxed, or taken from him. As for the law that he made against those that disobeyed the Consuls, it was found to be fo fauourable to the communaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, then for the rich and great men. For the offenders and breakers of that law, were condemned to pay for a penaltie, the value of fine oxen and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, ten oboles, and of an oxe, an hundred oboles. For in those daies, the Roman Es had no store of coyned money: otherwise, they lacked no sheep, nor other rother beasts. Hereof it came, that to this day they call their riches or fubstance, Peculium, because Pecus signifieth sheepe and muttons. And in the old time the stumpe vpon their money was an oxe, a mutton, or a hogge: and some of them called their children Bubulei, which fignifieth cowheards: others Caprarii, to fay, goateheards: and other Porcij, as you would fay, swineheards. Now though in all his other lawes he was very fauourable and temperate towards the people: yet in that moderation, sometimes he did set grieuous paines and punishments. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accusation. that did aspire to the kingdome, and he did set the murderer free of all punishment so he brought forth manifest proofe, that the partie slaine, had practifed to make himselfe King. As being impossible a man should pretend so great a matter, and no man should find it: and contrariwise being possible, albeit he were spied, that otherwise he might attempt it, by making himselfe so ftrong, that he needed not paffe for the law. In this case he gaue every man liberty by such an act or meane, to preuent him if he could of differetion, who by strength otherwise sought to aspire to reigne. They greatly commeded him also for the law that he made touching the treasure. For being very necessarie that every private citizen should according to his ability, be contributor to the charges and maintenance of the wars: he himself would neither take such collection into his charge, nor fuffer any man of his to meddle with the same, nor yet that it should be laid in any private mans house, but he did ordaine that Saturnes temple should be the treasurie thereof. This order they keepe to this prefent day. Furthermore, he granted the people to chuse two young men Questores of the same, as you would say the treasurers, to take the charge of this money; and the two first which were chosen, were Publius Veturus, and Marcus Minutus, who gathered great fummes of mony together. For numbring the people by the polle, there were found a hundred and thirty thousand persons which had paied subsidie, not reckoning in this account, orphans, or widowes, which were exempted from all payments. After he had established all these things he caused Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be chosen fellow Confull with him, vnto whom, for that he was his ancient, he gaue the vpper hand, and commanded they should carrie before him the rods, which were the fignes of the chiefe magistrate: and euer fince they have giuen this honor vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they chose againe in his place Marcus Horatius, who held out the Consulfhip with Publicola the rest of the yeare. Now about that time King Tarquine remained in the countrie of THYSCANE, where he prepared a fecond armie against the ROMAINS, and there fell out a maruellous strange thing thereupon. For when he reigned King of Rome, he had almost made an end of the building of the temple of Inpiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle received, or vpon any fantafie, it is not knowne) to fet vp a couch of earth baked by a potter, in the highest place of the temple, and he put it out to be done by certain Thyseans workmen of the city of Veies; but whilest they were in hand with the worke, he was driven out of his Realme. When the Workemen had formed this couch, and that they had put it into the fornace to bake it, it fell out contrary to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worke put into the fornace. For the earth did not shut and close together in the fire, nor dryed vp all the moissure thereof: but rather to the contrary it did swell to such a bignesse, and grew so hard & strong withall, that they were drinen to break up the head and walles of the fornace to get it out. The foothfayers did expound this, that it was a celestiall token from aboue, and promised great prosperity and increase of power vnto those that should enjoy this coach. Whereupon the VEIANS resolued not to deliver it vnto the Romaines that demanded it, but answered that it did belong vnto King Tarquine, and not vnto those that had banished him. Not many daies after, there was a solemne feast of games for running of horses in the city of VEIES, where they did also many other notable acts, worthy fighraccording to their custome. But after the game was played, he that had won the bell, being crowned in token of victory, as they did vse at that time, brought his coach and horses faire and softly out of the shew place; and sodainely the horses being affraid vpon no present cause or occasion seene, whether it was by chance, or by some secret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their coach to the city of Rome. The coach driver did what he could possible at the first to stay them, by holding in the reines, by clapping them on the backes, and speaking gently to them; but in the end, perceiving he could doe no good, and that they would have their swinge, he gave place to their fury, and they never left running, till they brought him neare to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrew him and his coach, not farre from the gate called at this prefent, Ratumena. The VEIANS wondering much at this matter, and being afraid withall, were contented the workmen should deliuer their coach made of earth vnto the ROMAINES. Now concerning lupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquin the first (which was the fonne of Demaratus) vowed in the warres that he made against the SABYNES, that he would build it. And Tarquin the proud, being the sonne of him that made this vow did build it: howbeit he did not consecrate it, because he was driven out of his Kingdome before he had finished it. When this temple was built and throughly finished, and set forth with all his ornaments: Pub. licola was maruellously defirous to have the honor of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours ennying his glory, being very angry that he could not content himselfe with all those honours that he had received in peace for the good lawes he had made, and in warres for the victories he had obtained and well deserved, but further that he would seeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing did pertaine vnto him: they then did egge Horarius, and perswaded him to make suite for the same. Occasion fell out at that time, that Publicola must have the leading of the Romaines army into the field: in the meane time while Publicola was absent, it was procured that the people gaue their voices to Horatius, to confecrate the temple, knowing they could not fowel haue brought it to passe he being preset. Other say, the Consuls drew lots between them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to lead the army against his wil, and vpon Hovatius to confecrate this temple, which may be conicctured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication therof. For althe people being assembled together in the Capitol with great filence, on the 15. day of the moneth of September, which is about the new moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius having done all the ceremonies needfull in fuch a cafe, & holding then the doores of the temple as the vse was, cuen to vtter the solemne words of dedication, Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, having stood a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunity to speake, began to say alowd in this wise: My Lord Consull, your fonne is dead of a sicknesse in the Campe. This made all the assembly sorie to heare it, but it nothing amazed Horatius, who spake onely thus much: Cast his body then where you will, for me the thought is taken. So hee continued on to end his confecration. This was but a deuice and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, onely to make Horatius leave off his confectation. Horatius in this shewed himselfe a maruellous resolute man, were it that he straight found his deuice, or that he beleeved it to be true; for the fodainenesse of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in confecrating of the second temple. For this first which Tarquine had built and Horatius confecrated, was confumed by fire in the civill warres: and the fecond was built vpagaine by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus fet vp the superscription of the dedi-tolin temcation, because sylla died before he could dedicateit. The second temple was burnt again enor ble was bornt again enor ble was burnt again enor burnt & long after the troubles and tumults which were at Rome, under Vitellius the Emperour. The bulle a. third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Vespasian, from the ground to the top. 34116. But this good happe he had aboue other: to see his worke perfected and finished before his death, and not overthrowne, as it was immediatly after his death. Wherein he did farre passe the happines of Sylla, who died before he could dedicate that he had built: and the other decea. fed before he law his work ouerthrowne. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground inconti-Bow much nently after his death. It is reported the only foundations of the first temple, cost Tarquinius fortie thousand Pondos of filuer. And to gild only the temple which we see now in our time, they say all the goods and fubstance that the richest citizen of Rome then had, will come nothing neare vnto it for it cost about 12. thousand talents. The pillars of this temple are cut out of a quarry of marble called pentlike marble and they were fquared parpine as thick as long: these I saw at A. THENS. But afterwards they were cut againe, & polished in Rome, by which doing they got not so much grace as they lost proportion: for they were made too flender, & left naked of their first beauty. Now he that would wonder at the stately building of the Capitol, if he came afterwards vnto the palace of Domitian, and did but see some gallery, porch, hall, or hot house, or his concubines chambers: he would fay (in my opinion) as the Poet Epicarmus faid of a prodigall man:

It is a fault, and folly both in thee, To lash out gifts and produgall rewards: For fond delights without all rule that bee.

Porfena proclaimeth wars with Rome. Publicol 1 and Titus Lucretius

Horatius

Regarding not what happens afterwards. So might they justly say of Domitian: Thouart not liberall, nor devout vnto the gods: but it is a vice thou haft to love to build, and defireft (as they fay of old Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold and precious stones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquin after that great foughten battell wherein he loft his fonne (that was flaine by Brutus in fighting together hand to hand) went to the city of CLvs IVM, vnto King Claras Por fena, the mightiest Prince that reigned at that time in all I TALIE, and was both noble and a courteous Prince. Porfera promifed him aide : and first of all he sent to Rome to summon the citizens to receive their King againe. But the Romaine's refusing the summons, he sent forthwith an Herald to proclaime open warres against them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwards immediatly with a great armie. Publicola now being absent, was chosen Confull the second time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to Rome, because he would exceed King Porfena in greatnesse of mind, he began to build a city called Siglive ta seven when the King with all his armie was not farre from Rome : and having walled it about to his maruellous charge, he fent thither feuen hundred citizens to dwell there, to shew that he made litle account of this warre. Howbeit Porfena at his comming did give such a lusty affault to the mount Ianiculum, that they draue out the fouldiers which kept the same, who flying towards Rome, were purfued so hard with the enemies, that with them they had entred the towne, had not Publicola made a fally out to refift them. Who began a hot skirmish hard by the river of Tyber, and there thought to have staied the enemies, to follow any further. which being the greater number did ouerlay the Romaines, and did hurt Publicola very fore in this skirmish, so as he was caried away into the citie in his souldiers armes. And euen so was the other Confull Lucretius hurt in like case: which so discouraged and frayed the Romanes, that they all took them to their legges, and fled towards the city. The enemies purfued them at their heeles, as farre as the woodden bridge: so that the city was in maruellous hazard of taking vpon the sedaine. But Horatius Cocles, and Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefest noble yong men of the citie, stood with them to the defence of the bridge, and made head against the enemic. This Horatius was furnamed Coeles (as much to fay, as one eye) because he had lost one of the in the wars. Howbeit other writers fay, it was because of his flat nose, which was so sunke into his head, that they faw nothing to part his eyes, but that the eye browes did meete together by reason whereof the people thinking to surname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they fay) Cocles. But how focuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to shew his face against the enemy, and to keep the bridge, untill such time as they had cut & broken it up hehind him. When he faw they had done that, armed as he was, and hurt in the hip with a pike of the Thyscanes, he leaped into the river of Tyber, and faued himselfe by swimming vnto the other fide. Publicola wondering at this manly act of his perswaded the Romaines straight, euery one according to his ability, to give him to much as he spent in a day: and afterwards also he caused the common treasurieto give him as much land as he could compasse about with his plow in a day. Furthermore he made his image of braffe to be fet vp in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Now whilest

King Porfena was hotly bent very straightly to besiege Rome, there began a famine among the ROMAINES: and to increase the danger, there came a new army out of Thyseane which ouerranne, burnt, and made waste, all the territorie of Rome. Whereupon Publicola being Publicola chosen Consult then the third time, thought hee should neede to do no more to resist Parjena comput. brauely, but to be quiet only, and to looke well to the fafe keeping of the city. Howbeit fpying his oportunity, he fecretly stole out of Rome with a power, and did set ypon the Thys canes that destroyed the countrey about; and ouerthrew and slue of them fine thousand men. As for the historie of Mutius, many do diversly report it: but I will write it in such fort, as I think shall best agree with the truth. This Auties was a worthy man in all respects, but specially for the warres. He denising how he might come to kill king parket dismised him take in True a dissimiled him take in warres. He denifing how he might come to kill King Porfena, difguifed himfelfe in THVS CANES tins Scanes apparell, and speaking Thyse ANE very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kings In chaire, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, he durft not aske which was he, left he should be discouered, but drew his sword at aduenture, and slue him whom hee tooke to be King. Vpon that they layd hold on him, and examined him. And a pan full of fire being brought for the King that intended to do facrifice vnto the gods, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King fall in his face, whileft the flesh of his hand did frie off, he neuer changed hew nor countenance: the King wondering to fee fo strange a fight, called to them to withdraw the fire, and he himselfe did deliver him his sword againe, Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they fay afterwards, he had ginen him How Muthe furname of scauela, as much to fay, as left handed, and told him in taking of it: Thou couldest not Porsens with feare have overcomed me, but now through courtesie thou hast wonne of Seconds. me. Therefore for good will I will reucale that vnto thee, which no force nor excremitie could have made me vtter. There are three hundred Romains dispersed through thy campall which are prepared with like minds to follow that I have begunne, onely gaping for oportunitie to put it in practife. The lot fell on me to be the first to breake the ice of the enterprise: and yet I am not fory my hand failed to kill fo worthy a man, that deserueth rather to be a friend then an enemy vnto the Romatnes. Porfena hearing this, did beleeue it, and ener after he gaue the more willing care to those that treated with him of peace; not so much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in waite to kill him, as for the admiration of the Ro-MAINE'S noble mind and great courage, All other writers call this man, Mutius Scenola: howbeit Athenodorus surnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octavia, Augustus sister, saith that he was also called Opfigonus, But Publicola taking king Porfena not to be so dangerous an enemy to Rome, as he should be a profitable friend and ally to the same, let him vnderstand that he was contented to make him judge of the controucifie betweene them and Tarquine: Publisha whom he did many times prouoke to come and haue his cause heard before king Porsena, where Porsena he would instifie to his face, that he was the naughtiest and most wicked man of the world, and indge bethat he was infly driven out of his countrie. Tarquine sharpely answered, that he would make with them no man his judge, and Porfena least of all other, for that having promised him to put him againe Farquines, in his Kingdome, he was now gone from his word, and had changed his minde. Perfena was very angry with this answere judging this a manifest token that his cause was ill. Wherefore Peace grant Porfena being folicited againe by his owne fonne Aruns, who loued the ROMAINES, did cafily grant them peace vpon condition: that they should redeliner backeagaine to him the lands Porfera. they had gotten before within the country of THVSCANE, with the prisoners also which they had taken in this warre, and in lieu thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the Romains, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the Romaines delinered him hostages, ten of the noblest mens sonnes of the city, and so many of their daughters: among which was Valeria, Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porfena brake his army, and withdrew his strength, trusting to the peace concluded. The Romaines daughters deliuered for hostages, came downe to the rivers side to wash them, in a quiet place where the ffreame ranne but gently, without any force or fwiftnesse at all. When they were there, and saw they had no guard about them, nor any came that way, nor yet any boates going vp nor downe the streame; they had a desire to swimme ouer the riuer, which ranne with a swift streame, and was maruellous deepe. Some fay, that one Clalia fwamme the river vpon her horse backe, and claliaco that she did embolden and encourage the other to swimme hard by her horse side: and recoucring the other banke, and being part all danger, they went and presented themselves before

Publicola the Confull. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had played, but was maruellous forry, fearing left men would judge him leffe carefull to keepe his faith, then was king Porfena: and that he might suspect the boldnesse of these maidens was but a crastie fleight deuifed of the Romaine s: therefore hee tooke them all againe, and fent them immediarly vnto King Porfens. Whereof Tarquine having intelligence, he layed an ambush for them that had the conduction of them. Who to foone as they were past the river, did show themselves, and brake vpon the Romaines: they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very fromly defend themselves. Now whiles they were in earnest fight together. Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and three of her fathers feruants, escaped through the midft of them, and saued them. felues. The refidue of the virgins remained in the middeft among their fwords, in great danger of their lines. Aruns king Porfenas sonne advertised hereof, ran thither incontinently to the refcue: but when he came the enemies fled, and the Romains sheld on their journy to redeliver their hostages. Persona seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that began first to passe the river, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clelia. He looked upon her very earneftly, and with a pleafant countenance, and commanded they should bring him one of his best horses in the stable, and the richest furniture he had for the fame, and so he gaue it vnto her. Those which hold opinion that none but Claira passed the river on horsebacke, do alledge this to prove their opinion true. Other do deny it, faying that this THVSCANE king, did only honour her noble courage. Howfocuer it was, they fee her image on horsebacke in the holy streete, as they goe to the pallace; and some say it is the statue of Valeria other of Clalia. After Porferia had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking up his campe, he shewed his noble mind unto them in many other things, and specially in that he commanded his fouldiers they should cary nothing but their armour and weapon only, leauing his campe full of come, victuals, and other kind of goods. From whence this custome came, that at this day, when they make open fale of any thing belonging to the common-weale, the fergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porlenas goods, and taken of thankefulneffe and perpetuall memory of his bounty & liberality towards them. Further, Porfense image standeth adiovning to the pallace where the Senate is vsed to be kept, which is made of great antique worke. Afterwards the SABYNES invading the Romains territory with a great force. Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then chosen Confull, with one Posthumius Tubertus, Howbeit all matters of weight and importance patied by Publicolaes counfell and authoritie, who was present at any thing that was done: and by whose meanes Marcus his brother wan two great battels, in the laft whereof he flue thirteene thousand of his enemies, not losing one of his ownemen. For which his victories, besides the honour of triumph he had, the people also at their owne charges, built him a house in the street of mount Palatine, & granted him moreouer that his dore should open outwards into the street, whereas other mens doores did open inwards into their house: fignifying by grant of this honour and priviledge, that he should alwaies have benefit by the common-weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houses in old time, did all open outwards after that fashion: and they doe coniecture it by the comedies that are plaied: where those that would go out of their houses, did first knocke at their doores, and make a noise within the house, lest in opening their doore vpon a sudden, they might ouerthrow or hurt him that taried at the street doore, or passed by the way, who hearing the noise, had warning straight to avoid the danger. The next yeare after that, Publicola was chosen Conful the fourth time, because they stood in great doubt that the SARYNES and LATINES would ioyne together to make wars vpon them; befides all this, there was a certaine superstitious feare ran through the city, of some ill hap toward it, because most part of the women with child were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking fome one lim or other, and al of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicula looking in some of Sybillaes bookes, made private sacrifice vnto Pluto, and did fet vp againe fome feafts and folemine games that were left off, and had bene commanded before time to be kept by the Oracle of Apollo. These meanes having a little reioyced thecity with good hope, because they thought that the anger of the gods had bene appealed: Publicola then began to provide for the dangers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in al places, and made great preparation to inuade them. Now there was at that time amongst the SABYNES, a great rich mā called Appius Clausurs, very strong and actine of body, and otherwise a man of great reputation and eloquence, about all the rest of his country menibut not with standing he was much enuied, and could not anoide it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to stay those intended wars against the Romaines. Whereupon, many which before tooke occasion, to murmur against him, did now much more increase the same: with saying hee sought to maintaine the power of the Ro-MAINES, that afterwards by their aide he might make himfelf tyrant & king of the country. The comon people gaue casse care vnto such speeches, & Appias perceining well mough how the soldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine and accuse him. Wherefore being wel backed & flood to by his kinfemen, friends, and followers, he practifed to make a ftir among the SABYNS, which was the cause of staying the wars against the ROMAINES. Publicola also for his parewas very diligent, not only to vnderstand the original cause of this sedition, but to seede on further and increase the same, having gotten men meete for that purpose, which carried Appins fuch a meffage from him: That Publicola knew very well he was a just man, and one that would not be renenged of his citizens to the generall hurt of his countrey, although the iniuries he receined at their hands, delinered him inth occasion to do it : neuerthelesse if he had any desireto prouide for his fafety, and to repaire to Rome, leaning them which causelesse wished him so much cuill, they would both openly and privatly receive him with that due honour which his vertue descrued, and the worthinesse of the Romains people required. Clauses having long and many times confidered this matter with himfelf, refolued that it was the best way be could take, making vertue of necessity, and therefore being determined to do it, he did procure his friends to do as he did, and they got other also to them, so that he brought away with him out of the countrey of the SABYNES, fine thousand families with their wines and children (of the quietest and most peaceable people among the Sabynes) to dwell at Rome. Publicola being adnertifed thereof before they came, did receive them at their coming to Rome, with greatioy, and all manner of good courteous entertainement. For at their first coming, he made them all and their families free citizens, and officined with a profession of them. and their families free citizens, and affigned vnto enery person of them two ingera of land (which contained one acre, one rood, eleuen pole, and fixtie nine parts of a pole) by the riuer of Tyber : and vnto Appius selfe he gaue fine and twenty ingera (to wit, fixteene acres and a halfe, foure pole and seuenty sixe parts of a pole) and received him into the number of the Senatours. And thus came he first vnto the gouernement of the common-weale in Rome, where he did so wisely behaue himselse, that in the end he came to be the chiefest man of dignity and authority in Rome, folong as he lived. After his death he left behind him the family of the Clau The family dians, descending from him: which for honour, and worthinesse, gaue no place to the nobless family in Rome. But now the fedition amongst the SARYNES being pacified, by the departure of those that were gone to Rome: the seditious gouernours would not suffer those that remained to line in peace, but fill cried out, it were too much shame for them, that Clausus being a fugitiue, and become an enemy, should honour their enemies abroad, that being present durst not shew fo much at home, and that the Romaines should escape vnreuenged, who had done them such apparant wrongs. So they raifed great force and power, and went and encamped with their army necre the city of FIDENES, and layd an ambush hard by Rome, incertaine hidden and hollow places, where they put two thousand choise footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to fend certaine light horsemen to runne and prey to Rome gates: commanding them, that when the Romains came out of the city to charge them, they should feeme leisurely to retire, vntill they had drawne them within danger of their ambush. Publicola receiving fall intelligence of all their intention, by a traitour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priny ambush, and so deuided his army into two parts: for he gaue his sonne in law Postbumius Balbus, three thousand footmen, whom hee sent away by night, commanding them the same night to take the hils, in the bottome whereof the SAEYNS were laid in ambush. Lucretius, fellow Confull with Publicola, liquing the lightest and lustiest men of the citie, was appointed to make head against the vanteurrers of the Sabynes that minded to approch the gates. And Publicola with the rest of the army, marched a great compasse about to inclose his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chance it was a thicke miste, and at that present time, Posthumius comming downe from the hilles, with great shoutes charged them that lay in ambash. Lucretius on the other side, set vpon the light horsemen of the SABYNES: and Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all fides the SABYNES enterprise had very ill successes for they had the worst in enery place, and the Romains skilled them flying,

Publicola the Confull. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had played, but was maruellous forry, fearing lest men would judge him lesse carefull to keepe his faith, then was king Porfena; and that he might suspect the boldnesse of these maidens was but a craftie fleight deuised of the Romain est therefore hee tooke them all againe, and sent them immediatly vnto King Porfens. Whereof Turquine having intelligence, he layed an ambush for them that had the conduction of them. Who so soone as they were past the river, did shew themselves, and brake vponthe Romaines: they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very fromly defend themselues. Now whiles they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and three of her fathers feruants, escaped through the midst of them, and faued them. sclues. The residue of the virgins remained in the middest among their swords, in great danger of their liues. Aruns king Porfenas fonne advertised hereof, ran thither incontinently to the rescue: but when he came the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their journy to redeliver their hoftages. Por lena feeing them againe, asked which of them it was that began first to paffe the river, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clelia. Clauses having long and many times confidered this matter with himself, resolued that it was the best way becould take, making vertue of necessity; and therefore being determined to doit, he did procure his friends to do as he did, and they got other also to them, so that he brought away with him our of the countrey of the SABYNES, flue thousand families with their wives and children (of the quietest and most peaceable people among the Sabynes) to dwell at Rome. Publicola being adnertifed thereof before they came, did receive them at their coming to Rome, with greation, and all manner of good courteous entertainement. For at their first coming, he made them all their families from citizens and effected when purposes of them two instances of least them. and their families free citizens, and affigned vnto enery person of them two ingera of land (which contained one acre, one rood, cleuen pole, and fixtie nine parts of a pole) by the riner of Tyber : and vnto Appius selse he gaue fine and twenty ingera (to wit, fixteene acres and a halfe, foure pole and seventy fixe parts of a pole) and received him into the number of the Senatours. And thus came he first vnto the gouernement of the common-weale in Rome, where he did so wisely behaue himselse, that in the end he came to be the chiefest man of dignity and authority in Rome, folong as he lived. After his death he left behind him the family of the Clau The family dians, descending from him: which for honour, and worthinesse, gaue no place to the noblest family in Rome. But now the sedition amongst the Sabynes being pacified, by the departure of those that were gone to Rome: the seditious gouernours would not suffer those that remained to line in peace, but fill cried out, it were too much shame for them, that Clausus being a fugitive, and become an enemy, should honour their enemies abroad, that being present durst not shew fo much at home, and that the Romaines should escape vnreuenged, who had done them such apparant wrongs. So they raifed great force and power, and went and encamped with their army necre the city of FIDENES, and layd an ambush hard by Rome, incertaine hidden and hollow places, where they put two thousand choise footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to fend certaine light horsemen to runne and prey to Rome gates: commanding them, that when the Romaines came our of the city to charge them, they should feeme leisurely to retire, untill they had drawne them within danger of their ambush. Publicola receiving fall intelligence of all their intention, by a traitour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priny ambush, and so deuided his army into two parts: for he gaue his fonne in law Posthumius Balbus, three thousand footmen, whom hee fent away by night, commanding them the same night to take the hils, in the bottome whereof the SABYNS were laid in ambush. Lucretius, fellow Confull with Publicola, having the lightest and lustiest men of the citie, was appointed to make head against the vantcurrers of the Sabynes that minded to approch the gates. And Publicola with the rest of the army, marched a great compasse about to inclose his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chance it was a thicke miste, and at that present time, Posthumius comming downe from the hilles, with great shoutes charged them that lay in ambash. Lucretius on the other side, set vpon the light horsemen of the SABYNES: and Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all fides the SABYNES enterprise had very ill successe; for they had the worst in enery place, and the Romaines killed them slying, without any turning againe to make refistance. Thus the place which gaue them hope of best fafety, turned most to their deadly ouerthrow. For every one of their companies supposing the other had bene whole and vabroken, when a charge was given vpon them, did ftraight breake, & neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemy. For they that were in the camp, ran toward them that were in ambush: and those which were in ambush on the contrary side, ranne towards them that were in campe. So that in flying the one met with the other, and found those, towards whom they were flying to have bene safe, to stand in as much need of helpe as themselves. That which saucd some that were not slaine, was the city of Fidenes, which was neere the camp, and specially saued those which sled thither. But such as came short of the by mess faine city, and could not in time recourer it, were all slaine in the field, or taken prisoners. As for the glory of this honourable victory, albeit the Romaines were wont to afer ibe all fuch great notable matters to the speciall prouidence and grace of the gods, yet at that time not with standing, they did indge that this happy fuccesse fell out by the wise for elight and valiant ness that had ferued in this iourney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had delinered their enemies into their hands, lame, and blind, and as a man might say, bound hand and fecte to kill them at their pleasure. The people were maruellously enriched by this victory, as well for the spoyle, as for the ransome of the prisoners that they had gotten. Now Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the government of the citie to those which were chosen Consuls for the years following, diedincontinently, having lined as honourably and vertuoufly all the dayes of his life, as any man living might do. The people then took order for his funerals, that the charges therof should be defrayed by the city, as if they had never done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene still debters vnto him for the noble service he had done vnto the state and common-weale whilest he liued. Therefore towards his funerall charges, enery citizen gauca peece of mony called Quatrine. The women also for their part to honour his funerals, agreed among themselves to mourne a whole yeare in blacke for him, which was a great and honourable memoriall. He was buried also by expresse order of the people, within the city, in the streete called Velia; and they granted priviledge also vnto all his posterity, to be buried in the selfe same place. Howbeit they do no more bury any of his there. But when any dye, they bring the corfe vnto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it vnder the place, and take it straight away againe, to shew that they

haue liberty to bury him there, but that they willingly refuse this

presently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not found in any other of their liues which we have written of before. And the same is, that the one hath bene a witnesse, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the fentence that solon spake to king Crasus, touching Tellus felicity and happinesse, might have bene better applyed vnto Publicola then to Tellins: whom he judged to be very happy, because Publicola he dyed honourably, he had lived vertuoufly, and had left behind him happy. goodly children. And yet solon speaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his poems : neither did he euer beare any honourable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowneafter his death. Whereas Publicola fo long as he lined, was alwaies the chiefe among the ROMAINES, of credit and authority: and afterwards fince his death, certaine of the noblett families, and most ancient houses of Rome in these our daies, as the Publicoles, the Messales, and the Valerians, for fixe hundred yeares continuance, do referre the glory of the nobility and ancientry of their houses vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was flaine by his enemies, fighting valiantly like a worthy honeft man. But Publicola died after he had flaine his enemies; which is farre more greater good hap, then to be flaine. For after he as Generall had honourably ferued his country in the wars and had left them conquerers, having in his life time received al honours and triumphs due vnto his feruice, he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accompted and effeemed most happy and bleffed. Also in wishing manner, he would his end should be lamented to his praise, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuance of mans life, by faying:

Let not my death without lamenting paffe, But rather let my friends bewaile the same: Whose gricuous teares, and cries of out alas, May of tresound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good happe, then most happic maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinsfolkes, but the whole citicalfo, and many thousand persons besides, didbitterly bewaile the losse of him. For all the women of Rome did mourne for him in blacke, and did most pitifully lament his death, as enery one of them had lost either father, brother, or hus-

> True it is, that I couct goods to have : But yet fo got as may me not deprane.

fpent most honestly in helping the needie. So that if solon was justly reputed the wifes man, we must needs confesse also that Publicola was the happiest. For what the one desired for the greatest and most perfect good a man can have in the world, the other hath wonne it, keps it, and vsed it all his life time, vntill the houre of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done the like vnto Solon; thewing himielfe a perfect example & lookingglatse, where men may see how to gouerne a popular state: when he made his Consulship void of all pride and stately shew, and became himselfe affable, courteous, and beloved of every body. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes: as when he ordained, that the people onely should have authority to chuse and create all common officers and magistrates, and that they might appeale from any Judge to the people - as Solon when he suffered them to appeale vnto the judges of the people. Indeed Publicola did not create any new Senate, as Solon did: but hee did augment the first number, with as many persons almost as there were before. He did also first creet the office of Questiores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Because the chiefest magistrate, if he were an honest man, should not for so light an occasion be taken from the care of better and more weighty affaires: and if hee were wickedly giuen, and ill disposed, that he should have no such meane or occasion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treasure of the city in his hands, and to command what hee lift. Moreouer in hating the tyrants, Publicola therein was farre more sharpe and terrible. For Solon in his lawes punifhed him that went about to make himselse a tyrant, yet after he was convicted thereof by law: but Publicola ordained that they should kill him, before the law did passe vpon him, that sought to beking. And where Solon iustly and truly vaunteth himselfe, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole consent of the citizens, yet he did not withftanding refuse it: this vaunt and glory is as due vnto Publicola; who finding the dignitic of a Consult tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauourable for the people, not taking vpon him all the authority he might lawfully have done. And it seemeth that solon knew before him, what was the true and direct way to gouerne a common-weale vpright. For he faith in one place;

Both great and small of power, the better will obay, If wee too little or too much supon them do not lay.

The discharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of liberty. For little preuaileth law to make equality among citizens, when debts doe hinder the poore people to enjoy the benefit thereof. And where it feemeth that they have most libertie, as in that they may be chosen Judges and officers, to speake their opinion in the councell, and give their voyces also: there indeed are they most bound and subject, because they do but obey the rich in all they do command. But yet in this act there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted: That commonly discharging of debts, was wont to breede great tumults and seditions in common-weales. And solon having vsed it in a very good time (as the Physition venturing a dangerous medicine) did appeafethe sedition already begun, and did viterly quench through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wisdome and vertue, all the infamy and accusation that might have growne of that act. As for their first entrie into the gouernement, Solons beginning was farre more noble: for he went before, and followed not another; and himselfe alone without any others helpe, did put in execution the best, and more part of his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes end and death much more glorious and happie: for solon before hee died, faw all his common-wealth ouerthrowne; but Publicolacs common-weale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broile of civill wars began againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wooden tables, leaving them without defence of any man, went his way immediatly out of the city of ATHENS. Pub. licola abiding continually in Rom E gouerning the state, did throughly stablish and confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore solon having wifely foreseene Pysistratus practises, aspiring to make himselse King, he could neuer let him for all that, but was himselse ouercome and oppressed with the tyranny he faw (tablished in his owne fight, and in despite of him: where Publicola ouerthrew and did put downe a mighty Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly stablished; his vertue and defire being equall with Solons, and having had besides fortune fauourable, and sufficient power to execute his vertuous and well disposed mind. But as for warres and martiall deeds, there is no comparison to be made betweene them. For Daimachus

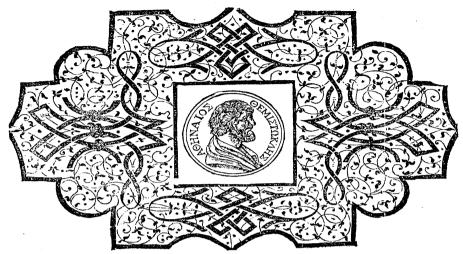

Plataian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS vnto Solon, as we have written it: where Publicola being Generall of an army, and fighting himfelfe in person, hath wonne many great battels. And as for matters of peace and civill government, Solon neuer durst present himself openly to perswade the enserprise of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfeit madnesse, and as a fooleto make sport: where Publicola taking his aduenture from the beginning, shewed himselfe without dissimulation, an open enemy to Tarquine, and afterwards he reuealed all the wholeconspiracy. And when he had bene the onely cause and author of punishing the travtours, he did not only drive out of Rome the tyrants selves in person, but tooke from them alfo all hope of returne againe. Who having alwaies thus nobly and valiantly behaved himselfe, without shrinking backe, or flying from ought that required force, a manly courage, or open refistance : did yet show himselse discreet, where wisedome was requisite, or reason and perswafion needfull. As when he cunningly wanne King Porfena, who was a dreadfull enemy vnto him, and innincible by force: whom he handled in fuch good fort, that he made him his friend. Peraduenture fome might stand in this, and fay: that Solon recoursed the Ile of SALAMINA VIto the Athenians, which they would have loft. Publicela to the contrary, restored the lands vnto Porsena againe, which the Romains had conquered before, within the country of Thys-CANE. But the times in which these things were done, are alwaies to be considered of. For a wife governour of a Realme, and politicke man, doth governe diversly according to the occafions offered, taking every thing in his time wherein he will deale and many times, inletting go pup. one thing, he faueth the whole; and in lofing a little, he gaineth much: as Publicola did, who lofing a litle peece of another mans countrey which they had vsurped, saued by that meanes all that was affuredly his owne. And whereas the Romaine's thought he should do very much forthem, to faue their city onely, he got them moreouer, all the goods that were in their enemies campe, which did befiege them. And in making his enemy judge of his quarrell, he wan the victorie: winning that moreouer, which he would gladly have given to have ouercome, and haue sentence passe on his side. For the King their enemy did not onely make peace with them, but did also leave them all his furniture, provision, and municion for the wars: even for the vertue, manhood, and iustice, which the great wisdome of the Consul per-swaded Porsenato beleeue to be in all the other ROMAINES.

The end of Publicolaes life.

THE LIFE OF Themistocles.

HEMISTOCLES parentage did litle aduance his glory: for his father Neocles was of small reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, and tribe of Leontis: of his mother an alien or stranger: as these verses do witnesse:

Abrotonon I am, yborne in Thracia, Andyet this high good hap I have, that into Grecia I have brought forth a sonne, Themistocles by name, The glory of the Greekish blouds, and man of greatest fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the country of CARIA: and they do not call her Abrotonon, but Enterpé. And Neanthes faith furthermore, that the was of HALICARNASSVS, the chiefest city of al the Realme of Ca-RIA. For which cause when the strangers did assemble at Cynologos (a place of exercise without ý gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortail woman:) Themistocles perswaded diverse youths of the most honourable houses, to go downe with him, and to anoint themselues at Cynolargos, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right & alien fort. But fetting apartal these circumstances, he was no doubt alied vnto the house of the Lycomedians: for Themistocles caused the chappel of this family, which is in the village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built up againe at his own charges: & as Simonides faith, he did fet it forth and enrich it with pictures. Moreouereuery man doth confesse it, that even from his childhood they did perceive he was given to be very hot headed, stirring wife, and of good spirit, and enterprising of himselfe to do great things, and borne to rule weighty causes. For at such daies and howres as he was taken from his book, and had leaueto play, hencuer played, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they alwaies found him conning some oration without booke, or making it alone by himselfe: and the ground of this matter was euer commonly, either to defend, or accuse some of his companions. Whereupon his schoolemaster observing him, oft said vnto him: Sure some great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boy, for it cannot be chosen but that one day thou shalt do some notable good thing, or some extreme mischiefe. Therefore when they went about to teach him any thing, onely to checke his nature, or to fashion him with good manners and civility, or to study any matter for pleasure or honest pastime, he would slowly and carelestly learne of them

Themifo wardneffe,

But if they delinered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state, they saw he would beate at itmaruelloufly, and would understand more then any could of his age & cariage, truffing altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the caufe, that being mocked afterwards by fome that had fludied humanity, and other liberall feiences, he was driven for revenge & his own defence, to answer with great and flour words, faying, that indeed he could not skill to tune a harpe, nor a viol, nor to play on a pfalterion; but if they did put a city into his hands that was of finall name, weake, and litle, he knew waies inough how to make it noble, firong, and great. Nenertheleffe, Stefimbrous writeth, how he went to Anaxagorus fehoole, and that vnder Melifus, he thomile. fludied naturall Philosophy. But herein he was greatly deceived, for that he took no great heed do was vnto the time. For Melifius was captaine of the Samians against Perteles, at what time he did lay fiege vitto the city of Samos. Now this is true, Pericles was much yonger then Themifleoles, and ly on good Anaxagerus dwelt with Pericles in his own house. Therefore we have better reason and occasion ler. to believe those that write, Themissocles did determine to follow Atnesiphilus Phrearian. For he Mussolis was no professed orator, nor natural Philosopher, as they termed him in that time but made pro- lim breafession of that which then they called wisdome. Which was no other thing, but a certaine knowledge to handle great causes, and an indeuor to hauc'a good wit & judgement in matters of flate dome mas &gouernement; which profession beginning in solon, did continue, & was taken up from man to man, as a feet of Philosophy. But those that came sithence, have mingled it with art of speech, & by litle and litle have translated the exercise of deeds, vnto bare and curious words; who reupon they were called sephifiers, as who would fay counterfeit wife me. Notwithflanding, when The Howths militales began to meddle with the gouernment of the common-weale, he followed much uneff philus. In the first part of his youth, his behaulour & doings were very light & vnconstant, as one caried away with a rash head, & without any order or diference, by reason whereof his maners Them to and conditions feemed maruelloufly to change, and oft times fell into very ill fauored euents, as himself did afterwards cofesse, by faying that a ragged colt oft times proues a good horse, specially if he be wel ridde, & broke as he should be. Other tales which some wil seeme to ad to this, are in my opinion but fables. As, that his father did difinherit him, and that his mother for very care & forow she took to see the lewel life of her son, did kill her selfe. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being defirous to take him from dealing in government, did go and shew him al along the sea shore, the shipwracks and ribs of old galleys cast here & there, whereof no reckoning was made, and faid to him thus the people vietheir gouernours, when they can ferue no loger. Howfocuer it was, it is most true that Themistock's earnestly gaue himself to state, & was fuddenly taken with defice of glory. For even at his first entry, because he wold set foot before the proudest, he stood at pike against the greatest & mightiest persons that bare the sway and gouernment, and specially against Aristides, Lysimachus son, who cuer encountred him, and was still his aduerlary opposite. Yet it seemeth the cuil will be conceined toward him, came of a very light cause. For they both loued Stesslaws, that was borne in the city of TEOs, as Ariton the Philosopher writeth. And after this icloufie was kindled betweene them, they alwaies took cotrary part one against another, not only in their private likings, but also in the government of the common-weale. Yet I am perswaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions, did much increase the gradge and discord betwixt them. For Arifides being by nature a very good Arifides a man, a inft dealer, and honeft of life, and one that in all his doings would never flatter the people, inft man. nor ferue his own glory, but rather to the contrary would do, fay, and counfell alwaies for the most benefit & commodity of the common weale) was oft times enforced to refult Themstocles, & disappoint his ambitio, being ever busily moving the people, to take some new matter in had. For they report of him, that he was enflamed with defire of glory, and to enterprise great matters, that being but a very yong man at the battel of MARATHON, where there was no talke but Themillo of the worthinesse of captaine Miltiades that had won the battellthe was found many times solitary alone deuifing with himself:besides, they say he could take no rest in § night, neither would go to playes in the day time, nor would keepe company with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withal before. Furthermore, he would tell the that wondred to fee fo great alteratio in his manners, and asked him what he ailed: that Miltiades victory would not let him fleepe: because other thought this ouerthrow at Marathon, would have made an end of al wars. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daily studied how to preuent the & how to see to the safety of GR BC E3& before ing the same Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to speake ill of the Co-

RINTHIANS, confidering they were lords of fo great and strong a city:and that he was not wife

GRECIANS: the ATHENIANS confulted whom they should make their Generall. And it is reported, that all their common counsellers which were wont to speake in matters, fearing the daman to be Generall of the army, he bought out Epicydes ambition with ready money, and fo made him let fall his fuite. It fell out Themistecles was greatly commended, about that was done to the Interpreter, that came with the king of Persias ambaffadors, and demanded the empire of the GRECIANS both by sea and land, that they should acknowledge obedience to the king.

For he caused him to be taken, and put to death by a common consent, for vsing the Greek tong rity after him, because he brought gold from the king of Persia, to corrupt & win the Gre-

CIANS. But the greatest and worthiest act he did in those parts, was this: that he pacified all civill wars among the GRECIANS, perfwading the cities to leave off their quarrels vntill the warres were done, in the which they fay Chileus Arcadian elid helpe him more then any other man. He was very good. Wherupon they fent him with their nauy to the city of ARTEMISIVM, to keepe the straight. There the other GRECIANS Would have had the LACED AMONIANS & their Ad-mirall Eurybiades to have had the authority and commandement of the rest. But the Atheni-

Ans would not set saile under any other Admiral then their own, because theirs were the greatest number of ships in the army, & aboue all the other GRECIANS. Themistocles foreseeing the danger that was likely to fall out amongst theselues, did willingly yeeld y whole authority vnto

Eurybiades, and got the ATHENIANS to agree vnto it : afforing them, that if they behaued them-felues valiantly inthese wars, the other GRECIANS of their ownaccord wold afterward submit themselues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the original cause of the sauing of GRECE, & did most advance the honor & glory of y ATHE-NIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, and their friends & allies, with liberality. In the meane time, Eurybiades feeing the barbarous fleete riding at anker, al alongst the derstäding moreouer, there were other two hundred faile that went to cast about the Ile of Se1-

ATHE, and so to come in the presently would have retired further into GRECE, & would have drawn neerer vnto PELOPONNESVS, to the end their army by sea might be neeretheir army by land, as thinking it vnpoffible to fight with king Xerxes power by fea. Wherupon the inhabitants of the Ile of Eve of A, fearing lest the Grecians wold leave the to the spoile of the enemy, they caused Themistocles secretly to be spoken withall, and sent him a good summe of money by one called Pelagon. Themistocles tooke the money, as Herodoius writeth, and gaue it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amongst the Athenians, Captaine of the galley called the holy galley, that was much against Themistocles intended purpose: who having no money to pay and having won the favour of the people, he was such an enemy to Aristides, that in the end he Thimiston made him to be expulsed & banished Athens for five yeares. When newes were brought that the king of Person was onwards on his journy, and comming downsto make warres were that diffidute. the king of Persia was onwards on his journy, and comming downero make warres vpon the be banfind ger, drew back, faue an orator called Epicydes, Euphemides fon, very eloquent in speech, but somwhat womanish from hearted & greedy of many who offered him suffere for five this shower enterings. what womanish, faint hearted, & greedy of mony, who offered himselfe to sue for this charge, & sole gene. had some hope to obtaine it. Wher fore Themistocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this rate.

in the service & commandement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing also, that at his motion, Arthmim borne at Zelba, was noted of infamy, both he, his children, and all his poste-being now chosen General of the ATHENIANS, went about presently to imbark his citizens into gallies, declaring to them they should leave their city, & go meet with the barbarous king by of the Athofea, fo far fro the coast of GRECE as they could: but the people did not think that good. Whereforche led great numbers of souldiers by land, into the country of TEMPES with y LACEDE- Saint occasió offered, he did exercise his ciry in feats of war, foreseeing what shold follow after. Wherfore, where the citizens of Athen's before did vie to deuide among themselues the reuenue of their mines of filter, which were in a part of Attica called Lav Rion, he alone was y first that durst ipeake to the people, & perswade the, that from thenceforth they should ceasse that distribution among themselues, & employ the mony of the same in making of gallies, to make wars against the ÆGYNETES. For their wars of al GRECE were most cruel, because they were lords of the fea, & had fo great a number of ships. This perswasion drew the citizens more casily to The missecles mind, than the threatning them with king Darens, or the Persians would have done; who were far from them, and not feared that they would come necre vnto them. So this opertunity taken of the hatred & icloufic between the Athenians & the Ægynetes, made the people to agree, of the faid mony to make an 100 galleys, with which they fought against king Xerxes, and did ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wan the citizens by degrees to bend their force to sea, declaring vnto them, how by land they were scant able to make nians bent head against their equals, whereas by their power at sea they should not only defend themselues their force from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to comand al GRECE. Hercupon he made the good mariners, & passing sea me, as Plato saith, where before they were stout & valiant souldiers cles parsma by land. This gaue his enimies occasion to east it in his teeth afterwards, that he hadtaken away from the Athenians the pike & the target, and had brought them to the banke and the owen and so he got the upper hand of Militades, who inneighed against him in that, as Stessim bretus writeth. Now after he had thus his wil, by bringing this lea feruice to passe, whether there by he did ouerthrew the inflice of the comon weale or not, I leave that to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preferuation of all Grece stood at that time upon the sea, and that the galleys only were the canfe of fetting vp ATHENS againe Xer xes himfelf is a furficient witnes, be fides other proofes that might be brought therof. For his army by land being yet whole, and vnfet on, when he faw his army by sea broken, dispersed, & sunk, he fied straight vpon it, cofessing as it were that he was now too weake to deale any more with y GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenat in GRECE of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not follow him, then for any hope he had to our come them. Some write of Themissocles, that he was a very good husbad for eles a good his own profit, and carefull to looke to his things for he did fpend liberally, & loued of to make facrifices, and honorably to receive & entertaine strangers: wherfore he had good reason to be looketobs careful to get, to defray his charges. Other to the cotrary, blame him much that he was too neere & miscrable: for some say, he wold sell presets of meat that were given him. He did aske one Philides on a time, we had a breed of mares, a colt of gift: who denying him flatly, he was so angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he wold make his house the horse of wood, with y which TROIA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him understad, that he wold shortly set strife & quarrel betwix: him, & his nearest kinsme & familiar frieds. It is true that he was the most ambicious man of the world. For when he was but a yong man, & feantly known, he earnestly intreated one Fpicles borne at Hermionna, an excellent player of the citerne, & counted at that time the cuning if man in al Athens at that instrument, that he wold come & teach his art at his house:& all was no more, but that many people being defirous to heare him play, shold ask for his house, & come thicher to him. And one yeare when he went vnto the feast and assembly of the player Olympicall, he would needs keepe open house for all comers, have his tents richly furnished,& a great craine of fernants and all other furniture, only to contend with Cimon. This marueloufly spited the GRECIANS, who thought Themistocles expences fit for Cimons countenace & ability, because he was a yong gentleman, & of a noble house: but for him that was but a new come ma & would beare a greater port then either became his calling or ability, they thought it not only vnallowable in him, but meere prefumption & vainglory. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedy which was played openly. & being fet out therein to have won the prife. & the ATHENIANS being maruellous defirous of the honour in fuch playes, he caused this victor of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate and fet vp in a temple, with this inscription Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynicus made it: Adimantus was chiefe ruler. Yet not. withstanding he was wel taken of the common people, partly because he would speake to every citizen by his name, no man telling him their names: & partly also because he shewed himself an vpright judge in private mes causes. As one day he answered the Poet Simoides, borne in Chio, who did request an vnreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernour of the his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with speed from thence. The mifteeles stirred vp then his fouldiers more against him then before, infomuch as they went aboord his gally and tooke his supper from him. Architeles being maruellous angry and offended withall, Themi. focles sent him both bread & meate in a pannier, and in the bottome thereof he had put a talent of filter, bidding him for that night to suppe with that, and the next morning he should prouide for his mariners, or else he would complaine, and accuse him to the citizens that he had taken money of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbian. Moreover the first fights in the fraite of EVEOEA, betweenethe GRECIASS and the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the wars between them. For it was but a taste ginen vnto them, which served the GRECIANS turne very much, by making them to fee by experience, and the maner of the fight that it was not the great mulcitude of ships, nor the pomp & sumptuous setting out of the same. nor the proud barbarous shouts and songs of victory, that could stand them to purpose, against noble hearts, and valiant minded fouldiers, that durft grapple with them, and come to handftrokes with their enemies; and that they should make no reckening of all that brauery & brags, but should sticke to it like men, and lay it on the jackes of them. The which (as it seemeth) the poet Pindarus understood very well, when he faid touching the battell of ARTEMISIUM: The fout Athenians have now foundationlayed

Vinto the libertie of Greece, by these assaults assayed. For out of doubt the beginning of victory, is to be hardy. This place ARTEMISIUM is a part of the He of Evenera, looking towards the North, about the citie of Esti Ea, lying directly ouer against the country which sometimes was under the obedience of the Philoetete's. & fpecially of the city of OLIZON. There is a little temple of Diana; furnamed Orientall, roundabout the which there are trees, and a compasse of pillars of white stone, which when a man rubs with his hand, they shew of the colour and sauour of saffron. And in one of those pillars there is an infcription of lamentable verses to this effect:

When boldest blonds of Athens by their might, Had overcome the numbers infinite Of Alia: they then in memory Of all their deeds, and valeant victory. Began to build this roble monument, And to Diane the funce they did prefent, For that they had the Medes likewife fubdued, And with their bloud their hardy hands embrued.

There is a place seene also vpon that coast at this day, a good way into the land, in the midst whereof are great funds follof blacke dust like ashes: and they thinke that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and old shipwrackes. Newes being brought what had bene done in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerxes had won that entry into GRECE by land: the GRECIANS then brought their whole army by fea more into GRECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retraite, as men whose harts were life up with the glory of their former valiant decdes. Now Themistocles paffing by those places where he knew the enemies must of necessity fall vpon the lee shore for harbour: hee did ingraue certaine words spoken vnto the Ionians, in great letters in stone, which he found there by chance, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbour for ships, and fit places also to lye in. These were the words: that the Ionian's should take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and ancestors, and such as fought for their liberty: or at the least they should trouble the army of the barbarous people, and doe them al the mischiefe they could, when the GRECIANS should come to fight with them. By the words he hoped either to bring the Ionians to take their part, or at the least he should make the barbarous people icalous & mistrustfull of them Xerxes being already entred into the vpper most part of the province of Dorlica, into the country Phocida, burning and destroying the townes and cities of the Phocians: the other Grecians lay still & suffered the invasion notwithstanding the Athenians did request them to meete with the barbarous army in BOEOTIA, to faue the country of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they went by feate ARTEMISIUM. But they would not hearken to it in no wife; and all was because they were de firous they should draw to the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and there they should affemble the whole strength and power of Grece within the bar of the same, and make a strong substantial! wall from the one sea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this deuice, and were halfe discouraged and out of heart, to see themselves thus for saken and cast off by the rest of the GRECIANS. For it was out by all speech that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies: and therefore their only remedy was, to leave their city, and to get them to the sea. The people were very vnwilling to liften hercunto, making their reckening it was needleffe to be carefull to ouercome, or to faue themselues, having once for faken the temples of their gods, and the graues of their parents. Wherefore Themistocles seeing that neither reason nor mans perfwafion could bring the peopleto like his opinion: he began to frame a deuice (as men do vse fometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with fignes from heauen, with oracles and answers from the gods. And the occasion of Minernaes dragon served his turne for a celestiall figne and token, which by good fortune did not appeare in those daies in the temple as it was wont to do : and the priests found the facrifices which were daily offered to him, whole and vntouched by any. Wherefore being informed by Themistecles what they should do, they spread a bruite abroadamongst the people, that the goddesse Minerua, the protector & defendor of the city, had for faken it, pointing them the way vnto the sea. And againe he wan them by a Prophecie, which commanded them to faue themselues in wals of wood: saying that the wals of wood did fignific nothing else but ships. And for this cause he said, Apollo in the oracle called Sala-MINA divine, not miserable nor unfortunate, because it should give the name of a most happy victorie which the GRECIANS should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this decree, that they should leaue the city of Athens to the custody of the goddesse? 1.1. las, that was lady and gouernor of the country, and that all those which were of age to carie any weapon should get them to the gallies : and for the rest, that every man should see his wife, children, and bondmen placed in some sure place as well as he could. After this decree was past and authorized by the people, the most part of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their sales wives & little children, into the city of Troezen, where the Troezen in an sreceived them very between the country of themselves and a state of the country for the city of the city o louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they should be entertained of the common charge, Inchange allowing them a peece, two oboloes of their mony a day, and suffered the yong children to gate the ther fruit where foeuer they found it: and furthermore did hire schoolemasters at the charge of feat the commonwealth, to bring them vp at schoole. He that was the penner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The Athenians at that time, had no common mony, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Aristotle faith) furnished enery souldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallies were armed. Yet clidemus writeth, that this was a craft denifed of Themiflocles. The ATHENIANS being come downe vnto the hauen of PIR ÆA, he made as though Pallas target(on the which Medufaes head was grauen) had bene loft, and was not found with the image of the goddefle : and faining to fecke for it, he ranfacked eucry corner of the gallies, and founda great deale of filuer which private persons had hidde amongst their fardels. This mony was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the fouldiers that were shipped had wherwithall to provide them of necessary things. When time came that they were to depart the hauen, and that all the city of Athens had taken sea, one way it was a pitie to behold them: another way it made all forts to wonder, that confidered the boldnesse and courage of those men, which before fent away their fathers and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at their teares, cries, shrikes, and embracings of their wines, their children, and departures, but stoutly and resolutely held on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding, there were many old citizens left still of necessity in ATHENS, because they could not be remoued for very extreme age, which stirred many with compassion toward them. There was besides, a certaine pity that made mens hearts to yerne, when they faw the poore dogges, beafts, and cattell runne vp and downe bleating, lowing, and howling out aloude after their masters, in token of sorrow, when they did imbarke. Amongst these, there goeth a strange tale of Xanthippus dogge, who was Pericles Xanthippus father: which for forrow his mafter had left him behind him, did cast himselfe after into the fea, and fwimming still by the gallies fide whercin his master was, he held on to the Isle of Sa-LAMINA, where fo foone as the poore curre landed, his breath failed him, and he died prefently. The dogger They say, at this day the place called the dogs graue, is the very place where he was buried. These were strange acts, of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS sory for the absence of Ariftides, and fearing lest of spite he taking part with the barbarous nation, might have bene

the ruine and destruction of the state of G_{RECE} , being banished fluc yeares also before the wars by Themistocles procurement: that he did set forth a decree, that all those which had bene banifhed for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to fay, and to give counfell to the cirizens in nilbment by those things, which they thought best for the preservation of GRECE. And also where Eurybiades being General of the GRECIANS whole army by featfor the worthines of the city of Spar-TA, but otherwise a rank coward at time of need, would in any case depart from thence, and retire into the gulfe of PELOPONNESUS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by land assembled: that Themistocles withstood im, and did hinderitall he could. At that time also it was, that Themistocles made so notable answers, which specially are noted & gathered together. For when Eurybiades faid one day vnto him: Themistocles, those that at playes and games do rise before the copany, are whistled at. It is true, said Themistocles: but those also that tary last, do neuer win any game. Another time Eurybiades having a staffe in his hand lift it vp, as though he would have stricken him: Strike and thou wilt, said he, so thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wondring to see him so patient, suffered him then to say what he would. Then Themistocles began to bring him to reason: but one that stood by, said vnto him: Themistocles, for a man that hath neither city nor house, it is an ill part to will others that haue, to for sake all. Themissocies turning to him, replied: We have willingly for faken our houses and wals, said he, cowardly beast that thou art, because we would not become slaues for feareto lose things that haue neither soule nor life. And yet our city I tell thee is the greatest of all GRECE for it is a fleet of 200 galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to faue you if you lift. But if you will needs go your wayes and forfake vs the second time, you shall heare tell ere it belong, that the ATHENIAN'S haue another free city, and have possessed againe as much good land, as that they have already lost. These words made Eurybiades presently thinke, and feare, that the Athenians would not goe, and that they would for fake the. And as another Eretrian was about to viter his reason against Themisseles opinion, he could not but answer him: Alas, and must you my masters talke of wars too. that are like to a Sleeue: Indeed you have a fword, but you lacke a heart. Some write, that whilft Themistocles was talking thus from his galley, they spied an owle flying on the right hand of the ships which came to light on one of the mast's of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other GRECIANS did agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by fea. But when the fleet of their enemies ships shewed on the coasts of Attica, hard by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the rivers thereabouts, as farre as any body could fee, and that king Xerxes himselfe was come in person with all his army by land, to campe by the sea side: so that his whole power both by land and sea might be seene in sight then the GRECIANS had forgotten all Themistocles goodly perswasions, and began to incline againe to the Peloponnesians, considering how they might recouer the gulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they did grow very angry, when any man went about to talke of any other matter. To be short, it was concluded that they should saile away the next night following, and the mafters of the ships had order given them to make all things ready for them to depart. Themistocles perceiuing their determination, he was maruellous angry in his mind, that the GRECIANS would thus disperse themselues asunder, repairing euery man to his owne citie, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place, and the straight of the arme of the sea, where they lay in harbour together, did offer them: and so he bethought himselse how this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practise of one sicinus came into his mind, who being a Persian borne, and taken prisoner before in the warres, loued The. missiocles very well and was schoole-master to his children. This Sicinus he secretly sent vnto the king of Persia, to aductife him that Themistocles (Generall of the Athenians) was very defirous to become his Maiesties servant, & that he did let him understand betimes, that the GRE-CIANS were determined to flie; and therefore that he wished him not to let them escape, butto fet vpon them, whilest they were troubled and afraid, and far from their army by land, to the end that vpon a sudden he might ouerthrow their whole power by sea . Xerxes supposing this intelligence came from a man that wished him well, received the messenger with great ioy, and thereupon gaue present order to his captaines by sea, that they should imbarke their mentionto the other ships at better leisure, and that presently they should put out with all possible speed, two hundred faile to follow the GRECIANS in the taile, to shut vp the foreland of the straight, and to compasse the Isles all about, that not one of his enemies ships might escape: and so it fell out, Then Aristides (Lysimachus sonne) being the first that perceiued it, went to Themistocles tent, though he was his enemy, & through his only meanes had bene banished before, as ye have heard : and calling him out, rold him how they were environed. Themstocles, who knew well inough the goodnes of this man, being very glad he came at that time to feeke him out, declared vnto him the policie he had vsed by the message of sicinus, praying him to put too his helpe to flay the GRECIANS, and to procure with him, confidering his word had more authority among them, that they would fight within the straight of SALAMINA. Aristides commending his great wisedome, went to deale with the Captaines of the other gallies, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credite that he faid, vntill fuch time as there arrived a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine, who being stolne out of the host of the barbarous armie, brought certaine newes, that the straight out of doubt was shut vp. So that besides the necessity which did vrge them, the spite which the GRECIANS conceived thereof, did pronoke them to hazard the battel. The next morning by breake of day, King Xerxes placed himselse on a maruellous steepe high hill, from whence he might discerne his whole sleete, and the ordering of his army by sea, about the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrow way or channell betwixt the Isle of SALAMINA, and the coast of Attica:or as Acestodorus saith, upon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the point which they commonly call the Hornes. There Xerxes fet vp a throne of gold, and had about him many fecretaries to write all that was done in the battel. But as Thems focles was facrificing vn: o the gods in his galley that was Admirall, they brought to him three yong prisoners, faire of complexion, richly arrayed with gold and iewels, whom they faid were the children of Sandace the Kings fifter, and of Prince Autaretus. So soone as Euphrantides the soothsayer had seene them, and at their arrivall observed there rose a great bright flame out of the sacrifice, and at the very felfe same instant that one on his right hand had sneezed: he tooke Themistocles by the hand, and willed him to facrifice all those three prisoners vnto the god Bacchus, surnamed Omestes, as much to fay, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GRECIANS should not onely be faued, but they should have the victory over their enemies. Themistocles wondred much, to heare so strange and terrible a commandement of the Soothsayer. Neuerthelesse, the common fort following their custome, which is, to promise safety sooner in the greatest dangers and most desperate cases, by strange and vnreasonable, rather then by reasonable and ordinary meanes: they began to call vpon the god with one voice, and bringing the three prisoners neare vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the facrifice in that fort as the Soothfayer had appointed. Phanias Lesbian, an excellent Philosopher, and well seene in stories and antiquities, reporterh this matter thus. As for the number of the ships of the barbarous nauie, Æschilus the poet, in a tragedie which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainely the troth, faith thus:

King Xerxes had a thousand Thips I know, Amongst the which, two hundred were (I trow) And lenen: which all the rest did ouer-faile With swifter course. This is withouten faile.

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in enery one of the which there were eighteene souldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no lesse skill and wisedome choose his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntill the howre was come, that of ordinarie custome the sea wind arose, and brought in a rough tide within the channell, which did not hurt the GRECIAN gallies, being made low and fnug, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallies, being high cargued, heavy, and not yare of steredge, and made them lye fidelong to the GRECIANS, who fiercely fet vpon them, having alwaies an eye to Themistocles direction, that best foresaw their aduatage. At the same time, Arramenes, Xer- Ariamenes xes Admirall, a man of great valour and worthieft of the Kings brethren, bestowed arrowes and darts as it were from the wals of a castle, charging the galley of Aminias Decelian, and Sosicles Pedian, which were iouned and grapled with him, and fiercely entring the same, was by them valiantly received vpontheir pikes, & thrust over boord into the sea. Whose body storing amongst other shipwrackes Artemisia knowing, caused to be carried to king Xerxes. Now whilest this battell stood in these termes, they say that there appeared a great slame in the element toward the city of ELEVSIN, and that a loud voice was heard through all the plaine of THRACIA VINTO the sea, as if there had bene a number of mentogether, that had song out aloude the holy song of Iacchus. And it seemed by litle and litle, that there rose a cloud in the ayre from those which fang, that left the land, and came and lighted on the galleys in the sea. Other affirmed, that they faw armed men, which did reach out their hands from the Isle of ÆGINA, towards the GRE-CIAN gallies: and they thought they were the ÆACIDES, for whose helpe they all prayed before the battell was begunne. The first man of the ATHENIANS that tooke any of the enemics ships, was Lycomedes, a captaine of agalley: who having taken very rich furniture and slags, did afterwards confecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would fay, victorious. The other GRECI-Ans in the front being equall in number with the barbarous ships, by reason of the straightnesse of the arme of the sea wherein they fought, and so straightned as they could not fight but by one and one, whereby the Barrans diforderly laied one another aboord, that they did hinder themselues with their ouer multitude : and in the end were so fore pressed upon by the GRE-CIANS, that they were constrained to flie by night, after they had fought and maintained battell The Gree. Vntill it was very darke. So that the GRECIANS wan that glorious and famous victory: of the which may truly be affirmed that, as Simonides faith:

Gani nanie by fea.

Was never yet, nor Grecke nor barbarous crew, That could by fea fo many men subdew: Nor that obtained fo famous victorie, In any fight against their enemie.

Thus was the victorie won through the valiantnesse and courage of those that fought that battell, but especially through Themistocles great policy and wisdome. After this battell Xernes being mad for his loffe, thought to fill vp the arme of the fea, and to paffe his army by land, vpon a bridge, into the Isle of SALAMINA. Themistocles, because he would feele Aristides opinion, told him as they were talking together, that he thought best to go and occupie the straight of HEL-LESPONT with the army by fea, to breake the bridge of shippes which Xernes had caused to be made: to the end, said he, that we may take As IA into Evrop E. Aristides liked not this opinion: for we have (faid he) fought all this while against this barbarous King, who thought but to play with vs: but if we shut him within GRECE, and bring him to fight of necessity to saue his life: fuch an enemy that commandeth so great an army, wil no more stand still, as a looker on, and sit at his ease vnder his golden pauillion, to see the pastime of the battell, but wil proue euery way, and be himself in cuery place at all assaies to saue himself from such a straight and danger. Thus with politike care and forefight, he may eafily amend his former fault committed by negligence, and do well enough, when he shall see his life and kingdome both depend vpon it. Therefore Themistecles, I would thinke best not to breake his bridge at all, which he hath caused to be made; but rather if we could, to build another to it, to drive him out of Evrope as soone as we could. Themistocles then replyed: Seeing you think this were good to bee done, wee must all lay our heads together, to deuise how he may be forced to come out as soone as we could. They breaking off with this resolution, Themistocles sent immediatly one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arfaces that was one of the groomes of his chamber, whom he found out amongst the prifonces, and by him he fent this meffage vnto the king: That the GRECIANS having won the battell of him by sea, had decreed in their counsell, how they would go to the straight of HELLEspont, to break the bridge of the ships he had caused to be made there. Whereof he thought good to advertise him for the good will he did beare him, and to the end he might bethink him betimes, to get him away to the sea within his own dominion, & so passe back againe into Asia as foone as he could, whilest he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to stay following him at the poope. The barbarous king vnderstanding these newes, was so afraid that he hoissed away with all possible speed. The further foresight and great wisdome of Themistocles, and Aristides, in marine causes, did manifestly appeare afterwards in the battell the GRECIANS fought before the citic of PLATEA, against Mardonius, king Xerxes Lieutenant: who having but a small power of the King his foueraignes there, did yet put the GRECIANS to great diffresse, and in hazard to haue lost all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the city of ÆGINA wanne the fame for valiantnesse about the rest: and of private men, among the GRECIANS, Themistocles was judged the worthiest man: although it was fore against their willes, because they enuied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and having swornevpen the altar of their sacrifices, that they would give their voices after their consciences, to those they thought had best deserued it : euery one gaue himselfe the first place for worthinesse, and the second vnto Themiflocles. The LACED EMONIANS caried him into Sparta, where they judged the honour and dignity of valiantnesse to their Admirall Eurybiades: but the wisedome and poli- Thimistonia cie they attributed vnto Themissocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue branch, and the goodlieft coach that was in their citie: and moreoner they tent three hundred of their luftic the Greeiyouths to accompany him, and couducthim out of their countrey. And they fay, that at the ani. next feafts and affemblies of the playes Olympicall which were made after this victorie, when Themistocles was once come into the shew place where these games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all cast their eyes on him, shewing him to the strangers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their hands did witneffe how much they efteemed him. Whereat he himfelfe tooke fo great delight, that hee confessed to his familiar friends, he then did reape the fruite and benefit of his sundrie and painefull services hee had taken in hand, for the preservation of GRECE: so ambitious was Themistohe of nature, and couetous of honour, as we may eafily perceiue by certaine of his deedes tis ambiand notable fayings they have noted of him. For being chosen Admirall of ATHENS, hee neuer dispatched any causes prinate or publike, howfocuer they fell out, vntill the very day of his departure, and taking shippe: and all because that men seeing him dispatch much bufineffe at once, and to speake with so many persons together, they should esteeme him to be the notablerman, and of the greater authority. Another time he walked vpon the fands by the sea side, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the sea had cast vp vpon the shore; and seeing some of them that had on still their chaines of gold, and bracelets, hee paffed by on his way, but shewed them yet to a familar friend of his that followed him, and faid vnto him: Take thou those, for thou art not Themisocles. And vnto one Antiphates, who in his youth had bene a goodly young boy, and at that time did scornefully behaue himselfe vnto him, making no reckening of him: and now that he saw him in great authority came to fee him, hee faid: O my young fonne, and friend: wee are both euen at one time (but too late) growne wise. He said the ATHENIANS did not esteeme of him nor honour him in time of peace: but when any stormes of warres were towards, and they stood in any danger, they ranne to him then, as men runne to the shadow of a Plane tree, vpon any fodaine raine: and afterwards when faire weather commeth againe, they cut away the branches, and boughes thereof. There was a man borne in the Isle of Serr-PHA, who being fallen out with him, did cast him in the teeth, that it was not for his worthinesse, but for the noble citie wherein he was borne, that hee had wonne such glory: Thou fayefitrue faid he: but neither should I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a SERIPHIAN, nor thou also if thou hadst bene an Athenian. Another time one of the captaines of the citic, having done good feruice vnto the commonweale, made boaft before Themistocles, and compared his feruice equall with his. Themistocles to answer him, told him a pretie Apretie tale. That the working day brauled on a time with the holy day, repining against her, that he laboured for his living continually and how she did nothing but sill her belly, and spend that they den. had gotten. Thou hast reason, said the holy day. But if I had not bene before thee, thou haddest not bene here now. And fo, if I had not bene then: where had you my masters bene now? His own fon was a litle too fawcie with his mother, and with him also, bearing himselfe ouer-boldly ofher good wil, by meanes of her cockering of him. Wherupon being merily disposed, he wold Themillofay that his son could do more then any man in al GRECE. For, faith he, the ATHENIANS command the GRECIANS, I command the ATHENIANS, my wife commanderh me, and my fon commandeth her. Moreouer because hee would be singular by himselfe about all other men: hauing a peece of land he would fell, he willed the crier to proclaime open fale of it in the market place, and withall he should adde vnto the sale, that his land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being suiters to his daughter, he preferred the honester before the richer, faying: He had rather haue to his fonne in law a manthat lacked goods, then goods to lacke a man. These were Themistecles pleasant conceipts and answers. But after he had done all these things we have spoken of before, he took in hand to build againe the city and wals of ATHENS, Themiston and did corrupt the officers of LACED ÆMONIA with mony, to the end they should not hinder the built his purpose, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other say, when he had deceived them by this subtiltie, he went vnto Sparta, as ambaffadour, sent thither of purpose vpon the complaints of the LACED EMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS did inclose their citie againe with wals, who then.

ther from the Æ GINETES, of purpose to prosecute this matter against the ATHENIANS. Themistocles stoutly denved it to them, and prayed them for better understanding of the troth, they would fend fome of their men thither to fee it. This was but a fetch, only to winne by this delay, the Athenians fo much more time to raife vp their wals, and that the Athenians should keepe as hostages for furety of his person, those they should send to Athens, to bring backe the report thereof: and fo it fell out. For the LACED EMONIANS being enformed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but distembling the, misliking they had to be thus abused by him, fent him away fafe and found. Afterwards he made them also mend and fortifie the hauen of PIR AA, having confidered the fination of the place, and all to encline the city to the fea. Wherein he did directly contrary to all the counsell of the ancient Kings of Athens: who feeking (as they fay) to withdraw their people from the fea, and to accustome them to line vpon the land, by planting, fowing, and plowing their grounds, did denife and give out abroad, the fable they tell of the goddeffe Pallas. And that is this, how the contending with Negtune about the patronage of the country of Athens, brought foorth and shewed to the Judges the olive tree, by meanes whereof the prenailed and obtained the preheminence. Euen to Themistocles did not ioune the hauen of PIR EA unto the city of ATHERS, as the Comicall poet Ariflopha. nes faith: but rather joyned the city vnto the hauen Piran, and the land vnto the fea. By this meanes he made the people strong against the nobility, and brought the communal tie to waxe bolder then they were before, by reason the rule and authority fell into the hands of saylers, marines, pilots, flip-mafters, and fuch kind of feafaring men: To as the pulpit where all the orations were made, stood in the market place of Payx, and did looke towards the sea. But the thirty tyrants that came in afterwards, did remoue it, and turne it towards the land: holding opinion to be firong by sea, was it that did maintaine the authority of the popular state: and that contrariwise they which line by the labour and toile of the earth, do more willingly like the gonernement of Nobility. Themistocles called to mind another matter also of greater importance, to make the city of Athens of greater power by sea. For after the retire of Xernes, and that all the flecte and nauie of the GRECIAN's wintred in the hauen of PEGASES: he faid one day in an open affembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable & beneficiall for them, but it was not to be told openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Arifides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it speedily. Themistocles then told Ariftedes the thing he had confidered of, was to burne the Arcenall where the GRECIANS nauie lay, and to fet on fire all their shippes. Aristides hearing his purpose, returned to the people, and told them: how nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniust, then that which Themissecles had deuised. The ATHENIAN's then willed Aristides it should be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their petition to the councell of the Amphictions (that is, the generall councell of all the states of Grece, assembled) how the townes and cities of GRECE which had not bene parties with the GRECIANS in the league, against the barbarous people, should be put off wholly from this counsell, Themssteeles doubting that if the Argives, the Thessalians, and the Therans also should by this meanes beexempted, that the LACED ÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voyces, and by this meanes might do what they would in this councell: he spake so considerately for the cities which they would have thus discharged, that he made the petitioners in the assembly vtterly to change their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirtie cities comprised only in the league, and yet that some of them were very weake and small and how it were no reason, that rejecting all the rest of GRECE, the greatest authority of this councell should fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefest cities alone. For this cause chiefly the LACED A-MONIANS did cuer beare him extreme hatred, and did stir vp Cimon all they could, to be alwaies aduersarie opposite vnto him, and as it were to beard him in all matters of state, and the gouernment of Athens. They procured him besides the ill will and displeasure of all the friends and confederates of the Athenians, for that he went fayling still too and fro alongst the Isls, exacting money of the inhabitants of the faine. And this is to be knowne by the matter propounded by him to the Andrians (of whom he would have had money) and by the answer they made him, as Herodotta writeth. Which was, how he had brought them two mightie gods: Lone and Force. And they answered him againe, that they also had two great goddesses, which kept them from gluing of him any money: Pouertie and Imposibilitie. And to make this good alfo, Timocreon the Rhodian Poet galled him to the quicke, when he sharply taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were banished: and how for the couctousnesse of money he had betraied, and forfaken his host and friend. The verses wherein this matter is mentio-

After this, he did more openly blase him to the world, when he was banished and condemned, in a fong that had beginning thus:

O Muse, let these my verses be disperst Throughout all Greec, since they deferne no lese: And fince the truth which is in them rehearft, Descrueth fame, whom no man should suppresse.

They fay the cause why this Timocreon was banished, was, the friendship which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giving them intelligence. Whereof Themsfocles was one that indicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themistocles himselfe was accused afterwards of the fame fault, Timocreon then made these verses following against him:

people, he did oft remember them of the good feruices he had done them: and perceiuing how they were offended withall, he was driven to fay: Why, are ye wearie so often to receive good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him also, when he surnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Aristobule, as much to fay, as the good counseller: meaning thereby, how hee had given grave and wife counsell, both vnto his city and to all the rest of the Grecians. He built this temple also neare his house, in a place called Melita, where the hang-men did cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throw the ragges and haulters ends of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by law. There was also in our dayes in the temple of Diana Aristebule, a little image of Themistocles, which shewed plainely, that he was not onely wife, and of a noble minde, but also of a great maicstie and countenance in the face. In the end the ATHENIANS banished him Athens for fine yeares, because they would plucke downe his oner great courage and authority, as they did vie to ferue those, whose greatnesse they thought to be more, then common equality that ought to be among citizens would beare. For this manner of banishment for a time, called Offracismon, was no punishment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the enuie of the people, which delighted to plucke downe their stomackes that too much seemed to exceed in greatnesse: and by this meanes they tooke away the poylon of his malice, with diminishing his glory and honour. So Themistocles being banished from ATHENS, went to dwell in Argos. In this meane scason, Panfanias treacherie fell out, which gaue his enemies occasion to lie heavie on his backe. But hee which became his accuser, and was partner of the treason, was one called Leobetes (Alemeens sonne) berne in a village called A GRAVLA. Besides this, the Spartans also did fit on his skirts, and charged him forely. For Paufanias neuer before renealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although hee was his very familiar friend. But after hee faw Themistecles was banished, and did take his exile very unpatiently : then Paulanias was bold to open his treason vnto him, to procure him to take his part, and shewed him the letters the King of PERSIA had written to him, and all to stirre him vp against the GRECIANS, as against vngratefull and vnnaturall people. Howbeit Themistocles shooke him off, and told him plainely he would bee no partner of his treason. Notwithstanding, he neuer reuealed it to any living creature, nor discovered the practise hee intended : hoping either hee would haue giuen it ouer, or that shortly it would appeare by some other meane, considering he so fondly aspired to things of great daunger, and without purpose or possibility. After Paularias was condemned, and had suffered paines of death for the fame: they found amongst his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themifocles to beevery fore suspected. Whereupon the LACED EMONIANS on the one fide Etedofired cryed out of him, and his enemies and ill willers at Athens accused him on the other fide. To the which hee made answere by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people; that it was not likely that he (who fought all the wayes to rule, and was not borne to ferue, neither had any mind thereto) would euer haue thought in his head, to fell his owne libertie, and the Grecians also voto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithflanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, fent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the states of all GRECE, to be judged by that counsell. Whereof Themissocles having intelligence in time, hee did convey himselfe into the Ile of Corphy, because the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certaine pleasure he had done them in times past. For they being at suite and strife with the Corin-THIANS he tooke up the matter betweene them, and gaue judgement on their fide, and condemned the Corinthians to pay them twenty talents damages: and did fet downe an order, that they should occupie the Ilc of Levende in common together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, as well of the one citie, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whither being followed by the Athenians and the Laced Emonians, he was compelled to venter himselfe vpon a doubtfull and very dangerous hope. For hee went to yeeld himselfe into the hands of Admetus, King of the Molossians. Who having heretofore made certaine requests vnto the ATHENTANS, and being shamefully denied them by meanes of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefest height and authority) the King was maruellously offended with him: and it was a cleere case indeede, that if hee could then have layed hands on him, he would have bene reuenged of him throughly. How beit feeling the prefent miferie of his exile, he thought he might lefte feare the Kings old quarrell and displeasure, then the The maner ferie of his exite, he thought he might lene reare the Kings of quarter and completating to of species fresh hate and enuie of his country men. Whereupon he went vnto King Admetus, trusting to tron among his mercy, and became an humble fuiter to him in a strange extraordinarie fort. For he took the the Mo-Kings little yong fon in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappel: 10 flant. which humble manner of fluing the Molossians take to be most effectuall, and such as they dare not denie nor refuse. Some fay that Queene Phthia her selfe, the Kings wife did enforme him of this their country custome and maner, and brought her little sonne also neare vnto the altar. Other write also, that it was Admetes himself that taught and shewed him this enforcing maner of petition; only for a cloke to excuse himself to those that should come to demand Themisto. cles of himsthat by duty of religion he was fo straightly bound and restrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protectio. In this mean time Epicrates Acharnian found the meanes feet etly to conuey Themistocles wife & children out of ATHENS, and did send them privily vnto him: whereupon he was afterwards accused, and put to death, vpon Cimons accusation and motion. as Stesimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring those matters I know not how, or making as though Themistocles had not remembred himself doth fay, that Themistocles sailed into Sigile. where he fought to marie Hierons daughter, the tyrant of Syracvsa: promiting him if he wold lethim have her, he would affure him to conquer al GRECE for him, & to bring them under his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into Asia: but that is not likely. For Theophrasius writeth in his book intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron having sent certaine running horses, to the seast of the games Olimpical, and having set vp a maruellous rich and fumptuous tent there: Themistocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they should teare the tyrants tents in peeces, and not to suffer his horses to run with other fwift & light horses, and to carie away the prise in those holy games. Thurydides again declareth how he went vnto the other fea, and imbarked in the city of Pydne, being not knowne of neuer a man in the ship, vntill such time as the wind began to carie them into the Ile of Naxos, which y ATHENIANS by chance did befiege at that time, where being afeard to be fet on land, he was forced to bewray himselfe to the master of the ship, and the masters mate, and wrought them, what with faire words and what with threates (by faying he would accuse them to the A-THENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receive him in, but hired for mony) fo as he compelled them to faile no further, and to carrie him into As TA. As for his goods, his friends faued the most part of them, and sent them into As 1 A to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate vnto the state, Theopompus writerh, they did amount to the value of one hundred *talents; and Theophrastus faith, but to fourescoretalents only whereas all his goods was not worth fad crownes three * talents, when he beganne to gouerne the state of the common-weale. When he came Lighteene vnto the city of Cv MA, he perceived that all the coasts by sea were layed for him to apprehend travers. him, and that he had many spials vpon him: among the which, these were two special noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that fought their gaine any way they could. For the King of Persia had proclaimed by found of trumpet, two hundred talents to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of ÆOLIA, called ÆGES, where no living body knew him, but his host only, called Nicogenes; who was the richest man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knew all the noble men of authority that were about the King of Persia. Themistocles continued hidden certaine daies in his house: in which time, on a night after the feast of a facrifice, one olbius, schoolemaster to Nicegenes children, by fome fecret working of the gods, fuddenly fell befides himfelfe, and began to fing these verses out aloud:

THEMISTOCLES.

Do thou believe what so the night thee tels. And give thy voice, thy counsell and conceits Vnto the night, in dark somenesse that dwels, Thereon also thy victorie awaits.

The next night following, Themistocles being fast assecte in his bed, dreamed that a snake Themistocles wound it selfe round about his belly, and glided vpwards to his necke, vntil it touched his face, sles dreame. and fuddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his wings: and fo at length did lift him vp in the aire, and caried him a maruellous way off, vntill hee thought hee faw a golden rodde (fuch as Heralds vse to carie in their hand) whereupon the Eagle did set him, and

fo was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought himself in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this device in his head, how he might bring him fafe to the king of PBRSTABS court. The barbarous nations for the most part (and specially the Persians) are of a very stange nature, and maruellous icalous ouer their women, and that not only of their wives, but a fo of their bondwomen, and concubines: which they keepe fo straightly locked vp, that no man ener feeth them abroad at any time, but are alwaies like house-doues kept within doores. And when they have any occasion to go into the country, they are caried in close coaches couered all about, that no man can look into them. Themistocles was couved into one of these coaches drest after this maner, and had warned his men to answer those they met by the way, that asked whom they cariedithat it was a yong GRECIAN gentlewoman of the country of IONIA, which they caried to Aing of Per. the court for a noble man there. Thus ydides, and Charon Lampfacenian fay, he went thither after the death of xernes, and spake with his sonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Cletar, bus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with himselfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides words do best agree with the chronicles and tables, recording the succession of times, although they be of no great certainty. Thems stockes being come now to the swords point (as it were) and to the extremity of his danger, did first present him vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand footmen, and faid vnto him: Sir, I am a GRECIAN borne, and defire to speake with § king: I have matters of importance to open to his Maiesty, and such as I know he will thankfully receive. artabanus answered him in this manner: My friend fir stranger, the lawes and customes of men are diverfe, and fome take one thing for honest, other some another thing; but it is most honesty for all men, to keepe and observe the lawes and manners of their owne countrey. For you GRECIANS have the name to love liberty, and equality above all things: and for vs, amongst all the goodly lawes and cuftomes we have, we effect this about the reft to reverence and ho-The Perfits nour our king, as the image of the God of nature, who keepeth al things in their perfect life and flate. Wherefore, if thou wilt fashion thy selfe after our manner to honour the king, thou maiest both see him, and speake with him; but if thou have another mind with thee, then must thou of necessity vse some third person for thy meane. For this is the manner of our countrey: the King neuer giueth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he faid, answered him againe: My Lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the defire I hauc to aduance his glory and power, is the onely cause of my present repaire vnto his court: therefore I meane not onely to obey your lawes (fince it hath to pleafed the gods to raife up the noble empire of Persia vnto this greatnesse) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there do at this present. Therefore let there be no flay, but that my felfe in person may deliner to the King that I haue to say vnto him. Well, sayd Artabanus: whom then shall we say thou art? For by thy speech it seemeth; thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles answered him: As for that Artabanus, none shall know before the king himfelfe. Thus doth Phanias report it. But Eratofthenes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: how Themistocles had accesse vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought to his presence after he had presented his humble duty and reuerence to him, stood on his seete, and faid neuer a word, vntill the King commanded the interpreter to aske him what he was and he answered: May it please your Maiesty, O noble King, I am Themistocles the ATHENIAN, a bani shed man out of my countrey by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaireth to your Highnesse. knowing I have done great hurr to the Pers 1 ANS, but I perswade my self I have done them far more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIAN'S backe they did not follow you whethe state of GRECE was deliuered from thraldome, & my native country from danger, & that I knew I flood in good flate to pleafure you. Now for me, I find al mens good wills agreea bleto my prefent mifery and calamity: for I come determined, most humbly to thanke your Highneffe for any grace and fauour you shall shew me, and also to craue humble pardon if your Maiesty be yet offended with me. And therfore licece me (most noble king) to be seech you, that taking mine enemies the Grecians for witnesses of the pleasures I have done the Persian nation, you wil of your princely grace vie my hard fortune as a good occasion to shew your honourable vertue, rather then to fatisfie the passion of your heat and choler. For in fauing my life, your Maiesty faueth an humble surer that put himself to your mercy; and in putting me to death, you shall rid away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Having spoken thus these words, he said further: That the gods by diverse fignes and tokens had procured him to come to submit himselfe vnto him, and told the king what vision he had scene in his dreame in Nicogenes house: and declared also the oracle of Inpiter Dodonian, who had commanded him that he should go vnto him that was called as a god, and how hee thought it was the person of his Maiesty, because that god and he introth were called both great Kings. The King having thus heard him speake, gaue him then no prefent answere againe, notwithstanding he maruellously wondred at his great wisedome and boldnesse. But afterwards amongst his familiars the King said, he thought himselfe very happy to meete with the good fortune of Themistocles comming to him: and so befought his great god Arimanius, that he would alwaics fend his enemies such minds, as to banish the greatest and wisest men amongst them. It is reported also he did facrifice vnto the gods. to give them thankes therefore, and dilposed himselfe presently to be merie. Insomuch as dreaming in the night, in the middest of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioy: I have Themistocles the Athenian. The next morning the King having fent for the chiefest Lords of his Court, he made Themistocles also to be brought before him: who looked for no goodnesse at all, specially when he saw the souldiers warding at the Court gates, give him ill countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and vnderstood his name. Moreouer, Raxanes, one of the captaines, as Themistocles passed by him going to the King, (who was set in his chaire of state, and euery man keeping filence) foftly fighing, faid vnto him: O thou Greekish serpent, subtile &malicious, the kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Neuertheleffe when he came to the king, and had once againe made him a very humble and low reuerence: the king faluted him, & spake very courteously to him, saying: I am now your debter of two hundred talents, for prefenting your felf. It is good reason I should deliner you the mony promised him that should have brought you:but I give you a further warrant, be bold I charge you, and speake your minde freely, say what youthink of the state of GRECE. Themistocles then answered him: That mes words did properly resemble the stories and imagerie in a peece of arras: for both in the one and in the other, the goodly images of either of them are seene, when they are vnfolded and laid open. riemilio-Contrariwise they appeare not, but are lost, when they are shut vp, and close folded: whereupon els. he faid to the king: he must needs require some further time of answer. The king liked his comparison passing well, and willed him to appoint his ownetime. Themistocles asked a yeare: in which time having pretily learned the Persian tongue, he afterwards spake to the king himselfe without any interpreter. So, such as were no Courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GRECE. But because the change and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noblemen imagined he had bene so bold to common with the king of them also. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, and afterwards murmured much against him, For indeed the King did honour Themissocles aboue al other strangers whatsoeuer they were. On a time the king had him out a hunting with him, he made him feehis mother, with whom he grew familiar: and by the Kings own commandement he was to heare the disputations of the wise men of Persia tou- Persia. ching secret philosophie, which they call magicke. Demaratus the LACED EMONIAN being at pemaratus that time in the court of Persia, the king willing him to aske what gift he would, he befought find demad the king to grant him this fauour to licence him to go vp & downe the city of SAR DIS with his royall hat on his head as the kings of Persia do. Mithropaustes, the kings cosin, taking him by the hand, faid vnto him: Demaratus, the Kings hat thou demandest, and if it were on thy head, it would couer but little wit: Nay though Inpiter did give thee his lightning in thy hand, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the King gaue him to sharpe a repulse for his vnreasonable request, and was soangry with him for it, that it was thought he would never have forgiven him: howbeit Themisseeles was so carnest a futer for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the report goeth, that the Kings successours which have bene since that time, under whom the PERSIANS have had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great state or personage of GRECE into their seruice, they wrotevnto him, and promifed him they would make him greater about them, then euer was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirme it. For he being stept vp to great countenance & authority, and followed with great traines of suiters after him by reason of his greatnessfecing himself one day very honorably served at his table, & with all sorts of dainty meats, he turned him to his childre, & said vnto them: My sons, we should have bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. allowance of bread, wine, and victuals: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, and MYVNTA. But Neanthes Cyzicenian, and Phanias do adde two other cities more, PERCOTA, and PALES CEPSIA: the one to defray his charges of apparell, and the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themilto. cles going into the low countries towards the sea, to take order against the practites of the GRE-CIANS: there was a Persian Lord called Epixies (gouernour of the high Phrygia) that had laid a traine to kil him (hauing of long time hired certain murderers of Pisidia to do it) fo foon as he should come into a town of his gouernement, called the Lions head. But as he slept on a day in his house in the after noone, the mother of the gods appeared vnto him, and said: Themi. feeles, go not to the Lions head, for feare thou meete with the Lion and for this warning, I do ask thy daughter Mnesiptolema for my fernant. Themistocles waking fodainely out of his dreame. made his prayer vnto the goddeffe, and turning out of the high way, fetched another compaffe about. Afterwards having passed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beafts which caried his tent, fell by the way unfortunatly in a riner, & all his arras & tapestry hangings being throughly wet, his feruats were driven to lay them out a drying by moon light. The Pifidians that lay in waite, and could not discerne by Moone light that they were hangings layed out to dry, thought it had bene the very tent Themistocles selfe did lie in: whereupon they went vnto it with their swords drawne in their hands, hoping to haue taken him sleeping. But when they were come thither, and began to lift vp a peece of the hangings, some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watch) perceiuing them, ran vpon them, and took them. So Themi. focles houing escaped this danger, wondered greatly at the favour of the goddesse which had appeared vnto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the city of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mnesiptolema priorcise of the same. As he passed by the city of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to visit the temples, & offerings that had bene giuen there. So he faw an image of a maide in copper, in the temple of the mother of the gods, being two yards high, which they called the Hydrophora, as much to fay, as the watercarier. And it was a statue, which himselfe had heretofore dedicated and caused to be made with the fines of those that had paid forseitures, for stealing or turning away the water course at ATHENS, at fuchtime as he was master surveyer of the water workes & conduits there. Wherfore, whether Themistocles was fory to see this goodly image a prisoner in the hands of the barbarous people, or that he would shew vnto the ATHENIAN's the greatnesse of his credit and authority through all the Kings dominions: he spake to the governor of Lydia, and prayed him for his sake that he would fend this image againe to Athens. But this barbarous gouernour was very angry with his request, and told him he would aduertise the King thereof. Then Themistecles beganto be afeard, and was driven to seeke to the governours women and concubines, whom he got for mony to intreat him, and so made faire weather againe with the gouernour. But from thenceforth, he took better gard of him in all his doings, greatly fearing the enuy of the barbarous people. For he progressed not up and downe As 1A, as Theofompus writeth, but lay a long time in the citie of MAGNESIA, quietly enioping the Kings gracious gifts bestowed on him: where he was honoured and reuerenced for one of the greatest persons of Persia, whilest the King was elsewhere occupied in the affaires of the prouinces of Asia, and had no leisure to thinke vpon those of GRECE. But when newes was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour and affiftance of the Athenians, and that the Grecians gallies did scowrethe feas even ynto the Ile of Cyprvs, and vnto the coasts of Cilicia, and that Cimon had all the fea in subjection: that made him then to bend all his thoughts how to resist the GRECIANS, that their greatnesse might not turne to his harme. Then commissions went out to leauie men; to affemble captaines, and to dispatch postes vnto Themistocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings letters, straightly charging him to have an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreover that he should faithfully keepe his promise he had made to him. But he, to shew that he neither maliced his citizens, nor was moued with the defire of greatnesse and authority he might have growne vnto in those warres, or else for that he thought the Kings expectation would producto a greater matter then he could end or wade through, confidering GRECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongst the rest had maruellous good fortune, and that it should be a reproch to him to staine the glory of so many noble acts, so many triumphs, and so great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wife resolution with himselfe, to make fuchan end of his life, as the fame therof deserved, for he made a solemne sacrifice vnto the gods and

and feasted at the same all his friends. And after he had taken his leave of them all, he drank buls Theman bloud as most men thinke, or (as other say) poyson, which dispatcheth a man in 24. houres, and ner of the. founded his daies in the citie of Magnes 1A, after he had lived threescore and five yeares, and y death. most part of them alwaics in office, and great charge. It is written that the King of Persia vnderstanding the cause and maner of his death, did more esteeme him afterwards, then he did before, and that ener after he continued to vse his friends and familiars in very good sort. For he left children behind him, which he had of Archippa (Lyfanders daughter) of the towns of ALORE- Themillec 1A: Archeptolis, Polyeuctus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plato the Philosopher maketh mention, slevelidre. faying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwise that there was no goodnesse in him. His other sonnes that were elder, as Neocles, died being bitten with a horse; and as for Diocles another sonne, his grandfather Lysander did adopt him for his son. He had many daughters, of the which Mnesiptolema (which he had by a second wife) was maried vnto her halfe brother Archeptolu-for they were not both of one venter: another called Italia, was maried vnto one Panthides of Chio: Sybaris, vnto Nicomedes an ATHENIAN: and Nicomacha, vnto Pharsicles, Themistocles nepnew; vnto whom her brethren did marry her within the city of MAGNESIA, after the death of their father. This Pharficles did bring vp Afia, which was the yongest of al his daughters. Furthermore his sumpruous rombe standeth yet in the market place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocites Writeth of his bones, in a book he made to his friends, is not to be credited, which was: that the A-THENIANS having found the ashes of his bones, did cast them vp into the aire, as a device to stirre vp the noble men against the people. And Phylarchus in his history (much like vnto the fained subtilities of a tragedie) bringeth in I cannot tell what Neocles and Demopolis, for Themistocles fonnes, to moue the readers with compassion. Howbeit no man is so simple, but will judge it ftraight a very faining and deuice. Diodorus the cosmographer also in a book he hath written of tombes and monuments faith, by coniecture, rather then of any certaine knowledge: that along the hauen of PIR EA, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a foreland in forme of an elbow, within the which when they have doubled the point, the sea is alwaies calme, and there they find a great and long foundation or base, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an altar, and that is (faith he) Themistocles tombe. And he supposeth that Plate the comicall Poetdoth witnesse it in these verses:

the continuall wars, about the which the common-weale sustained great charges, but specially mor, and number of fouldiers, was nothing inferior to the city of Rome. For the VEIANS being growne to stomacke and courage in time, by reason of their wealth and prosperity, and for the fundry great battels they had fought against the Romaines, that cotended with them for glory and empire: and now it fell so out, that they finding themselues weakned by many great ouerthrowes, which they had received of the Romaines, they did let fall their former peacockes brauery and ambition, to bid them battell any more in the field. Howbeit the inhabitants of the city of VEIES hauing raised the wals, & made very great high rampiers, began to fortifie themfelues, and made good prouision for armour and munition, besides store of corne, shot, and other necessary things: they valiantly, and without feare of any thing, defended the siege of the Romaines, that continued a long time, and was no lesse hard and painefull vnto them that did besiege, then it was vnto those that were besieged. For where y Romaines were wont beforetime to keepe their houses in the Winter season, and the field only in the Sommer time: that was the first time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to build forts, and to intrench their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies countrey, and to winter abroad as they

was in the later end of Autumne, and Somer was ended, & that there had not bene much raine, nor notable South-winds. And although there are many lakes, many brookes, and rivers, many fprings, and other waters in ITALY: yet some of them dried vp altogether, other ran but faintly by reason of the drought, & all the rivers then were (as they are wont to be comonly in Somer) very low, and there was scant any water. But the lake ALBANYS contrariwise, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whither out of it selfe, being enuironed al about with hils & mountaines, and where the earth is good: began to fwell, and rife to enery mans fight without any cause at all (but secret and hidden vnto the gods alone) and went alwaies increasing along those hils sides, vntill such time as it came to be euen with the height of the highest mountaine, gathering vpwards still without any waves or tempest of weather at all. This at the first, made poore sheephcards and heardmen keeping their cattell thereabouts, maruellously afraid: but at the length when the earth and the weight of one of the hils (which kept in the lake as a wall, from running ouer into the field) began to breake by reason of the weight and great quantity of water, that ran straight with a maruellous extreme force and violence ouer all the arable lands and grounds planted with trees, and so tooke his course into the sea: the Romaines then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of Iraly were wonderfully afraid, and judged that it was fome figne and prognostication of some wonderfull thing to come. And there was no other newes currant in the campe, which lay at siege of the citie of VEIEs: in so much as the very brute of it fled ouer the wals of the city, vnto them that were befieged. And as it happeneth very

THE LIFE OF Furius Camillus.

MONGST many great matters which are spoken of this Furius Camil. lus, this feemeth most strange and wonderfull about the rest: that hee having borne the chiefest offices of charge in his countrey, and hauing done many notable and worthie deedes in the same, as one that was chosen frue times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had won himselfe the name and title of the second founder of Rome, and yet neuer came to be Confull. But the onely cause thereof was, that the common-weale of Rome flood then in such state and fort. The people were then at diffention with the Senate: they would chuse

be Confull. no more Confuls, but other kind of gouernours whom they call Tribuni militares: these did all things with like power and authority as the Confuls, yet were they nothing so odious vnto the people, by reason of the number that was of them. For it was some hope to them that could il beare y rule of the small number of nobility, that the gouernmet of the state being put into six, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eafier, and tollerabler. Now Camillus being at that time in his best credit and authority, and in the prime and glory of his doings, did not defire to be made Conful without the goodwil of the people, although whilest he was in authority, there were many times Confuls created. But being called and chosen to all other offices & dignities, he behaued himselfe in such fort, that when he was alone, he made his authority common to other : and when he had companions and affociates, the glory of all redounded to himfelfe alone. The cause whereof, was his modesty on the one side, for he commanded euer without enuie and his great wisedome and sufficiencie on the other side, for the which al others willingly gaue him place and yeelded to him. The house of Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the first that began to set himself forwards. For in a great battell which was fought against the Aques and Volfces, he being but a private man at armes vnder the Distator Posthumius Tubertus, was the first that riding out of the army, advanced himselfe and gave the charge. And being runne into the thigh at that time with a staffe broken vpon his thigh, he plucked the trunchen out, and retired not for all that: but giving charge againe vpon the stoutest of the enemies, he fought it out so valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chiefe cause they turned their backs. Whereupon, to requite his seruice done at that time (besides other honors they did him; they made him Cenfor: an office at that time of great prcheminence and dignity. In his office of Cenforship, he did two notable acts. The one very honest: when he brought men that were not maried, to marry the women whom the wars had left widowes, which were in number charge: whereupon in the end they were discharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to follow the siege. Among those Carrillo was one whom the siege. to follow the siege. Among those, Camillus was one, whom then the second time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithstanding did nothing then in that siege, because it was his hap camillus by lot, to make wars upon the Phalerians, and the Capenates. These people whilest the Romanness were occupied otherwhere, had inveded their course by department of the state ROMAINES were occupied otherwhere, had inuaded their country & done them great harme, of the soilduring the time of their warre with the THYSCANES. skilfullaboue any other in the city, in the art of divination, or foothfaying. The Romaine then told him one day the violent breaking out of the lake ALBANYS, and perceiuing that the other after he had heard him, was as merrie as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their fiege: he told him further, that this wonderfull chance was not onely happened vnto the ROMAINES at that time, but that they had bene acquainted with many other farre more strange then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to see if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common-weale had but hard fuccesse, yet he would procure that his own private matters might prosper well with him. The VE IAN answered him, hee would heare him with a goodwill, and gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard some great secret. So the Ro-MAINE training him on still from one matter to another, holding on his way, vntill he saw he was a good diffance off from the gates of the city, he fuddenly caught hold on him, and by ftrong hand caried him away with him, and with helpe of other fouldiers which came running out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the Captaines. The VEIAN feeing himselfe thus forcibly vsed, and knowing also that fatall destiny cannot be avoided, began to declare Vnto the ROMAINES, the ancient Oracles and prophefies touching the fortune of their city:by which it was reported vnto them, that the city of VEIEs should neuer be taken, vntil the enemy had caused the water of the lake ALBANYS (which should break out) to be brought back againe, and to turne it some other way from thence, that it shold not fall into the sea. This was caried Vnto the Senate at Rome, to be consulted of in the councell: and there it was determined they should fend to the Oracle of Apollo at the city of DELPHES, and aske him what they should do therein. So thither were fent great and notable men, Cossus Licimus, Valerius Politus, and Fabius Ambustus: who having ended their journey by sea, and received answer of that they demanded, An Oracle returned home againe, & among ft other oracles they brought one that faid thus: That through negligence they had omitted some ancient ceremonies in the holy daies of the LATINES. And another willed them, that they should by all possible meanes they could, keepe the water of the lake ALBANYs that it fell not into the fea, and should (if it were possible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be drunke vp in the middest of the field. When these oracles were vnderstood, the priests prepared allthings for divine service, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After the se things were done, the Senate in the tenth yeare of the warres against the VEIANS, put off all those which did beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horsemen, Cornelius scipio. And before he went in hand with any thing, chafen Di he made a vow vnto the gods, that if it pleased the to grant a happy end of these wars, in honor of them he would celebrate great playes, and build atemple vnto the goddesse which the Ro-MAIN Es call Matuta which scemeth to be her whom we cal Leucothea, confidering the ceremonies done in these sacrifices. For they cause a chambermaide to enter into her temple, and there Matuta, they box her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, & do embrace their brothers children rather then their own. They make many other ceremonies, & they are much like vnto those that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the misfortunes that chanced vnto Ino, by reason of her husbands concubine. After all their vowes & prayers made, he entred with his army into the FALICIANS territories, who he ouerthrew in a great battell, together with y CAPENATES alfo, which came to aide the. From thence he went to the fiege of the city of Veies, where perceiuing to take it by affault, was not to be done without great danger: he began to vndermine it (finding the earthall about very minable) and withall so deepe, that the enemies could perceiue nothing. Now when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an affault to the wals in all places alike about the city at one instant, to bring out all the inhabitants of the city to manthe wals. Whilest they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence, Camillan fouldiers entred fecretly through the mines within the castell, hard by the temple of Iuno: The city of which was the chiefe Church of all the city, and whereunto the citizens had most denotion, They fay that cuen at that present time the Generall of the THYSCANES did sacrifice vnto the gods, and that his foothfayer having confidered the intrails of the beafts offered up in facrifice, cried out aloud, that the gods gaue the victory vnto him, which should happen to come vppon them in this facrifice. The ROMAINES which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noyse with their weapons: where with the enemies were so astonied, that they fled vpon it, and so the ROMAINES tooke the intrails and caried them vnto Camillus. And these be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus having by this meanes taken the city, and seeing from the top of the castell the infinite goods and riches within the citie, which the fouldiers spoyled and made hauock of, he wept for very pitie. And when those that were about him told him he was a happie man, he lift vp his hands vnto heauen, and made this prayer: O mighty god Iupiter, and you ô gods, continued which see and judge mens good and ill workes: you know right well, that we have not willing. ly (without wrong and cause offered vs) begun this warre, but instly, and by compulsion, to be reuenged of a city our enemy, which hath done vs great injuries. But if to counteruaile this our great good prosperity and victory, some bitter adversitie and overthrow be predestinated vnto vs: I beseech you then (most mercifull gods) in sparing our citie of Rome, and this her army, you will (with as litle hurt as may be) let it all fall & light vpon my person alone. And as he had spoken these words, and was turning on his right hand (according to the manner of the Ro-MAINES after they have prayed vnto the gods) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somewhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he told them that the thing he requested of the gods was happened vnto him; and that was, a little hurr, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole city being spoiled and rifled, he was also desirous to carry Junes image to Rome, to accomplish the vow he had made. And having sent for workmen for this purpose, he did facrifice first vntothegoddesic, beseeching her to accept well of the Romaines goodwill, and that she would willingly vouchsafe to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the city of Rome. Some fay, that the image answered, we was contented. But Livins writeth, that Camillus, made this prayer, as he touched the image, and that the affistants answered, she was contented, and would go with a good will. Yet they which do affirme, it was the image felf that spake, do fauor this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of Rome: the which, from fo base & meane beginning had impossibly attained vnto so high glory & power as it had, without the fingular fauour of the gods; and that hath manifestly appeared vnto the world, by sundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth also such other like wonders; as, that images have Fained wy. heretofore let fall drops of swet from the : that they have bene heard to sigh: that they have turned; and that they have made certaine fignes with their eyes, as we find written in many ancient flories. And we could our sclues also tell such like woders, which we have heard me of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for fuch matters, it is as dagerous to giue too much credit to them, as also to discredit the too much, by reason of the weaknesse of mans nature, which hath no certaine bounds, nor can rule it selfe, but runneth sometimes after vanity & superstition, and otherwhile also despiseth and contemneth holy and divine matters and therforethe meane is the vertue, and not to go too farre in this, as in all other things befides, it is the best. Now Camillus, whether his late enterprise performed, in winning a citie that flood out with Rome, and held flege with them ten yeares together, had put him into an ouerweening or conceipt of himselfe: or that the words of the people, which did blesse and praise him, had made him looke high, and presume vpon himselfe, more then became the modesty of a ciuill magistrate and gouernour of the common-weale, and one that was subject to the law: he shewed a stately triumph, set forth with all rich furniture, & specially for that himself was caried camilland through Rom E vpo his triumphant chariot drawne with foure faire white coursers. This, neuer captaine nor generall before him durst vndertaketo do, neither any euer after him attempted it. Piats. for they think it as a facred cariage, and only meet for the king, and father of the gods. This bred him much enuy amongst the citizens, which had not bene acquainted with so great statelinesse. There was another occasion also that made the mislike him much: which was, because he stood against the law put forth that they should deuide the city of Rome. For the Tribunes of the people did fet out an Edict, that the Senate and people of Rome should be deuided into two parts: Alw for the people of Rome should be deuided into two parts: and that those on whom the lot should fall, should abide still in Rome, and the other should go of some so dwell in the new wonne city of VEIEs. These were the reasons to perswade this: that both the one & the other fort should be richer then they were before, and should more easily keepe their lands & goods from the inuation of their enemies, by meanes of thefetwo great cities. The people which were multiplied now into great numbers, and had served dutifully and dangerously, thought it the best way in the world: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with great tumult, about their pulpet for orations, praying that this law might be put vnto the voyces

138 of the people. But the whole Senate and wifest citizens among them, judging this motion of the Tribunes would be the destruction, and not the division of the city of Rome, could in no wife abide it should go any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus helpe:who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the law should passe or no, did alwaies seeke new occasions and lets, still to delay and put off the matter, and stay the confirmation of this law. For these causes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall and apparant cause of the peoples ill wil towards him, was for taking from them the tenth part of their spoiles; and it was not altogether without sonte reason, and to say truly, the people did him much wrong to beare him such malice forthat. For before he went to the city of VEIEs, he made a folemne vow to offer the tenth part vnto the gods, of the spoiles of the city, if he wan the same. But when it was taken and facked, whether it was that he was loth to trouble the citizens, or having a world of be finesse in his head, that he easily forgat his vow, he suffered the souldiers to deuide the spoile amongst them, and to take the benefit to themselves. Shortly after he was discharged of his charge, he did enforme the Senate of his vow. Furthermore, the soothsayers made report at that very time how they knew by certaine fignes & tokens of their facrifices, that the god's were offended for somewhat, and how they must of necessity be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate presently made an order, where it was vnpossible euery man should bring in againe the selfe same things he had gotten, to make a new denision of every mans share: that every one therefore vpon his oathshould present the tenth part of his gaines he had gotten by that booty. There was great trouble about it. They were driven to vse great extremity to the poore fouldiers (which had trauelled fore, and taken great paines in the wars) to make them to restore backe such a collop out of their gaine, and the rather because many of them had already spent it enery penny; and for this trouble, they all cryed out with open mouth against Camillus. But he (not knowing otherwise how to excuse himselse) was forced to bring foorth as cold and as vnreasonable an excuse as he could make, which was: for sooth that hee had forgotten his vow he had made. The people notwithstanding were eager still against him, saying: how he had vowed then to offer the tenth part of the enemies goods to the gods, and that now he would performe it with the tenths of the citizens goods. Neuerthelesse, euery man having brought that he should for his part, it was thought good they should cause a massie cup of gold to be made, to send to the temple of Apollo at DELPHES. And small store of gold being in the city of Rome, as the officers of the city were fearching vp and downe to get ir, the women of Rome of their owne voluntarie wils without motion, agreed among themselves, that they would depart withall the iewels they had towards the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof, to honour them withall, the Senate ordained that they should be praised openly with funerall orations at their buriall, as they did vse at honourable and noble mens obfequies. For before that law, it was not the manner to praise women openly at their funerals. Now there were appointed there of the noblest men of the city to go to carie this offcring, and they sent them out in a galley well manned, stored also with good mariners, and trimly set forth in all triumphing manner: howbeit both in storme, and calme weather, they were in danger of their liues. For after that they had scaped drowning very narrowly by tempest, when the wind was downe againe, they fell into another danger, which they escaped also beyond all hope. For hard by the Illes of Eorvs, the galleys of the Liparians fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the LIPARIANS faw they made no relistance, and intreated them, holding vp their hands, they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only fastened their galley vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the shore, they declared they were pirats, and offered to make port sale of the men and goods, as if they had bene a lawfull prise; and had sold them indeed, had not the wisdome and authority of Timesitheus letted them, who was governour at that time of the city, and had great ado to perswade them to let them go. And he did not so leave them, but fent out certaine of his owneships to accompany them in their iourney, who did helpe them to go and performethe offering. For which curtefie of his, the ROMAINES afterwards did him great honour at Rome, according to his weldeferuing. The Tribunes of the people began now to set a foot against the law for the dividing of the inhabitants of Rome vnto the city of VE-IES. But the wars of the Falisces, fell out happily at that time, whereby the noble mendid chuse such officers as they would. So they chose Camillus, Tribunus militaris of the souldiers,& fine others to affift him, the feruice in that case requiring a Generall that caried both authority

CAMILLVS. and reputation among them, as an old experienced fouldier in the wars. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the Falisces with the Romains army, where he layd fiege to the city of the Falbrians, being very well fortified, Camillus victualled, and stored with all other munition of war. Knowing therefore that it was no small the Faleriattempt to win this city, and that it would not be done in a shorttime, he politickely sought am. (what soener came of it) to keepe his countrey men occupied about some thing, and to stay them for going home, left by repairing to Rome, they should have many occasions to rebell, and raise fome civill diffention. For the ROMAINES did wisely vie this remedy, to disperse abroad like good phy sitios, the humors which troubled the quiet state of their commonweale at home. But the FALERIANS trusting in the situation of their city, which was very strong in al parts, made so little account of the fiege, that those which kept no watch vpon the wals, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the city, without any weapon about them, and their children went to schoole, the schoole master also would commonly leade them abroad out of the city a walking, to play and passe the time by the towne wals. For the whole city had one common schoole-master, as the GRECIANS also have, which do bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, because one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This schoole-master spying his time to do the Falerians a shrewd turne, did accustomably take alhis scholers out of the city with him, to play not far from the wals at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the city againe after they had played their fill. Now after he had led the abroad thus once or twife, hetrained them out every day a litle further, to make them to be bold, perswading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day having gotten all the citizens children with him heled them within the watch of the ROMAINES campe, and there deliuered all his scholers into their hands, and prayed them they would bring him vnto their Generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was schoole-master vnto al these childre, neuerthelesse thathe did more esteeme to haue his grace and fauor, the regard his office he had by this name and title. Camillus hearing what he said, and beholding his treacherous part, he said to the those that were about him: Warre of it self surely is an enill thing, for in wars many injuries and mischieses are done: neuerthelesse, among good menthere is a law and discipline, which doth forbid them to seeke victory by wicked & traiterous meanes, and that a noble & worthy generall should make war, and procure victory by trusting to his owne valiantnesse, and not by anothers vilenesse & villany. Therfore he commanded his sergeants to teare the cloths off the back into section into section in the back in the back into section in the back in the b of this vile schoole-master, and to bind his hands behind him: and that they should give the children rods & whips in their hands, to whip the traitor back againe into the city, that had betraied them. & oriened their parents. Now whathe Fax rouses heard newes there is though a reprint them, & grieued their parents. Now whethe Falerians heard newesthat the schoole-master war. had thus betrayed them, all the city fell a weeping (as every man may think for fo great a losse) and men & women ran together one in anothers necke, to the towne wals, and gates of the city, like people out of their wits, they were fo troubled. Whethey came thither, they faw their chil- fore villany dren bringing their schoole-master backe againe, starke naked and bound, whipping of him, and The Falifcalling Camillus their father, their god, and their fauiour: fo that not only the fathers & mothers cians by of the children, but all other the citizens also in generall, did conceiue in themselues, a wonderfull admiration and great loue, of the wisedome, goodnesse, and instice of Camillus. So that even do yeeld presently they called a councell, & there it was concluded they should send ambassadors forthwith vnto him, to put their lines and goods to his mercy & fauor. Camillus fent their ambaffadors with Royal who and in a single property of the control of Vnto Rome, where audience being giuen vnto the by the Senate, the ambassadors said: Because milio. the Romains preferred inflice aboue victory, they taught them to be better contented to submit themselves vnto them, then to be their own men at liberty: confessing their vertue did more ouercome them then any force or power could do. The Senate dispatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commission to do and determine as he thought good. So he having taken a certaine finn of mony of y FALERIANS, did furthermore make peace & league with all y rest of the FA-LISCES: and therupon returned backe againe to Rome. But the fouldiers grudged maruelloufly at it. For they flood in hope to have had the facking of the city. When there was no remedy, but of mony of they must needes returne home empty handed, they began to accuse Camillus to the rest of the citizens, as foone as they came to Rome, faying: he loued not the common people, and how for made pear spite he disappointed their army of the spoile. On the other side, the Tribunes of the people with all began to remine the law for the deniding of the inhabitants of Rome, and were ready to passe therefore the Fallice and do in open presence, all he could against it. So that plainely he was the chiefest cause, that the people against their wils (intreate what they could) were driven to let it alone. But withall they were so spiteful against him, that notwithstanding his sorrow and missortune for the death of his sonne (dying of a sicknesse) was great, they would not of malice once take pitic or compassion of him. The lotse whereof (albeit he was of a very good and courteous nature) was so grieuous, and made him so vnquiet, that being accused before the people, he stirred not once out of his house, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his son departed. He that did accuse him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burthening him that he had stolne and taken away part of the spoile of the THYSCANES: and said they had seene certaine brasen gates at his house.

him, that every man might see, if they could once take him in a trip, vpon any advantage what so-continued a long time, untill they fortuned in the end to tafte of the wine, which was first brought out of ITALY vnto them. Which drink they found fo good, and were fo delighted with it, that suddenly they armed themselues, and taking their wines and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe feeke out the country that brought forth such fruit, indging all other countries in respect of that, to be but wild & barren. It is said, that the first man Thusane which brought wine vnto them, and that did procure them to passe into ITALY, was a nobleman the procus. of Thyscan called Arron, and otherwise of no ill disposed nature : howbeit he was subject to this misfortune following. He was tutor to an orphan child, the richest that was at that time in minginto all the countrey of Thys can, and of complexion was wonderfull faire: he was called Lucumo, Italy. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons house of a child, and though he was growne to mans ftate, yet he would not go from him, faining he was well, and to his liking. But indeed the cause was, that he loued his mistresse (Arrons wife) whom secretly he had enioyed a long time, and she him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the end, loue having so possessed them both, that neither party could withdraw from other, much lesse conceale it: the yong man stole her away from him, and kept her still by force. Arron put him in suite, but he prevailed not: for Lucumo ouerweyed him with friends, money gifts, and charges. But he rooke Lackof in it so grieuously, that he left his countrey : and having heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto fire the them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALY. So they conquered at their first comming destruction all that country which the THYSCANES held in old time, beginning at the foote of the moun. taines, & stretched out in length from the one sea vnto the other, which enuironeth ITALY, as y of thuseane by the names themselues do witnesse. For they call yet that sea which looketh vnto the North, the A- Gaules, driatick sea: by reason of a city built sometime by the THVS CANES which was called Adria. The other, which lieth directly ouer against the South, is called the THVSCANE sea: All that country is well planted with trees, and hath goodly pleasant pastures for beasts & cattell to feed in, & is notably watered with goodly running rivers. There was also at that time eighteene faire great cities in that country, all of them very strong and well seated, as well for to enrich the inhabitants of the rhast causin old thereof by trafficke, as to make them liue delicately for pleasure. All these cities the GAVLES time. had won, and had expulsed the THYSCANES, but this was done long time before. Now the GAVLES being further entred into THVSCAN, did befrege the city of CLVSIVM. Therupon the Cluftum a CLYSIANS feeking aid of the ROMAINES, befought them they would lendletters & ambassadors vnto these barbarous people in their fauour. They sent vnto them three of the best & most besteed by honorable persons of the city, all three of the house of the Fabians. The GAVLES' received them very courteoufly, because of the name of Rome: and leaving to affault the city, they gaue them audience. The ROMAINE ambassadours did ask them, what injury the CLVSIANS had done vnto them, that they came to make warres with them. Brennus king of the Gavles, hearing this question, smiled and answered them thus: The CLVS IAN'S doe vs wrong in this they being but Gaules. few people together, and notable to occupy much land, do not with standing possesse much, and will let vs haue no part with them, that are itrangers, and out of our country, and stand in need of seat and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you Romaines in old time, by those of ALEA, by the FIDENATES, and the ARDEATES: and not long fithens, by the VEIANS, and the CAPENATES: and partly by the FALISCES and the Volsces: against whom ye have taken, and do take armes at all times: and as oft as they will let you have no part of their goods, ye imprison their persons, rob and spoile their goods, and destroy their cities: and in doing this, ye do them no wrong at all, but follow the oldest law that is in the world, which ever leaveth vnto the stronger, that which the weaker cannot keepe and enioy : beginning with the gods, and ending with beafts: the which have this property in nature, that the bigger and stronger have ever the vantage of the weaker and leffer. Therefore, leave your pity to see the Civsians befreged, lest you teach vs Gav L Es to take compassion also of those you have oppressed. By this answer the Romaines knew very well, there was no way to make peace with king Brenniu. Wherfore they entred into the city of CLVSIVM, and incouraged the inhabitants to fallie out with them vponthese barbarous people: either because they had a desire to proue the valiantnesse of the GAVLES, or else to shew their own courage and manhood. So the citizens went out, and skirmifhed with them hard by the wals: in the which one of the Fabians, called Quintus Fabius Ambus breaketh flus, being excellently well horfed, and putting spurs to him, did set vpon a goodly bigge personage of the GAVLES, that had advanced himselfe farre before all the troupe of his companions. nations.

His friends having laid their heads together, and consulted thereupon, The equity madehim answer: that for his judgement they could not remedy it, but if he were condemned of the Romaines who they would alioyne together with a very good wil, to helpe to pay his fine. But he being of mind would not law though not to beare such an open shame & ignominy, determined in choler to leaue the city, & to exile himself from it. fer vertue recompensed with ingratitude, to passe vnreuenged. Their first token that threatned fome great mischiese to light vpon them, was the death of Iulius, one of the Censors: for the Ro-MAINS do greatly reuerence the Office of a Cenfor, and efteeme it as a facred place. The second token that happened a liele before Camillus exile, was, that one Marcus Caditius, a man but of meane quality, and none of the Senators (but otherwife a faire conditioned honest man, and of good conscience) told the Tribum militares of a thing that was to be well considered of. For he faid that the night before, as he was going on his way in the new streete, he heard one call him aloud: and returning backe to see what it was, he saw no liuing creature, but only heard a voice bigger the a mans, which faid vnto him, Marcus Caditius, go thy way to morrow morning to the Tribuni militares, and bidthem looke quickly for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were merry at the matter, and made but a least at his warning, & straight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Now astouching the GAVLES: they came (as they fay) of the CELTE, whose country not being able to maintaine the multitudes of them, they were driven to go feeke other countries to inhabit in: and there were amongst them many thousands of yong men of service and good souldiers, but yet more women & litle children by a great number. Of these people some of them went towards the North sea, passing the mountaines RIPHEI, and did dwell in the extreme parts of EVROPE. Other of them remained betweene the mountaines PIRENEI, and the greatest mountaines of the ALPES, necrevato the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they

He was not knowne at the first encounter, as well for the sudden meeting and skirmishing together, as for that his gliftering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had flaine the GAVLE, and came to ftrip him, Brennus then knew him, and protested against him, calling the gods to witnesse, how he had broken the law of armes, that coming as an ambassadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemy. Hercupon Brennus forthwith left skirmishing, and raifing the fiege from CLVSIVM, marched with his army vnto ROME gates. And to the endthe ROMAINES might know, that the GAVLES were not well pleased for the iniury they had receiued : to haue an honest colour to begin wars with the Romaines, he sent an Herald before to Rome, to demand linerie of the man that had offended him, that he might punish him accordingly. In the meane time, he himselfe came marching after, by small journeys to receive their answer. The Senate hereupon assembled, and many of the Senatours blamed the rashnesse of the Fabians: but most of all, the prices called Faciales. For they followed it very earnessly, as a matter that concerned religion, and the honour of the gods: declaring how the Senate, in discharge of all the refidue of the city of the offence committed, should lay the whole weight and burthen of it vpon him alone, that onely had done the fact. Numa Pompilius, the instell and most peaceable of al the Kings of Rome that had bene, was he that first erected the Colledge of these F.eciales, and did ordaine that they should be the keepers of peace, and the judges to heare and allow all the causes, for the which they should justly beginning warres. Neuerthelesse, the Senate in the end turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the will and judgement of the whole people, before whom the priests Faciales did also accuse Fabius Ambustus. The people made folitle account of their propounded religion, and honour of the gods in that case that in stead of delinering of this Fabius vnto the enemy, they did chuse him for one of the Tribunes of the fouldiers with his brothers. The GAVLES vnderstanding this, were so furious & angry thereat, that they would no longer linger their iournies, but marched with al speed vnto Rome. The people that dwelt by the high wates where they should passe by, were maruellously affraid to see the multitude of them, and their braue and vniuerfall furniture: and beginning to doubt the fury of their rage, they imagined first of all that they would destroy all the champion countrey before them, & afterwards would take all the ftrong cities. They contrariwife did take nothing at al out of the fields, neither did any hurt or displeasure vnto any body but passing by their cities, cried out they went to Rome, and would have no wars but with the Romaines, and how otherwise they defired to be frieds with althe world. These barbarous people marching on in this wise to wards Rome, the Tribunes of the fouldiers brought their army to the field to encounter them. They were no leffe in number then the GAVLES, for they were 40000. footmen: howbeit most part of them were raw foldiers, that had neur ferued in the wars before. They were very careles of the gods, and diffolute in matters of religion: for they passed neither for good signes in their facrifices, neither to aske counfell of their foothfayers, which the Romaines were religiously wont to do, before they gaue any battel. To make the matter worse, the number of the captaines having power & authority alike, did as much (or more then the rest) disorder & confound their doings. For oft times before, in farre leffer matters and dangers then these, they did vie to chuse speciall officers that had sole & soueraigne authority, which they called Distators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in dangerous times to haue but one head & general, to command all, and to have supreme authority of instice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliver account of his doings to any. The iniury also which they had too vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great mischiefe & inconvenience then vponthem. For the captaines after him, durst no more command the people roughly, but euer after did flatter them much. When their army was now brought into the field, they encaped the selues by a litle river called Allia, about the eleventh from RomE, and not far from the place where the same river falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous army to them, who ouerthrew them in battell, by their disorder & lack of gouernment. For the left point or wing of their battel was broke off at the first by the GAVLES. who charged them fo furioufly, that they draue them headlong into the river. The right wing then retiring out of the plaine, before they had any charge given, & having gotten certaine hils hard by them: they had litle hurt, & most of them sauing themselues, did recouer Rome agains. The rest that escaped after the enemies were wearie of killing, sled by night vnto the citie of VEIEs, thinking Rome had bene loft, and all the city put to the fword. This ouerthrow was on the longest day in Sommer, the Moone being at the full: and the day before fortuned the great flaughter of the Fabians, of the which were flaine by the THYSCANES in one day 300. all of aname. The very day it felf was afterwards called Alliade, of the name of the litle river, by the which the fecond ouerthrow was given. But for the difference of daies, that fome of them are na. in one stay. turally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the Philosopher had reason to reproue the Poet Hesiodus, for making fomedaies good & fome daies ill, as though he vnderstood they were not all of one nature: we have written and declared our opinion thereof in other places. Yet, because the matter deliuereth present occasion to speake of the same, peraduenture it wil not be amisse alledge a few examples of it onely. It fortuned the Bosorians on a time to win two honorable victories, on the first day of the moneth they call Hippodromus (& which the ATHENIANS call Hecatembeon) that is now the moneth of June, by either of the which they did still restore the GR E-CIANS to their liberty. One was the battell of LEVETRES: the other was the battell of GE-RAST E, which was 200. yeares before, when they ouercame Lattamias, and the THESSALIANS in battell. The Persian's contrarily were ouercome in battell by the Grecians the 6.day of August, at the iorney of MARATHON; the third day, at the battell of PLATRES: and on the selfe fame day, neere vnto Mycala. On the fine and twentieth day, at the fight of AREBLES, the A-THENIANS wan the battel by fea, neere vnto the He of Naxos, vnder the charge & government of Chabrias, about the full of the Moone, in the moneth of August. And on the twentieth of the fame moneth, they wan the battell of Salaminas we have written more amply in our history of difference of daies. The moneth of April also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the great, ouercame the general of the king of Persia, at the field of Gra-NICA, in the faid moneth. The CARTHAGINIAN'S also were vanquished in CICILE by Timolean, on the feuen and twentieth day thereof. On which day also it is thought the city of Trox was taken: as Ephorus, Califthenes, Damastes, and Phylarchus, have written in their histories. Now contrariwise: the moneth of July, which the Bofotians call Panemus, hath not bene gracious to the GRECIANS. For on the feuenth day of the fame, they were ouerthrowne by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their viter destruction. They had before also lost a battell the fame moneth, necre vnto the city of CHERONEA, by king Philip. On the fame day also, and in the very selfe moneth & yeare, those which came into ITALY with king Archidamus were slaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the country. The CARTHAGINIANS also feare the 27.day of the same moneth, as y day which had before time brought them into many great & sorowfull calamities. Contrarily also, I know very well, how about the feast of mysteries, the city of THERES was destroyed by Alexander, and that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receiue a garifo of fouldiers into their citie, about the 20. day of August, at which time they made the holy procession of the mysteries of Iacebus. And on the felf day the Romaine's lost their army, and their Generall Cepio, who was flaine by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards under the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, & the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus, & Pompey also, died both on the selfe same day they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of me might be brought, vnto whom after like revolutions of time, there happened notable chances of good or ill. But to returne againe vnto our historic. The day of this ouerthrow, is one of those which the ROMAINES take for one of the vnfortunatest daies that ever came vnto them. And by The Ro. reason of that day, they reckon two other daies of enery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred mains sa through feare and superstition, which spreadeth farr (as commonly it doth) vpon such finisher persistent missorrupes Burson by the property with the propert misfortunes. But for this matter, we have written it more largely and exquifitely in the book we wing of made, of the ceremonies & customes of the Romains. Now after this battel lost, if & GAVLES dayes. had hotly purfued the chase of their flying enemies, nothing could have saved Rome from being taken, and the inhabitants thereof from being put vnto the sword: for the Romaines that Acd from the battel, brought such a feare upon those that received them, & filled the whole city of Rome with such grices & trembling, that they wist not what to do. The barbarous people againe, beleeuing litle their victory was so great as it was, fell to make good cheere for so great a ioy received,& devided among the the spoile of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaue they time & leisure by this meanes, to the multitude of people that fled out of Rome, to feek them some place of safety: & to such as remained still, they left good hope to saue the selues, and to make some prouision for defence. Thereupon they all fortified themselves within mount Capitoll, & storing it with al kind of victuall, armor, and munition, they wholly did for fake the rest of the city. But the first worke they tooke in hand was this: They did bring into their sayd fort, part of their facred reliques: and the professed Vestals brought thither also their holy fire and all other their holy monuments. Some writers fay, that they had nothing else in keeping, but the sempiternall fire, and were so consecrated by king Numa, who did first institute, that the fire should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the most motive and quickest fubstance that is of all naturall things:notwithstanding, that generatio also is a mouing, or at the least not done without motion. For we see, that all other substance which lacketh heate, remaineth idle, and without action, and ftirreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craucth the force and heate of fire: as the foule it felfe recouering heate, beginneth fomewhatto moue. and disposeth it selfe to do, and suffer something. Wherefore Numa being (as they say) a man of great learning and understanding, who for his wisdome was reported to talke many times with the Muses, did consecrate the same as a most facred thing, and commanded that they neuer should suffer that fire to go out, but to keepe it, as they would preferre the linely image of the eternall God, the onely King and maker of the world. Other fay, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and facred things, fignifying a kind and maner of purification; which opinion the Grecians hold also: howbeit behind the fame fire, there were certaine hidden things, which in no cafe any might fee, but those holy Vestall Nuns. Many also hold an opinion, that the Palladium of Troy (as much to fay as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Aneas into ITALIE. Other do report also, that Dardanus, at that time when he first began to build the city of TROY, brought thither the holy images of y gods of SAMOTHRACIA. and he did offer them vp there: and how Ameas after the city was taken, did steale them away. and kept them untill he came to dwell in ITALY. Some other also, that take upon them to know more therein then the common fort doe, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and standeth open, the other is full and fast locked vp, howbeit they are not to be seene but by these holy Numes. Other thinke also, that these imaginers invented that they spake of their owne heads, because the Vestall Nuns did cast all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the temple of Quirinus: & therfore that very place carieth the furname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the most precious things they had, and fled along the river. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying also, and having brought away his wife and litle children, & other houshold stuffe he had in a cart, by chance he lighted vpon the Vestall Nunnes in the way. But so soone as he perceived these holy Nunnes (carying the blessed reliques and iewels in their armes, dedicated vnto the service of the gods all alone, and that they were weary with going on foot he caused his wife and his children to come out of the cart, and tooke downe all his goods alfo, and willed them to get vp, and flye into some citie or towne of GRECE. Thus, methought, I could not wel passe ouer with silence, Albinus reverence & devotion he shewed vnto the gods, in fo dangerous a time and pinch of extremity. Furthermore the priefts of other gods, and the most honourablest old men of the city of Rom E (that had bene Consuls before time, or had past the honour oftriumph) had not the heart to forfake Rome: but putting on all their most holy robes & vestments, did vow, and as it were willingly facrificed themselves vnto the fortune that should befall them for the safety of their country. And vfing certaine words and prayers which their high Bishop Fabius had taught them, they went euen thus apparelled into y great market place, and did fit them downe there, in chaires of iuory, expecting the goodwil & pleasure of the gods what should become of them. But within three daies after, Brenus came to Rome with his army: who finding the gates of the citie all open, and the wals without watch, he doubted some deuice in it, & feared some privie ambush had bene layed, as one hardly beleeuing to have found the ROMAINES of so base a mind, as to for sake their city. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into Rome by the gate Collina, and tooke the fame little more then 360. yeares afterit was first builded: if it be true at the least that there hath remained any certaine chronicles of those things vnto this present day, considering the trouble & consussion of that time hath made many things more certaine then that, doubtfull vntovs. But fo it was, that the rumour ran to GRECE incontinently how Rome was taken, but yet withall fomewhat doubtfully and vncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) faith in a certaine booke he wrote of the foule, that there was newes come from the West part, that an army which came from the Hy-PERBORIANS had taken a city of GRECE called Rome, fituated in that country neare the great sea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written so many other fables and lyes) did amplific the true newes of the taking of Rome, with adding too of his owne deuice, of the Hr-PERFORIANS, and by the great sea. It is a most true tale, that Anssorbe the Philosopher had certaine knowledge it was taken by the GAVLES: howbeit he faith allo it was reconcred againe the taking afterwards by one called Lucius: where indeed it was, by Marcus Camillus, and not by Lucius. of Rome But all this in manner is spoken by consecture. Moreover Brennus being entred Rome, did appoint part of his fouldiers to beliege those which were gotten into mount C. pitol. And he with the refidue of his army, marched on towards the market place, where when he faw the ancient of the old of the Senators fet so grauely in their chaires, and spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though senators they faw their enemies come armed against them, neither changed countenance nor colour at founts all, but leaned fortly on their staues they had in their hands, seeming to be nothing afraid nor aplace of place of bashed, but looked one vpon another, he maruellously wondred at it. This their so strange maner at the first did so dampe the GAV LBS, that for a space they stood still, and were in doubt to come neare to touch them, fearing left they had bene fome gods: vntill fuch time as one of them went boldly vnto Marcus Papyrius, & laid his hand faire and loftly vpon his long beard. But Papyrius gaue him such a rap on his pate with his staffe, that he made y bloud run about his ears. This barbarous beaft was in such a rage with the blow, that he drew out his sword and slue him. The other fouldiers also killed all the rest afterwards and so the GAV LES continued many day spoiling and facking all things they found in the houses, and in the end did set them all on fire, & deftroyed them enery one, for despite of those that kept the fort of the Capitoll, and would not yeeld vpon their fummons, but valiantly repulfed them whe they fealed the wals. For this caufe they razed the whole city, and put all to the fword that came in their hands, yong and old, man, The dip of woman and child. Now this fiege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very floutly, victuals began to grow feant in the campe of the GAVLES, infomuch as they were dri- Gaules. uen of force to feeke it abroad without the city. Hercupon they denided themselues, whereof some remained still with the King at the siege of the Capitoll: and the rest went a forraging and spoiling all the champion countrie and villages thereabouts, scattered as it were by bands and companies, some here some there, searing nothing, nor passing upon watch or ward, they lived in such security of their victory. Howbeit the greatest company amongst them, went by fortune towards the city of Arden where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a prinate man, medling with no drden. matters of state from the time of his exile, vntill that present time. But then he began not to bethink himselfe as a man that was in safetic, and might have escaped the hands of his enemics, but rather fought to deuise and find out all the meanes he could to subdue them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon, confidering that the inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to fet vpon them, although faint hearted and cowardly, by reason of the slouth and negligence of their gouernours and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the wars: he began to cast out these words among the yong men: That they should not thinke the Romaines missor-words with the words with the words with the same words with the words w tune fell vponthem, through the valiantnesse of the GAVLES, northat their calamity (who had the Ardeas refused good counsell) had hapned vito them by any work or act of the Gavles, having done the Ros nothing for their part to make them carry away y victory: but that they should think it was no maines. other thing, but Fortune alone, that would needs shew her power. Therefore, that it were now a notable and honourable enterprise (although somewhat dangerous) to drive these strangers and barbarous people out of their country: confidering that the only end of their victory was, but to destroy and consume as fire, al that fell into their hands. Wherfore if they would but only takea good lufty heart and courage vnto them, he would with opportunity and space affure them the victory without any dense. The vote and a second land, and the delast the delast the delast. them the victory without any danger. The yong men were pleased with these words of life and to take comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter also vnto the magistrates and counsellers: and having drawne them by perswasion vnto this enterpise, he armed all that were of age to Gaules. cary armour, and would not suffer a man to go out of the city, for feare left the enemies (which were not farre off)should have intelligence of the same. Now after the GAVLES had run over al the champion country, & were loden with al forts of spoiles, they did encampe themselves negligently in open fields, and neuer charged watch nor ward; but having their full carriage of wine laid them down to fleepe, & made no noise at all in their campe. Camillus being advertised therof by his seueralskouts, caused the Andeans with as litle noise as might be, forthwith to go out into the fields: and having marched somewhat roundly the distance betweene the city and the campe of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his fouldiers make great flouts and cries, and the trumpets to be founded on every fide, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the loud noise they made, could hardly be made to wake they were so deadly drunk. Yetthere were some notwithstanding, that for seare to be taken tardy, did bustle vp at this sudden noise: and coming to themselves, fell to their weapons to resist Camillus, which were flaine by and by. The rest and the greatest number of them lay here and there scattered in the midst of the field without any weapon dead asleepe, starke drunk with wine, and were put to the fword and neuer strake stroke. Those that fled out of the campet hat night (which were but few in number) were ouerthrowne also the next day, by the horsemen that followed and killed them, as they tooke them stragling here and there in the fields. The bruite of this victory was blowne abroad incontinently through all the towns & villages therabouts, which caused many yong men to come and ionne themselues to Camellus: but specially the Romaines desired the fame, that had faued themselues in the city of VEIES, after the battell lost at ALLIA, who made their mones among themselues there, saying: O gods, what a Captaine hath Fortune taken from the city of Rome? What honour hath the city of Ardea by the valiantnesse & worthy deeds of Camillus: and in the meane scason his naturall city that brought him forth, is now lost and vtterly destroyed? We, for lack of a captaine to leade vs, are shut vp here within others wals, & do nothing but fuffer ITALY in the meane space to go to ruine and vtter destruction before our eyes. Why then do we not fend to the Ande Ande for our Captaines or why do we not arme our felues to go vnto him? For he is now no more a banished man, nor we poore citizens: since our city is possessed with the foraine power of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counfel, & fent vnto Camillus to befeech him to be their captaine & leade them. Bur he made answer, he would in no case consent vnto it, vnlesse they that were besieged in the Capitoll had lawfully first confirmed it by their voices. For those (faid he) so long as they remaine within the city, do represent the state & body therof. Therfore if they comanded him to take this charge vpo him, he would most willingly obey the if otherwise they misliked of it, that then he would not meddle against their goodwils & commandement. They having received this answer, there was not a Romaine amongst the, but greatly honoured & extolled the wiscome & instice of camillus. But now they knew not how to make them priny vnto it, that were befieged in the Capitoll: for they saw no possibility to conucy a messenger to the: considering the enemies were lords of the Ponting Co- city, and laid fiege to it. How beit there was one Pontins Cominius among the yong men (a man of a meane house, but yet desirous of honor and glory) that offered himself very willingly to venter to get in it he could. So he took no letters to cary to them that were befreged, for feare lest they Capitoll at might be intercepted, and so they should discouer camillus intention: but putting on an ill fauored gown vpon him, he conueyed certain peeces of corke vnder it and trauelling at noone daies kept on his way without feare vntill he came to Rom B, bringing darke night with him. And because he could not passe by the bridge, for that y barbarous people kept watch vpo it, he wrapped such clothesas he had about his necke (which were not many nor heavy) & tooke the river, & fwimming with these corkes he had brought, at the length he got ouer to the other side where the city flood. The taking vp those lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not, seeing fire, & hearing noise in other places, he went to the gate Carmetal, where he found more silence then in other places: on the which side also, the hil of the Capitol was more steepe & vpright, by reason of the great rocks that were hard to clime vp vpon. But he digged and crept vp so long amongst the, that he got vp with great pain vnto the wal of the fortres, on the which fide also the enemy kept no watch: and faluting the watch of the Capitol, he told them what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them, & brought him to the magistrats that ruled then who caused the Senate to affemble prefently, to whom he told the newes of Camillus victory, which they had not heard of before: & therwith also he did declare vnto the, y determinatio of the Romaine fouldiers that were abroad, which was, to make Camillus their captain & generall, and did perswade them also to grant him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad whom the citizes gaue their consents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitol, consulted thereupon amongst themselues, and so did chuse Camillus Dictator, & returned the messenger Pontius Cominius backe againe the felfe same way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe was like vnto his coming thither: for the enemies neuer faw him. And fo he brought report to them that were abroad, of the Senates decree & consent, wherof they were al maruellous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of generall vpon him, & found there were twenty thou-fand good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further aide also of their allies & confederates, and prepared daily to go and fet vpon the enemies. So was Camillus chofen now Dittator the second time, and went into the city of VETES where he spake with the ROMAINE fouldier that were there, and leauied agreat number of the allies besides, to go fight with the enemies as fooneas he could. But whileft Camillus was thus a preparing, certaine of the barbarous people in Rome, walking out by chance on that fide of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: fpied in divers places the prints of his fecte and hands, as he had griped and gotten hold, ftill digging to get vp, and faw the weeds and herbes also growing vpon the rockes, and the earth in like maner flat troden downe. Whereupon they went prefently vnto the king to let him understand the same: who forthwith came to view the place. And having confidered it well, he did nothing at that time: but when darke night was come, he called a company of the lightest GAVLEs together, and that vsed most to dig in mountaines, and said vnto them: Our enemies themselves do show vs the way how to take them, which we could not have found out but by themselues. For they having gone vp before vs. do give vs easily to vnderstand it is no impossible thing for vs to clime vp also. Wherefore we were vtterly shamed having already begun well, if we should faile also to end well: and to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to clime up to the height thereof, much leffe is it hard for many to get up one after another, to that one do helpe another. Therfore Sirs, I affure you, those that do take paines to get vp, shall be honourably rewarded according to their just defert. When the King had spoken these words vnto the Gavis, they fell to it lustily enery man to The Gaules get vp:and about midnight, they began many of them to dig, and make steps vp to the rocke one the capital after another, as foftly as could possibly, with catching hold the best they could, by the hanging inthe night of the rocke, which they found very steepe, but neuerthelesse casier to clime, then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the formost of them being come to the top of the rock, were now ready to take the wall, and to fet vpon the watch that flept: for there was neither man nor dog that heard the. It chanced then there were holy geefe kept in the temple of Iuno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: but victuals being very straight and scant at that time euen to find the men, the poore geese were so hard handled and so litle regarded, that they were in maner starued for lacke of meate. This fowle indeed naturally is very quick of hearing, and so is she also very fearful by nature: and being in maner famished with their hard allowance they were so much the more waking and easier to be afraid. Vpon this occasion therefore, they heard the coming of the GAVLES, and also began to run vp and downe and cry for feare : with Theboh which noise they did wake those that were within the castle. The GAVIES being bewrayed by these foolish geese, left their stealing upon them, and came in with all the open noise & terrour they could. The Romaine s hearing this larum, every man tooke such weapon as came first to his hand, and they ran suddenly to rescue that place from whence they vnderstood the noise:among those, the formost man of all, was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Consul, who had a lufty body, and as flout a heart. His hap being to meet with two of the GAVLEs together, as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knock him on the head, he preuented him, & strake off his hand with his fword, and clapt his target on the others face fo fiercely, that he threw him backeward from the downe the rocke; and coming afterwards vnto the wall with others that ran thither with him, capitol. he repulfed therest of the GAVLES that were gotten vp, who were not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMAINE's having escaped this danger, the next morning they threw the captaine downe the rocks from the castle, who had charge of the watch the night before:and gaue Manlius in recompence of the good service he had done, a more honourable then profitable reward, which was this: Euery, man of them gave him halfe a pound of the countrey wheat, which they call Far, and the fourth part of the measure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile: and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of every man by the day. After this repulse, the GAV LES began to be discouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them, and durst no more forage abroad in the fields for feare of Camillus and parily also for that the plague came amongst them, being lodged amongst heapes of dead bodies, lying in cue- The Gaules. ry placeaboue ground without burial, and amongst burnt houses destroyed, where the ashes being blowne very high by the wind and vehemency of heat, did giue a drie piercing aire, that did maruelloufly poyfon their bodies when he was a Reme. maruellously poyson their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greatest cause of all their mischiese was, the change of their wonted diet. Who coming out of a fresh country, where there were excellent pleasant places to retire vnto, to avoid the discommodity of the parching heat of the former, were now in a naughty plaine country for them to remaine in. in the latter season of the yere. All these things together did heape diseases upon the besides the long continuance of the fiege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the feuenth moneth) by reason wherof there grew a maruellous death in their campe, through the great numbers of the that died daily, and lay vnburied. But notwithstanding al the death and trouble of the GAVLES. the poore befreged ROMAINS were nothing holpen the more, the famine did ftill grow fo fast vpon them. And because they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were growne almost vnto 2 despaire; and send vnto him they could not, the GAVLES kept so straight watch you them in the city. Whereupo both parties finding themselues in hard state, first the watch of either side began to cast out words of peace amongst themselves: and afterwards by consent of the heads. Sulpi. Tribune of the fouldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the ROMAINES should pay athousand pound weight of gold, and that the GAVLES should incontinently after the receipt of the same, depart out of their city, & all their territories. This decree being passed by oath from both, the gold was brought. And when it came to be weyed, the GAVLEs at the first privily began to deale falsly with them: but afterwards they openly staved the ballance, and would not let them wey no more, whereat the ROMAINE s began to be angry with them. Then Brennus, in scorne and mockerie to despite them more, pluckt off his sword. girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was weyed. Sulpitius feeing that, asked him what he meant by it. Brennus answered him: What can it fignifie else, but forrow to the vanquished? This word cuer after ran as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouths. Some of the ROMAINES tooke this vile part of theirs in fuch fcorn, that they wold needs take the gold from them againe by force, and so returne into their hold, to abide the siege still, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it best with patience to put up this scorne of theirs, and not to thinke it was a shame to pay more then they had promised but onely to pay it by compulsion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to think it rather necessary, then honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aswell amongst themselues, as with the GAVLES, Camillus came to Rome gates with his army, and vnderstanding all what had passed betweene them, he commanded the rest of the army to march faire and softly after him in good order, and he in the meane feason with the best choise men he had, went before with all speed. Affoone as the other ROMAINE: within the city had spied him, they shouted out for ioy, and received him every one with great reverence, without any more words, as their foueraigne cap. taine and prince, who had power over them all. And Camillus taking the gold out of the scales. gaue it vnto his men, and commanded the GAVLES presently to take vp their scales, and to get them going: for, faith he, It is not the ROMAINE's maner to keepe their countrey with gold, but with the fword. Then Brennus began to be hot, and told him, it was not honourably done of him, to breake the accord that had passed between them before by oath. Whereupon Camillus froutly answered him againe, that accord was of no validity: for he being created Distator before, all other officers & magistrates whatsoeuer, and their acts, by his election were made of no authority. And seeing therefore they had dealt with men that had no power of themselues to accord to any matter, they were to speake to him, if they required ought: for he alone had absolute authority to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or else to punish them, and make their bodies answer the dammages and losse his country had by them sustained. These words made Brennus mad as a march hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their fwords of all fides, and laid luftily one at another as they could, within the houses, and in open streets, where they could fet no battel in order. But Brennus suddenly remembring himself, that it was no cuen match for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had lost many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of Rome with all his army, and went to encampe himself about a threescore furlongs from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the city of the GARIANS. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, and shewed at his camp by the breake of day. The Romain Es hauing taken heart againe vnto them, did luftily give them battell: the same continued long, very cruell and doubtfull, vntill the GAVLEs at the length were ouerthrown, & their campetaken with great flaughter. As for those that did escape the fury of the battell, they were killed, some by the Romaines selues. who hotly followed the chase after the battell broken the residue of them, and the greatest part, were flaine by those of the cities & villages nere abouts, that did set vpon them as they fled scatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the city of Rome strangely againe recovered that was before strangely won and lost, after it had continued seuen moneths in the hands of the barbarous people. For they entred Rome about the fifteenth day of July; and they were driven out againe, about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camillus triumphed as beseemed of the him, and as one that had faued and deliuered his country out of the hands of their enemies, and fet Ком в againe at liberty. Those that had bene abroad all y time of this siege, came into Rome triumphed againe, following his triumphing chariot: and those that had bene besieged within the Capitoll of the (looking for no other but to haue died by famine) went and presented themselues before him. and each one embraced other, in weeping wife for ioy. The priefts & ministers of the temples alfo, prefented their holy iewels, whole and vndefaced, which fome of them had buried in the ground within the city felfe; and other some had carried away with them, when they fled out of Rome. All these the people did as gladly see, as if the gods themselves had returned home again into their city. After they had facrificed vnto the gods, and rendred them most humble thankes, and had purged their city, as they had bene taught by men experienced in those matters for satisfaction of the gods, Camillus began againe to build vp the temples that were there before, hard by the which he built another new one also to the god Ains Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Caditius heard the voice warne him of the coming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the priefts great paine and trauell, the fituations of these temples were with much ado found out againe. But when they were to build againe all the rest of the city, that was wholy burnt and destroyed to the ground, the people had no mind to it, but ener shrinked backeto put any hand to the worke, for that they lacked all things necessarie to begin the same. Furthermore, weighing their late and long fustained trouble and miseries, they were fitter to take their ease and rest, then to begin new labour and toyle, to kill their hearts and bodies altogether. For neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reach to the charge of it. Wherefore disposing their minds to dwell in the city of VEIES, which remained whole, vntouched, and furnished of all things to receive them, they delivered to the pratting Orators (whose The base tongues did neuer ceasse to speake placentia to the people) trim occasion to set this matter abeaded Oracours broach. So they gaue good care, and were willing to heare certaine feditious words spoken a- Hir the peo. gainst Camillus, which were these: That for his private ambition he would deprive them of a pie so in. city well furnished already, and would against their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houses, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, that he would make them to raise vp milin. againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the people might call him, not onely Captaine and Generall of the Romaines, but the founder of Rome alfo, and so drowne Romulus honourable titlethereof. The Senate confidering of this matter, and fearing fome tumult among the people, they would not suffer Camillus to leaue the Dictatorship before the end of the yeare, notwithstanding no man cuer enjoyed that office aboue fixe moneths. Then Camillus for Popprore his part did much indeuour himselse, to comfort and appealethe people, praying them all he sed could to tarie and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their auncestours, and pur them in mind also of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and fanctified by King Numa, or by the peo-Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongst many other tokens drawne out of holy and dinine things, he forgat notto bring for example, the head of a man found new and fresh, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as if that place by fatall destinic had bene once chosen to be the Rome and head and chiefe of all ITALY. And moreouer, that the holy fire of the goddesse Vesta (which fince the wars had bin kindled againe by the holy Vestal Nuns) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did for fake their naturall city; befides the great shame and dishonor it would be vnto them, to see it inhabited in time to come by vnknowne strangers, or else to be left a common field and pasture, for beasts and cattell to graze in: Such forrowfull examples and griefes, the honest naturall borne citizens, did euer blow into the peoples eares, aswell prinarly as openly. The people agains to the contrary, did make their hearts to yerne for pitie, when they laid before their eyes their penury & pouerty they fultained: and befought them also not to enforce them to gather and iowne together againe the broken pecces of a spoiled city (as of a shipwrack that had cast them naked into the sea, having only saued bare life & persons) since that they had another city neare at hand and readie to receive them. So Camillus counsell was, that the Senate should confult vpon this matter, & deliuer their absolute opinion herein; which was done. And in this counsell, he himselfe brought forth many probable reasons, why they should not leave in any case, the place of their naturall birth and countrey; and so did many other Senatours in like case, fauouring that opinion. Last of all, after these perswasions, he commanded Lucius Lueretius (whose manner was to speake first in such assemblies) that he should stand up and deliner his opinion, and that the rest also in order as they fate, should say their minds. So every mankeeping filence as Lacretius was readie to speake, at the present time there passed by their councell house, a captaine with his band that warded that day, who spake aloud to his ensigne bearer that went formost to stay and set downe his ensigne there for faid he, here is a very good place for vs to dwell in. These words being heard vp into the Senate house, euen as they stood all in a doubt & maze what would be the refolution of this matter, Lucretius began to say, that he most humbly thanked the gods and allowed of the captaines judgement, and so every one of the rest in their order, faid as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull change and alteration of mind fodainly among the common people: for every man did perswade and encourage his fellow lively to put his hand to this work. Infomuch as tarying for no division or appointing out of streets. nor setting out every man his place he should build in, they fell to work of all hands, every one chusing that place he liked best, & was most commodious for their building, without anyother order or division amongst them. Wherupon, they running to this building on a head, the streets were confused on heaps together, and their houses all built out of order & vniformity. For the report goeth, that the whole city (aswell common as private buildings) was built vp new againe in a yeare. But the surveiors, to whom Camillus had given charge to find out all the holy places where the temples had bene ouerthrowne, as they went about mount Palatine, they came by chance to the place, where the chappel of Mars had flood, which the GAVLE's had wholy burnt and deftroyed as they had done all the reft. They making cleane the place, and furueying energy corner, did find by chance Romalus augures crooked ftaffe hidden under a great mount of afhes. This staffe is crooked at one of the ends, & they call it Litus, which soothsayers do vseto quar-This state is crooked at one of the ends, at they can it Lines, which too that yet at over to quarwhole after ter out the regions of the element, when they will be hold the flying of birds to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this art, did vie this staffe: and after he was taken away from all mens fights, the priefts took it, and kept it as a holy relique, suffering no creature to lav hands on it. Now when they found this staffe whole & vnbroke, where al things else were costimed and perished by fire, they were in a maruellous ioy thereat: for they interpreted this to be a figne of the euerlasting continuance of the city of Rome. But before they could make an end of all their building, there grew a new war againe vpon them. For at one very instant, all the Æ-QVES, the Volsces, and the LATINES, entred with all their might & maine into the territories of the Romaines. The Thyscane's also went then and besieged Sytrium, that was in league and amity with the Romains. The Tribuni militares got them straight to the field with their army, & encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES befieged them fo straightly, that their army stood in great danger to be ouerthrowne, & they were driven to send to Rou E for a new fupply. Therupon the ROMAINES did choose Camillus Distator againe the third time. The occasion of this war is reported two maner of waies: whereof I will declare the first, which I do concciue to be but a tale. They fay the LATINES fent vnto the ROMAINES, to demand some of their free maides in mariage; which they did either to make a quarrell of war, or elfe as defirous indeed to ioyne both the peoples againe by new mariages. The Romaines were amazed very much at this, and fore troubled, as not knowing how to answer them, they were so a fraid of wars. For they were yet scant new setled at home, and dreaded much lest this demand of their daughters, was but a fummons made to give them hostages, which they finely cloaked vnder the name of alliace in mariage. Some fay that there was at that time a bond maid called Tutola, or as some say, Philotis, that went vnto the Senat, & counselled them they should send her away with fome other faire maide flaues, dreffed up like gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuice, and chose such a number of bond maids as she defired to haue, and trimming them up in fine apparell, begawded with chaines of gold and iewels, they sent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not far from the city. When night was come, the other maids hid their enemies fwords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you wil) did clime vp to the top of a wild figtree, from which she shewed a burning torch vnto the Romains, hauing made shift to hang somwhat behind her, to keepe the light from sight of the enemies. For this fignall the Senate of Rome had fecretly appointed herto fet vp, which was the cause that the iffuing

issuing out of the souldiers, being commanded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being pressed by their captains, they called one another, & there was great ado to put thế in order of battel. Thus they went to take their enemies fleeping, who nothing mistrusting Reme delithe same, were slaine the most part of them within their campe. This was done on the fift day of wered from the moneth called then Quintilis, and now is named Iuly: at which time they do yet celebrate a Thiolathe certain feast in remembrance of that act. For first of al, going out of y city, they cal aloud many bondmaids. of their fellowes names which are most common: as Cains, Marcus, and Lucius, shewing thereby how one of them called another after that fort, as they went in great hafte out of the city. Afterwardsall the maid-fernants of the city being trimly apparelled, goe playing vp and downe the The maides towne, pleasantly iesting with those they meet: and in the end they make as though they fought together, in token that they did helpethe Royal Var at they rive as the rive as they rive as they rive as they rive as they rive as the rive as they together, in token that they did helpe the Romaines at that time to destroy y Latines. Then pratine. they are feasted, sitting under bowers made with wild sigtree boughes: and this feast is called None Capratina, by reason of the wild figge tree (as some thinke) from the top whereof, the bond maid shewed to the Romaines the burning torch. For the Romains call the wild figgetree, Caprificus. Other say, that all these things are done and spoken in remembrance of the mischance that happened vnto Romulus, whiche was taken out of their fight, the same day without the gates of the city, at which time there arose a sodain mist & dark cloud. Or as some other say, that then was the eclipse of the Sun: and they hold opinion that the day was named None Capratine, because Capra in the Romaine tongue, signifieth a goate. Romulus vanished out of mens sights, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neare vnto the place which is called goat marsh, as we have mentioned more at large in his life. The fecond occasion and beginning of this war(according to the opinion of most writers) was, that Camillus being chosen Distator the third time, and knowing that the Trib, militares with their army were straightly besieged by the LATINES and Volsces, he was enforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priviledged from further service inwars. And having fetched a great compasse about mount Martian, because he would not be seen of his enemies, he came to lodge his camp behind them, where he raised fires, tomake the Romaines know that were befieged, that he was come: which as foone as they perceiued, they tooke to them courage againe, and determined to fight. But the LATINES and Volsces, kept within their camp, & did intrench & fortifie themselues with a wall of wood, which they laid acrosse, because they saw they were befet both before and behind and determined to tarie the reliefe of a new supply, as well of their own, as of some further aide besides from the THVSCANS: which thing Camillus perceiuing, and fearing lest they should serue him, as he had already handled them, by compaffing of him againe behind, he thought it necessarie to preuent this. So considering the inclosure and fortification of their camp was all of wood, and that enery morning commonly, there came a great wind from the fide of the mountaines, he made camillus provision of a number of fire brands. And leading out his army into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one part of them to give charge vpon the enemies on the one fide, with great lating and houring and h noise and shouting and he with the other part determined to raise fire on the contrary side, from Police. whence the wind should come, looking for oportunity to do the same. When he saw the Sunne vp, and the wind beginning to whiftle, blowing a good gale from the fide of the hils, & that the skirmish was begun on the other side: then he gaue a signall vnto the company he led with him, to set vpon the enemies, and made them throw into the inclosure of their campe, diverse pots and darts with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this inclosure of wood, and trees laid ouerthwart, did raise straight an exceeding great stame in the aire, and still got way inwards into the LATINES campe. Whereupon the LATINES being unprovided of present remedy to quench the flame, and feeing their camp a fire al about their eares, they gathered themfeluestogether at the first in a very small roome. Neuerthelesse, they were enforced in the end to getthem into the field, and there they found their enemies ready armed, and in battell ray. So as few of those escaped that came into the field, and their fellowes that remained within their camillas campe, were burnt to death with fire, vntill the Romains themselves came to quench it for fusther greedinesse of their spoile & goods. When all this was done, Camillus left his son in the camp, to keepe the prisoners and spoiles: & he himself, with the rest of the armie, went to inuade his enemies country, where he took the city of AQVES. Then after he had ouercome the Volsces, he camillus led his army presently from thence vnto the city of Svrrivm. For he had not yet heard of their missortile. Therefore he had a him self-resident heard of their side in the heard of the heard of their side in the heard of t misfortue. Therfore he hasted himself to aid the because he thought they were yet besieged by Agus.

the THYSCANS, But fuch was their hard fortune, that they had already yeelded up their city by composition, and saued no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backes. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the way as they were wandring abroad. lamenting their misery with their wines and litle yong children: whose misery went to the very heart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, when he saw the Ro-MAINES weepe for pitic alfo, to fee the mone that these vnfortunate people made vnto him,& that it grieued them heartily to behold their great mischance:he determined with himselfe not to deferre reuenge, but presently to go the selfe same day before the city of Sytriva, imagining that he should find the THYSCANS out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good cheere, because they had newly taken a wealthy rich city, where they had left neuer an enemy in the same to hurt them, neither feared any abroade to come neare to affault them. And in deed it fell out rightly as he geffed. For he had not only paffed through the territories of the citie, without any intelligence given to the enemies within the same: but he was come to the very gates, and had taken the walles before they heard any thing of his coming by reason they neither kept watch nor ward, but were dispersed abroad in the city, in every house, cating and drinking drunke together. Infomuch as when they knew their enemies were already within the city, they were so full fraught with meate and wine, that the most of their wits serned them not fo much as to flie, but taried vntill they were flaine or taken, like beafts in the houses. Thus was the city of Syrrivm twife taken in one day. And it chanced that those which had won it, loft it:and those which had lost it, recourred it againe by Camillus meanes; who deserued both the honour and entrie of triumph into Rome: the which wan him no lefte good will and glory, then the two first before had done praise, and gotten fame. For euch his greatest enemies that most spited and enuied his former noble acts, alcribing them rather to fortune that fauoured him, then to his valiant neffe or worthines, were forced now by this deed of his to confesse, that his wisdome and valiantnesse deserved praise and commendation to the skies. Camillus of all his enemies had one most bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the first man that gaue the GAVLES the repulse that night they had entred the walles of the Capitoll, and had thought to haue taken it: whereupon they gaue him the furname of Capitolinus. He aspiring to be the chiefe of the city, and finding no direct way to exceed the glory of Camillus, took the broad high way of them that practife tyranny. For he began to flatter the common people, and specially those that were indebted; he tooke you him to defend their causes, and pleaded their case at the barre against their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debters out of the creditours hands, and caried them away by force, that for lacke of ability to pay were by rigour of the law condemned to be bondflaues. But by this practife, in short time he got him amaruellous number of fuch needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honest citizens were afraid of the infolent parts they played, and of the continuall troubles & tumults they daily flirred vp in the market place. Therefore suspecting the worst in this case, they did chuse Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who caused the said Manlius immediatly to be apprehended, and comelapsingri- mitted him to prison. Whereupon the people began to change their apparell: which they were neuer wont to do but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing left fome commotion would rife hereupon, they did fet him at liberty againe. He being thus out of prison, was no whit the better, nor wifer thereby, but did ftill ftirre vp the commons, more boldly and feditiously then before. Then was Camillus chosen againe Tribunus militaris, and Mantius was accused in his time of office. But when the matter came to pleading, the fight of the Capitoll troubled his accusers much. For the very place it selfe where Manlius had repulsed the GAVLES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was eafily feene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing; and he himfelfe pointing with his hand, shewed the place vnto the gods, and weeping tenderly, he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fight for their safetie. This did moue the judges hearts to pitic, so as they knew not what to do, but many times they did put ouer the hearing of his case vnto another day, and neither would they give judgement, knowing he was condicted by manifelt proofes; neither could they vie the federity of the law vpon him, because the place of his so notable good service was euer still before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cause of delay of instice, did make the place of judgement to be remound without the cry, into a place called the wood Petelian, from whence they could not fee the Capitoll. And there the accusers gave apparent evidence against him: and the judges confidering confidering all his wicked practifes, conceined a inflicante to punish him, as he had deferred. So they gave sentence of death against him:that he should be caried to the mount Capitol, & there to be throwne downe headlong the rockes thereof. Thus, one and the felfe place was a memory Manlim both of his notable good fertice, and also of his miserable and vnfortunate end. Besides all Capitolium this, they razed his house, and built in the same place a temple to the goddesse they call Moneta: and made a law also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the mount Capitol. Camillus after this, being called again to take the office of tribunus militaris the fixt tinge. he thought to excuse himself, aswel for that he saw he was wel stept in yeares, as also for that he feared Fortunes spite, or some mishap after he had obtained such glory for his noble actes and feruice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sicknesse; which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allow no excuse by any meanes, but cried out, they did not defire he should fight on foote nor on horseback, but that he should only give counsell, and command: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Frurius, against their enemies the PRENESTINES, & the Volsces, who ionning together, did inuade the confines of the Romaines friends. So he led his army out immediatly to the field, and camped as neere the enemie as he could: being minded for his part to draw the wars out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if need required) whe he had recoursed strength. But Frurius cotrarily counting glory, was wholy bent to hazard the battell, what soeuer perill came of it: and to this end he stirred vp and incouraged the Captaines of euery prinat band. Wherfore Camillus fearing lest they should think, for ill wil he bare the yong men, that he went about to hinder and take away the meane to win their honor, and to do some noble act: suffered Frurius against his will to put his men in order of battel, and he in the meane scason by reason of his sicknesse, remained with a few about him in the campe. So went Lucius vpon a head to present battell to the enemie, and so was he as headily also overthrowne. But Camillus hearing the Romaine's were overthrowne, fick as he was vpon his bed, got vp.& taking his houshold servants with him, he went in haste to the gates of the campe, and passed through those that fled, vntill he came to meete with the enemies that had them in chase. The Polices, and ROMAINES seeing this that were already entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they saw him, they gathered together and put themselues againe in array before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their Captain. So their enemies hereupon stayed their chasing, and would pursue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his army into the field, gaue them battell, and wanne the Camillus field of them by plaine force: and following the victory hard, he entred amongst them that fled into their camp pelmell, or hand ouer head, and flue the most part of them euen there. After this Prangines victory, he was aductifed how the THVSCANS had taken the city of SVTRIVM, and had put to and voltees. the fword all the inhabitants of the fame, which were ROMAINE citizens. Whereupon he fent to Rour the greatest part of his army, and keeping with him the lightest and lustiest men, went & gaue affault vnto the THVSCANES, that now were harbored in the city of SVTRIVM. Which Comillus when he had won again, he flue part of them, & the other faued themselues by flight. After this, The state of he returned to Rome with an exceeding spoile, confirming by experience, the wisedome of the at Sustrium ROMAINS, who did not feare the age nor ficknesse of a good captaine that was expert and valiant, but had chosen him against his will, though he was both old and sicke and preferred him far before the yonger and luftier that made sute to have the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THVSCVLANIANS were revolted, they fent Camillus thither again, willing him of fine other companions to take out one he liked best, energy of the which desired to be chosen, fine against and made their fute vnto him for the same. But he refusing al other, did chuse againe Lucius Frue the Thusturius beyond all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needes would against his will ha- lan'ans, zard battell, in which he was ouerthrowne. Howbeit Camillus, having a desire (as I thinke) to hide his fault and shame he had received, did of courtesse preferre him before all other. Now the Thys cylanians hearing of Camillus coming against them, subtilly sought to colour the Theoretical fault they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the Thusenthe fields, some to plough, other to keepe the beasts, as if they had bene in best peace: and landam. did set the gates of the city wide open, sent their children openly to schoole, their artificers wrought their occupations in their shops, the men of behaviour and honest citizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, and the officers and governours of the city went vp and downe to every house, commanding them to prepare lodgings for the Romains, as if they had stood in no feare at al, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit al these fine setches could not make Camillus beleeve, but that they had intent to rebell against the ROMAINES! Vet they made Camillus pitie them, seeing they repented them of that they had determined to do. So he commanded them to go to Rome to the Senate, to craue pardon for their fault: and he himfelfe did helpe them, not only to purge their city of any intent of rebellion, but also to get them the priviledge and freedome of Rome. And these be the chiefest acts Camillus did in the sixttime Great fedi- of his Tribuneship. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great fedition in the city, betweene the common people and the Senate. For he would in any case that of the two Consuls, which were chosen yearely, the one of them should be a commoner, and not that both of them should be of the ancient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were chosen, but the election of the Confuls, the people staied: so that the common-wealth went to decay, and declined to greater troubles, then euer it did before, for lacke of gouernement. But to suppresse this. the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was foreagainst his will, because it misliked the people much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing ferued him in many wars and battels, might boldly and truly fay vnto him: that he had done more notable acts by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace. Yet was he created Dictator in despite, to rule the people, and of enuie in the noble mentowards them. This necessity did vrge him, either by force to suppresse the people, if he were the stronger in this diffention: or else that he himselse should be suppressed, if he became the weaker. C. millus notwithstanding, preparing to preuent this mischiefe, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the paffing of their law by voices of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations set vpon posts, that the same very day he would muster the people: & all was but to draw them from the market place into the field of Mars, & did fet great penalties vpon those that should be lacking at the musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrary part did withstand his threats, & sware they would condemne Camillus self in fiftie thousand Drachmas of silver, if he did not let the people alone, but would goe about to disturb the forgining their voices to such a law as they liked of. Camillus perceiving this, & fearing to be condemned and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being now an old man, & one that had done so many great & notable acts, or els for that he thought himself not strong enough to withstand the force of the people: he kept his house that day, fay. ning himfelfe to be fick, and certaine other dayes following, and in the end he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the same Licinius Stoli Generall of the horsemen, that was the author and furtherer of all this sedition : and besides did fuffer him to preferre another law, and to passe it by voices of the people, that aboue all other lawes, did most trouble the Patricians. Which law did forbid any citizen of Rome, to haue, or occupy aboue fine hundred ingera, which amount to 330 acres & a halfe, 12 . pole, and 121 . parts Siolo made of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloft, and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despite enso; ing of of the Senat established this law. Howbeit shortly after it was found out, that himself had more number of acres then his owne law permitted: by reason whereof, he received the iust punish firit offenment of his own deuised forfeiture. Yet the most weighty matter of al this dissention that began first, & most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Consuls, remained still vadetermined. But while these matters were thus in talk, the ROMAINES had certaine intelligence, The Gaules how the GAVLES were departed once againe from the Adriaticke sea, and were coming with come againe great power straight vnto Rom E:vpo report of which news, the wars followed immediatly. For the GAVLES destroyed the champion countrey as they went: and the poore country menthat chosen Dic. could not recouer Rome, were scattered here and there amongst the mountaines. The scarces fift time. this did somewhat appease the dissention. The people then assembling with the Senate, and the baser sort with the noble, did all with one voice and assent chuse Camillus Dielater the fifttime his fooddiers He was now a very old man, lacking litle of fourefcore yeares: but neuertheleffe, confidering the necessity and present danger, without framing any excuse, or starting as he had before, hevndertooke the charge. Now that he had taken it vpon him, he presently leanied men, & prepared his army. And knowing very well how the fierceneffe of these barbarous GAVLES confisted in fight with downe right blowes with their fwords, with which they would strike off heads and should ders ofmen at a blow, mangling them like butchers, without any art or skill of fight: hee raused yron fallets, & morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothly wrought on the outfide as could be, that their fwords lighting on them, should either slide off, or breake. Moreoner, he caused their shields to have barres made about them of copper, because the wood selfe was not able to abide their blowes. Furthermore, he did teach his fouldiers to cary long lauelins or punchion staues, wherewith they might wound their enemies lifting vp their swords to strike them. Now when the GAVLES were come neare Rome, having pitched their campe ypon the river of Anian, and being full loden and stuffed with all kinds of ipoile and booties: then Camil- Aniu & lus brought his army also into the field, and went to lodge on a little hill which was easie to get vpon, where there were many little caues, fo that the most of his army was all hidden and couered, and those that were seemed to be retired thither into those high places for anadnantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder, did fuffer them to come and spoile even to the foot of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept himself quiet in his campe and well fortified: untillsuch time as he spied occasion of aduantage, that the best part of their army were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the fields: and those which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drinking as they vsed carelesly at al houres. Then Camillus sent very early before day, his lightest armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in coming out of their camp, and to let them in any case from putting their men in order of battell: and he in the break of day came downe into the plaine, and did fet his other menbeing well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and lufty fellowes, and were not as the barbarous people thought, few, & fearefull. This at the very first discouraged the hearts of the GAVLES maruellously, because they thought themselves dishonoured, that the Romaines should charge them sirst. Afterwards also Camillus vaunt-guard did set vpon the GAVLES, and that on a sodaine, beforethey had leifure to put themselues in battel, or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chance. In the end also, Camillus came vpon the neckes ofthem, with all his whole force and army together: against whom they ranne notwithstanding, holding vp their naked fwords aloft in their hands. But the Romaines thrusting with their armed Jauelins, received their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby so rebated the edges of their swords (their blades being very sharpe and thinne ground, and of so soft a temper) that they bowed againe, and stood crooked vnreasonably and furthermore, having pierced their shields through with their punching staues, the GAVLE's armes were so clogd and wearied with them, the Romaines plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their fwords and shields, and slying in, closed with the Romaines and caught hold of their iauelins, thinking by plaine force to have wrested them out of their hands. Howbeit they perceiuing then the GAVLES were naked, fell straight to their swords: and so was the slaughter of their first comillus ranks very great. The other fled scatteringly here and there, all about the plaine; because Camil-Ins had caused all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and possessed. Neither egains. did they retire towards their camp, for that it was unfortified, & also knew well inough it would becasily taken. This battel (as they say) was thirteene yeares after their taking of Rome before. Butafter that field, the Romaines courages were good enough against these barbarous GAVLES, whomthey stood in feare of before: thinking the first time they came, that they had not ouercome them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongst them, or through some other strange chance. For they did so feare them at that time, that they made a law, that The Rotheir priests should be exempted from warres, so it were not against the GAVLES. This ouerthrow was y last martiall act Camillus did in the wars. For, the taking of the city of VELITRES, ted prifts was an accident depending vponthis iourney : because they yeelded straight vnto him, without from the firiking any stroke. But the feditionsnesse of the people of Rome about government, and the chusing of the yeare Confuls, was the hardest matter he euer had in hand. For they returning home to Rome strong and of great power, by their late obtained victory, would in any case haue one of the Confuls to be chosen of a commoner, which was directly against their ancient custome. But the Senate stoutly withstood it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authority, which was great then, that they should maintaine and continue their ancient dignity, and prerogative of their nobilitie. But as Camillus was fet in his chaire in the market place, where he heard and dispatched causes, there came a Sergeant to him, fent from the Tribunes of the people, who commanded him to follow him, and therewithal layd violent hands upon him, as he would have caried him away by force. This made such a terrible tumult and vprore, that the like was neuer seene before in the market place. For Camillus friends draue the sergeant backe behind the chaire. The common people cried out againeto the forgeant from beneath, Pull him out of his chaire. This fo amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to say to the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne vp his of fice, but taking those Senators he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept: and there, before he would go into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, and made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would please them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vow and promise (if these tumults and troubles might be pacified) that he would build a temple of Concord. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diversitie of opinions among them: yet in the end, the casiest way did carrie it, and that was, to grant the common peoples desire, that a commoner should be chosen Consull with anoble man. The Dictator having openly published to the people the Senates decree, confirming their desire: the common people were so ioy full, that at that present they let fall all their malice against the Nobility and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house, with great shouts of joy and clapping of hands. The next morning all the people being assembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of Concord should be built at the common-wealths charge (according to the vow Camillus had made) in fuch a place, as it might be seene from the market place self, where all the assemblies for matters of counsell were made. And further, it was ordered that one day more should be added to the feasts of the LATINES: and that from thenceforth they should solemnize foure festivall daies, and should presently make great sacrifices vnto the gods, in every temple of the city, to give them thanks: and in token of ioy they should al weare garlands vpon their heads for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were chosen two Consuls, Marcus Æmilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or comoners. And this was the last ad that ever Camillus did. For the next yeare after the plague was in Rome, and took eaway an infinite number of the people that died, belides many Magistrates and Officers of the city that departed:among whom, Camillus also left his life. Who notwithstanding he had lived a long time, and had ended a reasonable course of life, and was ripe for death: yet the Romaines made more mone and lamentation for his death alone, then for all therest the plague had alreadie

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

ÆSAR feeing in Rome one day certaine rich and wealthy strangers. hauing litle dogs and monkies in their armes, and that they made maruellous much of them, heasked the if the women in their country had no children: wisely reprouing them by this question, for that they bestowed their naturall loue and affection vpon brute beasts, which they should with all kindnesse and loue bestow vpon men. Nature in like case also, having planted in our minds a naturall defire to learne & vnderstand, we are in reason to reproue those that vainly abuse this good defire, fondly disposing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable; and to cast behind them in the meane season things honest and necessary to be learned. For as touching our outward sense, which with passion receiverh impression of the thing it seeth, peraduenture it will be necessary to consider indifferently the thing scene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull vnto him: but fo fareth it not with our vnderstanding, for every man may at his pleasure turne and dispose that to the thing he taketh delight in the reason whereof we must alwayes employ to the best part, and that not only to consider and look vpon the thing, but also to reape the benefit & commodity of the thing we fee. For like as the eye is most delighted with wir abrates the lightest and freshest colors:euen so we must give our minds vnto those sights, which by looking vpon them do draw profit and pleasure vnto vs. For such effects doth vertue bring that cither to heare or reade them, they do print in our hearts an earnest loue & desire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we esteeme, neither are we alwaies disposed to desire to do y things we see wel done: but contrarily oftentimes, whe we like the work, we mislike the workman, as commonly in making these perfumes and purple colours. For both the one and the other do please vs well: but yet we take perfumers & dyers to be men of a meane occupation. Therfore Antisthenes answered one very wisely, that told him Ismenias was an excellent player of the flute: But yet he is a naughty man, said he: otherwise he could not be so cuning at the flute flute flute player. as he is. Euen fo did Philip king of MACEDON fay to his sonne Alexander the Great on a time: that at a certaine feast had fung passing sweetly, and like a master of musicke: Art thou not ashamed son to sing so well: It is enough for a king to bestow his leasure sometimes to heare mufixians fing, & he doth much honor to the Muses to heare the masters of the science otherwhile, when one of them fingeth to excell another. Pericles

Pericles dreame. Tericlet. had a long

And there was neuer any yong gentleman nobly borne, that seeing the image of Inpiter (which is in the city of PISA) defired to become Phidias nor Polycletus, for feeing of Iuno in the city of Ak Gos: northat defired to be Anacresn, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleasure fometime to reade their works. For it followeth not of necessity, that though the work delight, the workman must needs be praised. So in like case, such things do not profit those which behold them, because they do not moue affection in the harts of y beholders to follow them, neither do stir vp affection to resemble them, and much lesse to conforme our selues vnto them. But vertue hath this singular property in all her actions, that she maketh the man that knoweth her, to affect her fo, that straight he liketh all her doings, and desireth to follow those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only defire to have them in possession: but of vertue, we chiefly loue the deeds. Wherfore we are contented to have goods from other men: but good deeds we wold other should have fro vs. For vertue is of this power, that she allureth a mans mind presently to vse her, that wisely considereth of her, and maketh him very desirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderstäding and knowledge of vertuous deeds, which suddenly bringeth vnto him a resolute desire to do the like. And this is the reason, why me thought I should continue still to write on the lives of noble men, and why I made also this tenth booke; in the which are contained the lines of Peri. cles, and Fabius Maximus, who maintained wars against Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many fundry vertues, and specially in curtesse and inflice and for that they could patiently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were maruellous profitable members for their country. But if we have forted them well together, comparing the one with the other you shall easily judge that reade our writings of their liues. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the town of Cholar Gvs, and one of the best and most ancient families of the city of ATHENS, both by his father & mother. For Xantippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of Persia in the iourny of Mygala) maried Agarifte that came of Clifthenes, he who draue out of Athens Pyfiftratus of-spring, & valiantly ouerthrew their tyranny. Afterwards he established lawes, & ordaineda very graue forme of gouernment, to maintaine his citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariste dreamed one night that she was brought to bed of a Lion: and very shortly after she was delivered of Pericles, who was so well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, fauing that his head was somewhat too long and out of proportion to the rest of his body. And this is the only cause why all the statues and images of him almost, are made with a helmet on his head: because the workmen as it should seeme (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the blemish of his deformity. But the Artican Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to say as, headed like an onion. For those of Attica do sometime name that which is ealled in the vulgar tongue Scilla, that is to fay, an onion of Barbarie, Schines. And Cratinus the comicall Poet in his Comedy he intituled Chirones, faid:

Old Saturne he, and dreadfull dire Debate, Begotten have betweene them carnally, This tyrant here, this heavy iolting pate, In court of gods fo termed worthily.

And againe also in that which he nameth Nemesis, speaking of him, he saith:

Come Inpiter come Inpiter, Come iolt head, and come inkeeper. And Teleclides mocking him also, saith in a place: Sometimes he stands amaz'd when he perceiues, That hard it were sufficiently to know,

In what estate his gouernment he leanes, And then will he be seldome seene below, Such heavie heapes within his braines do grow. But yet sometimes out of that monstrous pate, He thundreth fast and threatneth enery state.

And Eupolis in a Comedy which he intituled Demi . being very inquifitiue, and asking particu-

Iarly of euery one of the Oratours (whom he fained were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the last man vnto him, he said:

Truly thou hast now brought vnto vs here that dwell,

The chiefe of all the captaines that come from darkfome hell. And as for musick, the most authors write, that Damon did teach him musicke, of whose name fluidies of (as men say) they should pronounce the first fillable short. Howbeit Aristotle saith, that he was seathers. taught mufick by Pythoclides. Howfocuer it was, it is certain that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderstanding, and subtill in matters of gouernement: for, to hide from the people his sufficiencietherein, he gane it out he was a musitian, and did resort vnto Pericles as a master wrestler or fencer:but he taught him how he should deale in matters of state. Notwithstanding, in the end he could not fo cunningly conney this matter, but the people faw his harping and musicke was only a vizard to his other practife: wherefore they did banish him ATHENS for fine yeares, as a man that builly tooke vpon him to change the state of things, and that fauoured tyranny. And this gaue the comicall Poets matter to play vpon him finely, among which Plate in a Comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him:

O Chiron, tell me firft : art thou indeed the man,

Which did instruct Pericles thus? make answer if thou can. He was sometime also scholer to the Philosopher Zenon, who was borne in the city of ELEA, Zenon Elez and taught naturall Philosophie, as Parmenides did: but his profession was to thwart and contraricall men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his disputation, which were so intricate, that his aduersary replying against him, knew not how to answer him, nor to conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliasius witnesseth in these words:

Zenon was subtill sure, and very eloquent, And craftily could wind a man by way of aroument. If so he were disposed, his cunning to descrie, Or shew the sharpnesse of his wit to practise pelicie.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was most familiar and conversant with him, and did put in him the maiesty and grauity he shewed in all his sayings, and doings, who did sarre excell the common course of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be short, he it was that did fashion his manners, altogether to carie that graue countenance which he did. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Mus, as much to fay; as vnderstanding. Either because they had his fingular wit and capacity in fuch great admiration, being grownero fearch out the cause of naturall things: or that he was the first man, who did ascribe the disposition and governoment of this world, not vnto Fortune or fatall necessitie, but vnto a pure, simple, and vnderstanding mind, which doth separate as the first mouing cause, the substance of such like parts as are medled and compounded of diverse substances, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruellous much of Anaxagoras, who had fully instructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of those specially that worke about in the aire and firmament. For he grew Perider not only to have a great mind and an eloquent tongue, without any affectation, or groffe countrey termes: but to a certaine modest countenance that scantly smiled, very sober in his gate, hauing a kind of found in his voice that he neuer lost nor altered, and was of very honest behauiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that croffed him, and many other fuch like things, as all that faw them in him, and confidered them, could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof, the report goeth, there was a naughtie busie fellow on a time, that a whole day together did nothing but raile vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous words he could vse. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a word againe, dif- Poiles patching in the meane time matters of importance he had in hand, vntill night came, that he patients. went fortly home to his house, shewing no alteration nor semblance of trouble at al, though this lewd varlet followed him at § heeles, with words of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his owndores being dark night, he commanded one of his men to take a torch, and to bring this man home to his house. Yet the Poet Ion faith, that Pericles was a very proud man, and a stately, and that with his grauity and noble mind, there was mingled a certaine scorne and contempt of other: and contrarily, he greatly praiseth the civility, humanity and courtese of Cimon, because he could fashion himselfe to all companies. But letting passe that which the Poet Ion said: who would that vertue should be full of tragicall discipline, bringing in with it, a certaine satyricall discourse to moue laughter. Now Zenon contrariwise did counsel althose that faid Pericles gravity was a prefumption, and arrogancie: that they should also follow him in his presumption. For to counterfeit in that fort things honest and vertuous, doth secretly with time breed an affection and desire to loue them, and afterwards with custome euen effectually to vse and follow them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagor as companie, did not onely profite himselse inthese things, but he learned besides to put away all superstitious seare of celessials fignes and impressions seene in the ayre. Forto those that are ignorant of the causes thereof, such fights are terrible, and to the godly also fearefull, as if they were vtterly vndone; and all is, because they have no certaine knowledge of the reason that naturall Philosophie yeeldeth, which in stead of a fearefull superstition, would bring a true religion accompanied with affured hope of goodnesse, some say a man brought Pericles one day from his farme out of the countrey, a Rainmes head that had but one horne, and that the Prognosticator Lampon considering this head, that had but one strong horne in the middest of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the fignification thereof; That being two tribes and feuerall factions in the city of ATHENS touching gouernement, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both should be brought into one, and specially into his part, in whose house this signe did happen. Further, it is faid that Anaxagoras being prefent, did cause the Rammes head to be clouen in two peeces, and shewed vnto them that stood by, that the braine of this Ramme did not fill the pan of his natural place, but inclosed it selfe in all parts, being narrow like the point of an egge, in that part where the horne tooke his first roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruellously esteemed at that present by all those that stood by: but so was Lampon, soone after that Thucydides was driuen away, and that the gouernment of the whole common-weale fell into the hands of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall Philosopher and the Prognosticator did rightly meete together in troth: the one directly telling the cause, and the other the end of the euent as it fell out. For the profession of the one, is to know how it commeth: and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to fortell what it betokeneth. For where some say, that to shew the cause, is to take away the fignification of the signe: they do not consider that in seeking to abolish by this reason the wonderfull tokens and signes in the ayre, they do take away those also which are done by art; as the noise of basons, the lights of fire by the sea side, and the shadowes of needles or points of dyals in the Sunne: all which things are done by some cause and handy-worke, to be a figne and token of some thing. But this argument peraduenture may scrue better in another booke. And now againe to Pericles. Whilest he was yet but a yong man the people stood in aw of him, because he somewhat resembled Possifiratus in his countenance: and the ancientest men of the city also were much afeard of his soft voice, his eloquent tongue, and ready vtterance, because in those he was Pysistratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very rich and wealthy, and of one of the noblest families of the city, and those were his friends also that caried the only sway and authority in the state: whereupon, fearing lest they would banish him with the banishment of Oftracismon, he would not meddle with gouernement in any case, although otherwise he shewed himselfe in wars very valiant and forward, and seared not to venter his person. But after that Aristides was dead, that Themistocles was driven away, and that Cimon being euer in service in the wars as Generall in forraine countries, was along time out of GRECE: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of the poore communaltie, aboue the small number of Nobility and rich men, the which was directly against his nature. For of himselse he was not popular, nor meanely given: but he did it (as it should seeme) to avoid suspition, that he should pretend to make himselfe King. And because he saw Cimon was inclined also to take part with the Nobility, and that he was singularly beloued and liked of all the honester fort: heto the contrary inclined to the common people, purchasing by this meanes safety to himselfe, and authority against Cimon. So hee presently beganne a new course of life, fince he had taken vpon him to deale in matters of state: for they neuer sawe him afterwards at any time go into the city, but to the market place, or to the Senate house. He gaue vp going to all feasts where he was bidden, and left the entertainement of his familiarity friends, their companie and familiarity. So that in all this time wherein he governed the common weale, which was a long time, he neuer went out to supper to any of his friends, vnlesse it were that he was once at a feast at his nephew Euryptolemus mariage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremony was a doing, when they offer wine to the gods, and so hee rose from the table. For these friendly meetings at such feasts, do much abase any counterfeit majesty or set countenance; and he shall have much ado to keepe gravity and reputation, shewing familiarity to euery knowne friend in such open places. For in perfect vertue, those things truely are euer most excellent, which be most common; and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto strangers, then their daily convertation is to their friends. Pericles now to preuent that the people should not be glutted with seeing him too oft, nor that they should come much to him: they did see him but at some times, and then he would not talke in cuery matter, neither came much abroad among them, but referued himselfe (as Critolaus said they kept the Salaminian galley at Athens) for matters of great importance. And in the meane season, in other matters of small moment, he dealt by meanes of certaine Oratours his familiar friends, amongst whom Ephialtes (as they say) was one: he who tooke away the autho- Ephialtes rity and power from the court of Areopagus, and did give too much liberty to the people, as Pla- an Oratonr to faid. Vpon which occasion, as the Comicall Poets say, he became so stout and head frong, that they could no more hold him backe, then a yong vnbridled colt: and tooke fuch a courage vpon him, that he would obey no more, but inuaded the Isle of EVBOEA, and set vpon the other Ilands. Pericles also because he would fashion a phrase of speech, with a kind of stile altogether agreeable to the manner of life and grauity he had taken vpon him:he gaue himself to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, shadowing his reasons of natural Philosophie, with artificiall Rhetorick. For having obtained a deepe vn lerstanding by studying of Philosophie, and a ready way effectually to end any matter he vndertooke to prooue, (befides that nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacity, as the divine Plate doth write, to bring any thing to serue his purpose) he did so artificially compasse it with eloquence, that he farre passed all the Orators in his time. And for this cause was he (as they fay) surnamed olympius, as much why Perito fay, as heavenly or divine. But fome are of opinion hee had that furname, by reason of the furnamed common buildings and stately workes he raised up in the city of ATHENS, that did much set Olympine. forth the fame. Other thinke it was given him for his great authority and power he had in gouernement, as wel in wars as in peace. But it is no maruell that his glory was given him, confidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the Comedies the Poets caused to be played in those times (in which there were many words spoken of him, some in earnest, fome in sport and least) do witnesse that he had that surname given him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundered and lightned in his orations to the people, and that his tong was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an answer Thucy dides, Milestus son, should pleasantly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydi- adversary. des was a noble man, and had long time contended against Pericles in matters of the commonweale. Archidamus, king of LACED AMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Perioles wrestled best. Thueydides made him answer: When I have given him an open fall before the face of the world, he can so excellently denie it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all, and perswadeth them the contrarie of that they saw. Notwithstanding hee was ener very graue and wife in speaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to speake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the gods, that nothing might escape his mouth, but that he might confider before, whether it would serue the purpose of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnleffe it be some few lawes he made, and but very few of his notable fayings are brought to light, faue onely thefe. He faid on a time, that they must take away the city of ÆGINA, because it was a straw lying in the eye of the hauen Poilers PIREA. And another time, he faid that he faw the warres afarre off, comming from Pelo- faing. PONNESUS. Another time, as he tooke shippe with Sophocles (his companion in commission with him as Generall of the army) who commended a faire young boy they met as they came to the hauen: sophocles, faid he, a gouernour must not onely haue his hands, but also his eyes cleane. And Stefimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the praise of those that were flaine in the warre of Samos, he faid they were immortall as the gods. For we do not fee thegods (faid hee) as they bee, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happineffethey enioy, we do coniecture they are immortall; and the same things are in those that dye in service and defence of their country. Now where Thueydides doth write the gouerne- Tericles ment of the common-weale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobility, and yet had apparence of a popular state: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, because one alone did wealth.

rule and gouerne the whole state. And many other say also, he was the first that brought in the custome to deuide the enemies lands wonne by conquest among the people, and of the common mony to make the people see playes and pastimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this custome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing paincfully with fweat of their browes, became now to be very vaine, fumptuous, and riotous, by reason of these things brought vp then. The cause of the alteration doth easily appeare by those things. For Pericles at his first comming, sought to winne the fauour of the people, as we have faid before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had won. But comming farre short of his wealth and ability, to carie out the port and charge that Gimon did, entertaining the poore, keeping open house to all commers, clothing poore old people, breaking open besides all inclosures and pales through all his lands, that every one might with more liberty come in, and take the fruits thereof at their pleasure: and seeing himselfe by these great meanes out-gone farre in goodwill with the common people, by Demonides counsell and procurement (who was borne in the Islc of Ios) he brought in this distribution of the common money, as Aristotle writeth. And having wonne in a short time the fauour and goodwill of the common people, by distribution of the common treasure, which he caufed to be deuided among them, afwell to have place to fee thefe playes, as for that they had reward to be present at the judgements, and by other such like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, did inucigh against the court of the Areopagites, whereof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his happeto be yearely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the facrifices, nor mafter of the warres: all which were offices chosen in ancient time by lot. And further, those on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued themselues wel in their office, they were called forwards, and raised to be of the body of this court of the Areopagites. Pericles now by these meanes having obtained great credit and authority amongst the people, he troubled the Senate of the Arcopagites in such fort, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and in time made Cimon to be banished ATHENS, as one that fauoured the LACE-D. EMONIANS, and contraried the common wealth and authority of the people. Notwithstanding he was the noblest and richest person of all the citie, and one that had won so many glorious victories, and had so replenished ATHENS with the conquered spoiles of their enemies, as we have declared in his life: so great was the authority of Pericles amongst the people. Now the banishment wherewith he was punished (which they called Ofracismon) was limited by the law for ten yeares. In which space the LACED ÆMONIAN'S being come downe with a great army into the country of Tanagra, the Athenians fent out their power presently against them. There Cimon willing to flew the ATHENIANS by his deeds, that they had falfly accused him for fauouring the LACED EMONIAN sidid arme himselfe, & went on his countrey mens side to fight in the company of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a banished man. And this was the cause that Pericles fought that day more valiantly then ever he did, and he wanne the honour and name to have done more in the person of himselfe that day, then any other of all the armie. At that battell also, all Cimons friends, whom Pericles had burdened likewise to fauourthe LACED EMONIANS doings, died euery man of them that day. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driven Cimon away, and wished he were restored, after they had lost this battell vpon the confines of the countrey of ATTICAL because they feared sharpe wars would come upon them againe at the next spring. Which thing when Pericles perceived, he fought also to further that the common people desired:wherefore he straight caused a decree to be made, that Cimon should be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduifed that peace should be made betweene both cities: for the Laced Amonians did loue Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithstanding doe write, that Pericles did neuer passe his consent to call him home againe, before such time as they had made a secret agreement amongst themselues (by meanes of Elpinice, Cimons sister) that Cimon should be fent out with an army of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of Persia his dominions, and that Pericles should remaine at home with the authority of government within the city. Thus Elpinice (Cimons fifter) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at fuch time as he was accused before the Judge of treason. For Pericles was one of the committies, to whom this accusation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, and befought him not to do his worst vnto her brother. Pericles answered her merily: Thou art too old Elpinice. thou art too old to go through with these matters. Yet when this matter came to judgement, and that his cause was pleaded, he rose but once to speake against him (for his owne discharge as it Perietes were) and went his way when he had faid, doing leffe hurt to Cimon then any other of his accu-moderation fers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuseth Pericles that he had caused the orator Ephialtes to be flaine by treason (that was his friend, and did alwaics counsell him, and take his part in all kind of gouernement of the comon weale) only for the ielousie and enuy he did beare to his glory? I can but muse why Idomeneus should speake so flanderously against Perioles, vnlesse it were that his melancholy humor procured fuch violent speech; who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameleffe, yet he was euer nobly minded, and had a natural defire of honor. in which kind of men such furious cruel passions are seldom seeneto breed. But this orator Ebbialter being cruell to those that took part with the Nobility, because he would spare or pardonno man for any offence whatfocuer committed against the peoples authority, but did follow and perfectite them with all rigour to the vttermost; his enemies laid waite for him by meanes of one Ariflodicus TANAGRIAN, and they killed him by treason, as Ariflole writeth. In the meane Cimon The mura died in the Ile of Cyprvs, being Generallof the army of the Athenians by fea. Wherefore those that tooke part with the Nobility, seeing Pericles was now growne very great, and that he went before all other citizens of ATHENS, thinking it good to have some one to sticke on their fide against him, and to leffen thereby somewhat his authority, that he might not come to rule allas he would: they raised vp against him, one Thucydides, of the towne of ALOPECIA, a grave Periodo ada wife man, and father in law to Cimon. This Thucydides had leffe skill of wars then Cimon, but vnderstood more incluill gouernement then he, for that he remained most part of his time within the comthe city: where continually inucighing against Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people. inflort time he had flirred up a like companie against the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer fort (which they call Nobility) from mingling with the common people as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their efface and dignity was obscured, and trode vnder foot. Moreouer he did separate them from the people, and did affemblethem all as it were into one body, who came to be of equall power with the other faction. and did put (as a man will fay) a counterpoise into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little secret grudge only betweene these two factions, as an artificial flower set in the blade of a fword, which made those shew a little, that did leane vnto the people; and the other also somwhat that fauoured the Nobility. But the contention betweene these two persons, was as a deep cut, which decided the city into two factions: of which the one was called the Nobility, and the other the communalty. Therefore Pericles giving the more liberty vnto the people, did all things that might be to pleafe them, ordaining continuall playes and games in the city, many feafts, bankets, and open pastimes to entertaine the commons with such honest pleasures and deuices and befides all this, be fent yerely an army of threefcore gallies vnto the wars, into the which he put a great number of poore citizens that tooke pay of the state for nine moneths of the yere, and therby they did learne together, and practife to be good fea men. Furthermore he fent into the countrey of CHERRONESVS, a thousand free men of the citie to dwell there, and to deuide the lands amongst them: five hundred also into the He of NAXOS: into the He of Andros, two hundred and fiftie: into Thracia, athousand to dwell with the Br-SALTES: and other also into ITALY, when the city of Sydaris was built againe, which afterwards was furnamed the city of the Thyrians. All this he did to rid the city of a nuber of idle A politicle. people, who through idlenesse began to be curious, and to desire change of things, as also to person. prouide for the necessity of the poore townes-men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall citizens of Athens necre vnto their subjects and friends, they served as a garrison to keepe them vnder, and did suppresse them also from attempting any alteration or change. But that which delighteth most, and is the greatest ornament vnto the city of ATHENS, which maketh strangers most to wonder, and which alone doth bring sufficient testimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the ancient power, riches, and great wealth of GRECE, to be true and not false : are the stately and sumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the city of A- Sumptuous THENS. For it is the only act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies most to spite buildings erefted by him, and which they most accused him for, crying out vpon him in all Councels and assemblies: that the people of Athens were openly defamed, for carying away the ready mony of al

GREEE, which was left in the Ile of DELOS to be fafely kept there. And although they could with good honestie haue excused this fact, saying, that Pericles had taken it from the, for feare of the barbarous people, to the end to lay it vp in a more strong place, where it should be in better fafety; yet was this too ouer great an iniury offered vnto all the rest of GR ECE, and too manifest a token of tyranny also, to behold before their eyes, how we do employ the mony, which they were enforced to gather for the maintenance of the wars against the barbarous people, in eilding, building, and fetting forth our city, like a glorious woman, all to begawded with gold and precious stones, and how we do make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull and infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrary, and declared vnto the ATHENIANS, that they were not bound to make any account of this money vnto their friends and allies, confidering that they fought for their fafety, and that they kept the barbarous people far from GRECE without troubling them to fet out any one man, horse or ship of theirs, the mony only excepted, which is no more theirs that paid it, the theirs that received it, so they bestow it to that vse they received it for And their city being already well furnished, and prouided of all things necessary for the wars. it was good reason they should employ & bestow the surplus of the treasure in things, which in time to come (and being throughly finished) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he said that whilst they continue building, they should be presently rich, by reason of the diversity of works of all forts, & other things which they should have need of and to compasse these things the better, and to fet them in hand, all maner of artificers & workme (that would labour) should be fet awork. So should all the townsmen and inhabitants of the city, receive pay and wages of the common treasure: and the city by this meanes should be greatly beautified, and much more able to maintaine it selfe. For such as were strong and able men of body, and of yeares to carv weapon, had pay and entertainment of the common wealth, which were fent abroad vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as crafts-men, and labourers, hee would also they should have part of the common treasure, but not without they carned it, and by doing somewhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupie the common people with great buildings, and deuices of workes of diuerfe occupations, which could not be finished of long time: to the end that the citizens remaining at home, might have a meane and way to take part of the common treasure, & enrich themselves, as well as those that went to the wars, & serued on y sea, or els that lay in garison to keepe any place or fort. For some gained by bringing stuffe:as stones, brasse, iuory, gold, chany, and cypres. Other got, to work & fashion it: artificers at Athens. as carpéters, grauers, fouders, casters of images, masons, hewers of stone, diers, goldsmiths, iovners working in iuory, painters, methat fet in fundry colours of peeces of stone or wood, & turners. Other gained to bring stuffe, and to furnish them, as merchants, mariners, and shipmasters. for things they brought them by sea. And by land other got also: as cart-makers, cariers, carters. cord-makers, fadlers, coller-makers, and pyoners to make waies plaine, and miners, & fuch like. Furthermore enery science & crast, as a captain having souldiers, had also their army of y workmen that served them, labouring truly for their living, who served as aprentises and journeymen vnder the workmasters: so the worke by this meanes did disperse abroad a common gaine to all forts of people and ages, what occupation or trade focuer they had. And thus came the buildings to rise in greatnesse and sumptuousnesse, being of excellent workmanship, and for grace and beauty note mparable: because every workman in his science did striue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greatest in fight, and to be most workemanly done in shew. But the greatest thing to be wondred at, was their speed and diligence. For where every man thought those workes were not likely to be finished in many mens liues and ages, and from man to man: they were all done and finished, whilest one onely gouernement continued still in credit and authority. And yet they fay, that in the same time, as one Agatarchus boasted himselfe, that he had quickly painted certaine beasts, Zeuxis another painter hearing him, answered: And I contrarily do reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For commonly flight and sodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe colours, nor give perfect beauty to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the colours to continue for euer. For this cause therefore the workes of Pericles made, are more wonderfull because they were perfectly made in so short a time, and have continued so long a feafon. For every one of those which were finished vp at that time, seemed then to bee very ancient touching the beauty thereof: and yet for the grace and continuance of the same, it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done & finished, there is such a certain kind of flourishing freshnesse in it, which letteth that the iniury of time cannot impaire the fight therof. As if euery of those foresaid works, had some living spirit in it, to make it seems yong and fresh; and a foule that lived ever, which kept them in their good continuing state. Now the chiefe surveyour general of al these works, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent workmasters in every science and occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthénon (as a man would fay, the temple of the virgine, and is furnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery way) was built by IEtinus and Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleusin (where the fecret caremonies of the mysteries were made) was first founded by Corabus, who raised up the first pillars in order, francing beneath on the ground, and did fet them up unto the mafter chaptrels. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of XYPBTA, turned the arches over, and then did set the pillars in order also which are aboue; and Xenocles of the towne of Cholargea. was he that made the lanterne or top of the steeple which couereth the sanctuarie: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles himfelf give order for the building of it, was done by Callicra. tes, who vindertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this work. to see how flowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, saying:

Pericles long ago, did end this worke begunne, Andbuild it high with glorious words, if so it had bene done. But as for deeds (indeede) he built nothing all, But let it stand : as yet it stands, much liker for to fall.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for muficke, where they heate all mufitions play, and is called odeon: it is very well made within with diverse seates and degrees, and many ranges of The Odeon. pillars, but the top of the roofe is altogether round, which is somewhat hanging downeward round about of it selfe, coming together into one point. And it is said that this was made after the patterne and fashion of King Xerxes royall paulion, and that Pericles was the first deuiser & maker of it. Wherfore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the Thracians. doth play very pretily vpon him, faying:

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter furnamed, (And onions head) which bath in his great noddle finely framed The plot of Odeon, when he delinered was

From banishment, and dangers deepe, wherein he long did passe. Pericles was the first that made maruellous earnest labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the feast called Panathenaa, they would set up games for musicke. And he himselfe being chosen ruler of those games, as judgeto reward the best descruer, ordained the manner the musicion should ever after keepe in their singing, playing on their flutes, or same for vpon the citherne, or other instruments of musick. So the first games that ever were for musick. "musick." were kept within the Odeon: and so were the other after them also, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the castle was made and finished within the space of flue yeares, under the charge of Memficles, that was master of the workes, and whilest these gates were a building, there happeneda wonderfull chance, which declared very well that the goddeffe Minerus did not missike the building, butthat it pleased her maruellously. For one of the most painefullest workmen that wrought there, fell by mischance from the height of the castle to the ground, which fall did fo fore bruife him, & he was so sicke withall, that the physicions and surgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very fory for his mischance, the goddesse appeared to him in his fleepe in thenight, and taught him a medicine, with the which he did cafily heale the poore brused man, and that in short time. And this was the occasion why he caused the image of the goddesse Minerna (otherwise called of health) to be cast in brasse, and set vp within the temple of the castle, neare vnto the altar which was there before, as they say. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the base: who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reason of the good will Pericles bare him, he commanded all the other workmen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill spoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias received the gentlewomen of the city into his The Poets house, vnder colour to go see his works, and did conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this bruite, the raise p Comicall poets taking occasion, did cast out many slaunderous speeches against Pericles, ac- standard cusing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and Lieuetenant in the wars: Perioles, specially peacockes, which he secretly sent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not

were to facrifice the iniuries and wrongs they cast vpon honourable & good men, to the spite & enuic of the people, as vnto wicked spirits: considering that Stesimbrotus Thas ian durst falsly accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne sons wife. And this is the reason, in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of ancient things, by the monuments of historiographers: considering long processe of time, doth vtterly obscure the truth of matters, done in former times. For euery written historic speaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention; fometime for hate & enuy, fometime for fauour or flatterie, doth disguise and corrupt the truth, But Pericles perceiuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations did still cry out vpo him, that he did vainely waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed vpon the workes, al the whole reuenue of the city: one day when the people were affembled together, before them al he asked them, if they thought that the cost bestowed were too much. The people answered him:a great deale too much. Well, faid he then, the charges shall be mine (if you think good) and none The noble of yours:prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely. When Perifaying of Perieles. eles had said so, the people cried out aloud, they would none of that (either because that they wondred at the greatnesse of his mind, or else for that they would not give him the only honour and praise to haue done so sumptuous and stately works) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any cost. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, and putting it to an adventure which of them should banish other, with the banishment of ofracismon: Pericles got the upper hand, and banished Thucydides out of the city. and therewithal also ouerthrew the contrary faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the city agains to vnity and concord, he found then the whole power of Athens in his hands, and all the Athenians matters at his disposing. And having all the Pericles treasure, armour, galleys, Iles, and the sea, and a maruellous seigniorie and kingdome (that did enlarge it selfe partly ouer the GRECIANS, and partly ouer the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of nations subject vnto them, with the friendship of Kings, and with the alliance of divers other Princes and mighty Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to change his manners towards the people, and not so easily to gine place and frame himselfe to the peoples wils and defires, no more then as it were to contrary winds. Furthermore he altered his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernement which he vsed vntill that time, as too delicate and too effeminate an harmony of musicke, and did conuert it vnto an imperious gouernement, or rather to a kingly authority: but yet held still a direct course, and kept himselfe euer vpright without fault, as one that did, said, and counselled that, which was most expedient for the common-weale. He many times brought on the people by perswasions and reasons, to be willing to grant that he preferred vnto them: but many times also, he draue them to it by force, & made them against their wils do that, which was best for them. Following therein the deuice of a wife physition: who in a long and changeable disease, doth grant his patient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sort:& another time also, he doth give him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For (as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enion fo great an empire) many times misfortunes did chance, that filled the full of fundry passions, y which Pericles alone could finely steere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope; brideling with the one, the fierce and infolent rashnesse of the common people in prosperitie, and with the other comforting their griefe and discouragement in aduersitie. Wherein he manifestly proued, that Rhetorick and Eloquence(as Plato faith) is an art which quickneth mens spirits at her pleasure, & her chiefest skil is, to know how to moue passions and affections throughly, which are as stops and sounds of the exceeded many Kings and tyrants, yea even those which by their willes and testaments might have left great possessions to their children: he never for all that increased his fathers goods and patrimony lefthim, the value of a groate in filter. And yet the historiographer Thuesdades doth fet forth plainely inough, the greatnesse of his power. And the Comicall poets also of that time do report it maliciously vnder couert words, calling his familiar frieds, the new Pylistratides, saying, that they must make him sweare and protest he would never be King; giving vs thereby to vinderstand, that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular gouernement. And Teleclides (amongst other) faith, that the ATHENIAN'S had put into his hands the reuenue of the towns and ciries vnder their obedience, and the towns themselves, to bind the one, and loose the other, and to pull downe their wals, or to build them againe at his pleafure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance they gaue all their force treasure & authority and all their goods wholv-into his hands. But this was not for a little while, nor in a geere of fauour, that should cotinue for a time: but this held out forty years together, he being alwaies the chiefe of his city among st the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmedes, and the Thucydides. For after he had prevailed against Thurydides, and had banished him, he yet remained chiefe about all o. ther, the space of fifteene yeares. Thus having attained a regall dignity to command all, which continued as aforefaid, where no other captaines authority endured but one years: he cuer kept Perioles himselfe vpright from bribes and mony though otherwise he was no ill husband, & could warily look to his own. As for his lands and goods left him by his parents, that they miscaried not was by negligence, northat they should trouble him much, in busying himself to reduce the to a valuche did fo husband them, as he thought was his best and easiest way. For he sold in grosse ener Pergles the whole yeares profit & comodity of his lands, & afterwards fent to the market daily to buy the cates, and other ordinary provision of houshold. This did not like his sonnes that were men growne, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberall in his house: for they complained of his overhard and straight ordinary, because in so noble and great a house as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meare, bur all things received into the house, ranne under accompt, and were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, steward of his house, a man very honest and skilfull in al his houshold proussion and whether Pericles had brought him up to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not knowne, But these thing were force contrary to Ana. xagoras wisedome. For he despising the world, and casting his affection on heavenly things: did willingly forfake his house, and suffered all his land to run to layes & to pasture. But (in my opi-thematicinion) great is the diversity betweene a contemplative life, and a civil life. For the one employeth all his time vpon speculation of good and honest things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he unstitute be. hath no need of any exteriour helpe or instrument. The other applying all his time vpon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men, he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an instrument templature not only necessary but also honest. As, look vpon the example of Pericles, who did refeeue many poore people, and Anaxagoras specially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of state at that time, having no leisure to think vpon Anaxagor as, he seeing himselfeold and forsaken of the world, laid him downe, and concred his head close, radges, determining to starue himself to death with hunger. Pericles vnderstanding this ran presently to mine to him as a man halfecast away, & prayed him as earnestly as he could, that he would dispose himfelfe to liue, being not onely fory for him, but for himfelfe alfo, that he should lose to faith- death. full and wife a counseller, in matters of state and gouernement. Then Anaxagoras shewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, those that will see by the light of a lampe, must put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now began the LACED EMONIANS to grow icalous of the greatnesse of rasfaying the ATHENIANS; wherfore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hearts greater, and so draw their minds to great enterprises, set downe an order they should send ambassadors to perswade at the GRECIANS (in what part socuer they dwelt in EVROPE, or ASIA, as well the litle as the great cities) to fend their deputies vnto ATHENS, to the general affembly that should be holden there Pointes to take order for the temples of the gods which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching appointed the fraction of the fra the facrifices they had vowed for the prescruation of GRECE, when they gave battel vpon the connection and touching sea matters also, that every man might faile in safety where he would, and that all metall might liue together in good peace and loue one with another. To performe this commission, den as twenty persons were sent of this ambassiate, every one of them being fifty yeares of age and vpward. Wherof flue of them went to the Dor IAN's, dwelling in As IA, and to the inhabitants of

All which, not the force of eloquence only brought to passe, as Thucydides witnesseth: but the reputation of his commended life, and the opinion & confidence they had of his great worthinesse, because he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetouines in him. For, when he had brought worthinesse, his city not only to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authority the Iles, eue vnto the Iles of Lesbos & of the Rhodes. Fine other went through all & country of HELLESPONT, & of THRACIA, unto the city of BIZANTIVM. Other flue were commanded togo into BOEOTIA, into PHOCIDES, and through al PELOPONNESVS, & from thence by the courtry of the Lockians, into the vpland country ionning to it, vntil they came into the country of Acarnania, and of Ameracia. And the other five went first into the Ile of Eve o Ea. and from thence vnto the Obt EIANS, and through all the gulfe of MALEA, vnto PHTIO-TES, vnto the Achaians, and the Thessalians: declaring to all the people where they came, the ATHENIANS commission, perswading them to send vnto ATHENS, to be presentate the councell which should be holden there, for the pacification and vnion of all GRECE. But when all came to all nothing was done, and the faid cities of GRECE did not affemble, by pra-Ctise of the Laced Monians (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the first refufall that was made of their fummons, was at PELOPONNESVS. This haue I writte to make Pericles noble courage to be knowne, and how profound a wife man he shewed himselfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was chosen General in the wars, he was much esteemed, because Perlales tohe euer took great regard to the fafety of his fouldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he saw might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing dangerous : and moreouer. fafery of his he neuer praised them for good Generals, neither would he follow the that had obtained great victories by hazard, howfocuer other did esteeme or commend them. For he was wont to say, that if none but himselfe did leade them to the shambles, as much as lay in him, they should be immortall. And when he saw Tolmides, the sonne of Tolmaus (trusting to his former victories. and the praise and commendation of his good fernice) did prepare vpon no occasion, and to no purpose to enter into the country of Bo EOTIA, and had procured also a thousand of the lusticst and most valiant men of the citie, to be contented to goe with him in that journey, ouer and aboue the rest of the army he had leuied: he went about to turne him from his purpose, and to keepe him at home, by many perswasions he vsed to him before the peoples face, and spake certaine words at that time, that were remembred long after, and thefe they were: That if he would not beleeue Pericles counsel, yet that he would tary time at the least, which is the wifest counsel. ler of men. These words were pretily liked at that present time. But within sew daies after, when news was brought that Tolmides felf was flaine in a battel he had lost, neare vnto the city of Co-RONEA, wherein also perished many other honest and valiant men of ATHENS: his words spoflaine in the ken before, did then greatly increase Pericles reputation and goodwil with the common people, because he was taken for a wife man, and one that loued his citizens. But of all his journeys he made, being Generall ouer the army of the ATHENIANS, the iourney of CHERRONESY'S Was best thought and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefit and preservation of all the GRECIANS inhabiting in that country. For besides that he brought thither a thousand citizens of ATHERS to dwell there (in which doing he strengthened the cities with so many good men) he did fortifie the barre also, which did let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drew from one fea to another: so that he defended the country against all the inuasions and piracies of the THRACIANS inhabiting thereabouts, and deliuered it of extreme war, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongst them who only lived upon piracie and robbing on the feas. So was he likewife much honored and efteemed of strangers, when he did enuiron all PELOPONNESVS, departing out of the hauen of PEGES, on the coast of MEGARA, with a fleet of a hundred gallies. For he did not only spoyle the towns allalong the sea side, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the maine land, farre from the sea, with his souldiers he had in the gallies, he draue some of them to retire within their walles, he made them so afraid of him: and in the country of NEMBA, he ouercame the Sicyonians in battel, that taried him in the field, & did crect a pillar for a notable mark of his victory. And imbarking in his ships a new supply of souldiers which he took vp in ACHAIA, being friends with the ATHENIAN'S at that time, he passed ouer to the firme land that lay Attelous f. dire Etly against it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the river of Achelous, he invaded the country of ACARNANIA, where he shut up the Obneades within their walles. And after he had laid wafte and destroyed all the champion country, he returned homeagaine to ATHENS: having shewed himselfe in this journey, a dreadfull Captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the fafety of his fouldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iourney (by chance or otherwise) vnto the souldiers vnder his charge. And afterwards, going with a great nauy maruellous well appointed vnto the Realme of PONTVS, he did there gently vie and intreate the cities of GRECE, and granted them all that they required of him, making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great force and power of the Athenians, who failed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the coasts of the sea under their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirreenegallies, with certaine number of fouldiers under captaine Lamachus, to defend them against the tyrant Timesiteus, who being expulsed and driven away with those of his faction, Pericles caused proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that fixe hundred free men of the citie, that hadany defire togo, without comp illion, might go dwel at Stnora, where they should have devided among them the goods and lands of the tyrant and his followers. But he did not follow the foolish vaine humors of his citizens, nor would not yeeld to their vusatiable Periods couetousnesse, who being set on a iolitic to see themselves so strong and of such a power, and would not besides, to have good lucke, would needs once againe attempt to conquer Ægypt, and tore- follow the uoltall the countries vpon the fea coasts, from the empire of the king of Persia fortherewere of the people many of the whose mindes were maruellously bent to attempt the infortunate enterprise of entring Sicilia, which Alcibiades afterwards did much pricke forward. And tome of them dreamed besides, of the conquest of Thys can, and the empire of Carrhage. But this was not altogether without some likelihood, nor without occasion of hope, considering the large bounds similar. of their kingdome, and the fortunatestate of their affaires, which fell out according to their own defire. But Perioles did hinder their going out, & cut oif altogether their curious defire, employing the most part of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten indging it no fmall matter to keepe downe the LACED #MONIANS frogrowing greater. For he was alwaies an enemie to the Laced MONIANS, as he shewed himselfe in many things, but specially in the warre he made, called the holy warre. For the LACED EMONIANS having put the PHOCIANS the Lacede. from the charge of the temple, of Apollo, in the city, of DELPHES, which they had vourped, and mouses. having restored the DELPHIAN's again vnto the same so some as they were gone thence Perieles went also with another army, and restored the Phocrass in againe. And whereas the La-CEDEMONIANS had caused to be grauen in the forehead of a Wolfe of brasse, the priviledge the Delphians had gräted the to be the first that should make their demands of the oracle: he pullonar having attained the like priviledge of the Phocians, made his image also to be graven on the knows. right fide of the same image, of the brasen Wolfe. Now how wisely Perioles did gouern Gares by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deeds do plainly thew. For first of all, the country of Ev-BOEA did rebell, against whom he brought the army of the ATHENIANS. And suddenly in the necke of that, came newes from another coast, that the MEGARIANS also were in armes against them, and how they were already entred into the country of ATTICA with a great army, led by Plistonax King of LACED EMON. This occasion drew him homeward againe, and so he marched backe with speed into his country, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entred into the teritories of Arrica. He durst not offerthem battell, being fo great a number of valiant foldiers: but hearing that king Pliftonax was yet but a yong man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counfell and direct him he fought privily to corrupt Gleandrides. When he had won him soone with his money, he perswaded him to draw backe the Peloponnesians out of their corrupted country of ATTICA and To he did. But when the LACED EMONIAN'S faw their army caffed, by Periles. and that the people were gone their way, every man to his own city or town, they were so mad at it, that the king was codemned in a great form. The king being vnable to answer his fine, which was fo extreme great, he was driven to absent himselfe from LACED #MON. Cleandrides on the other fide, if he had not fled in time, even for spile had bene codemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, that afterwards overcame the Athenians in Sicilia, in whom it Gylipbus. seemed nature bred couetousnes, as a disease inheritable by succession from the father to the son. Athenians For he being shamefully connected also, for certain vile parts he had plaid, was likewise banished at Syracusa from Sparta: as we have more amply declared in the life of Lyfander. And Pericles delivering Gylipus vp the account of his charge, and fetting downe an article of the expence of tenne talents he had robbed pare employed, or should imploy in needfull causes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking quefive treafive Lyanftion how, nor which way, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are cer- der fent taine writers (amongst whom the Philosopher Theophrastus is one) who write that Pericles sent him withall yearely vnto Sparta ten talents, with the which he entertained those that were in authoritie there, because they should make no wars with them; not to buy peace of them, but time; that he might in the meane feafon, with better commodity, and that ley fure, prouide to maintaine the wars. After that, as the army of the Peloponnesians were out of the country of Attica, he returned against the rebels, and passed into the Ile Evbora with fifty saile, and fine thousand footmen well armed and there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes against him, and draue away the Hyppobotes, who were the most famous men of all the Chalcidians, as well for their riches, as for their valiantnes. He draue away alfoall the HESTI ÆIANS, whom he chafedcleane out of all the country, and placed in their city, only the citizens of Athens. And the cause why he dealt so rigorously with them was, because they having taken a galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being cocluded afterwards betweene the Athenians and Laced Emonians forthirty yeares: he proclaimed open wars against those of the Ile of Samos, burthening them, that they being commanded by the Athenians, to pacifie the quarrels which they had against the Milesians, they would not obey. But because some hold opinion, that he tooke vpon him this warre against Sa. Mos, for the loue of Aspasia, it shall be no great digression of our story, to tell you by the way. what manner of woman she was, and what a maruellous gift and power she had, that she could entangle with her loue the chiefest rulers and gouernors at that time of the common weale, and that the Philosophers themselues did so largely speake and write of her. First of all, it is certaine that she was borne in the city of MILETVM, and was the daughter of one Axiochus: she following the steps & example of an old curtifan of Ionia, called Thargelia, gaue her selfe only to entertaine the greatest persons and chiefest rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing faire; and carying a comely grace with her, having a sharpe wit & pleasant tong, she had the acquaintance and friendship of the greatest of all GRECE, and wanne all those that did haunt her company to be at the king of Persiaes commandement. So that she sowed through all the cities of GRECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MEDES: for they were the greatest men of power and authority of every city that were acquainted with her. But as for Apalia, fome fay that Perceles reforted vnto her, because she was a wife woman, and had great vnderstanding in matters of state and government. For Socrates himselfe went to see her sometimes with his friends: and those that vsed her company also, brought their wives many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine were, to entertaine such as would warmethem by her fire. Alfobines writeth, that Lysicles a grasier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbishnature, came to be the chiefe man of ATHENS, by frequenting the company of Aspassa. after the death of Pericles. And to Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleasantly written, yet in that, this story is written truly: that this Aspassa was repair red vato by divers of the AHENIANS, to learne the art of rhetoricke of her. Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely that the affection Pericles did beare her, grew rather of loue, then of any other cause. For he was maried vnto a kinsewoman of his own, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom she had Callias, surnamed the rich and had afterwards by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her company, he gaue her with her owne good will and confent vnto another, and maried Afpassa whom he dearely loued. For euer when he went abroad, and came home againe, he faluted her with a kiffe. Whereupon in the ancient Comedies, she is called in many places, the new Omphale, and sometimes Desanira, and sometimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainly calleth her whore in these verses: His Iuno she him brought, Aspasia by name,

Which was indeed an open whore, and past all kind of shame.

And it seemed that he had a bastard: for Eupolis in a Comedie of his called Demosis, bringeth him in , asking Pironides thus :

I pray thee is my bastard sonne yet aline ?

And then Pironides answered him: I perfect man long since, he surely had bene found,

If that this lewd and naughty whore his vertue had not drownd.

To conclude, this Aspassa was so famous, that Gyrus (he that fought against king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of PERSIA) called Aspassa his best beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milito, and was borne in Procines, being Hermotimus daughter. And Cyrus being flaine in the field, Aspasia was carried to the King his brother, with whom afterwards the was in great fauour. As I was writing this life, this ftory came in my mind: and me thought I should have dealt hardly, if I should have left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe. Pericles was charged that he made warres against the Samians, on the behalfe of the MILESIANS, at the request of Aspasa: for these two cities were at wars together, for the citie of PRIENA, but the Samians were the stronger. Now the Athenians commanded them to lay aside their armes, and to come and plead their matter before the, that the right might be decided : but they refused it vtterly. Wherefore Perselès went thither and tooke away the government of the small number of Nobility, taking for hostages, fifty of the chiefest men of the city, and so many children besides, which helest to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some say every one of these hostages offered to give him a talant: and be fides those, many other offered him the like such as wold not have the soueraigne authoritie put into the hands of the people. Moreover Pissuthnes the Pissuthnes PERSIAN, lieutenant to the king of PERSIA, for the goodwil he bore those of Samos, did send the Persian Pericles ten thousand crownes to release the hostages. But Pericles neuer tooke penny : and hauing done that he determined at SAMOs, and established a popular gouernement, he returned a- Perioles gaine to ATHENS. Notwithstanding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediatly after, having recovered their hostages againe by meanes of this Pissurbnes that stole them away, and did furnish them also with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Persoles returning against them once more, he found them not idle, nor amazed at his coming, but resolutely determined to receive him, and to fight for the seigniory by sea. So there was a great battell fought between them, neare the Ile of THRACIA. And Pericles wan the battell: having with 44. faile only nobly overcome his ene- Pericles vimies, which were three-score & ten in number, whereof twenty of them were ships of war. And thrie afo following his victory forthwith, he wan also the port of Samos, and kept the Samians befieged within their owne city: where they were yet fo bold, as they would make fallies out many times, and fight before the wals of the city. But when there arrived a new supply of shippes bringing a greater aide vnto Pericles, then were they shut vp on all sides. Pericles then taking threefcoregalleyes with him, lanched out into the fea, with intent (as some say) to go meete certaine ships of the Phoenicians (that came to aide the Samians) as far from Samos as he could: oras Stefimbrotus faith, to go into Cyprvs, which methinketh is not true. But what soeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For Meliffus (the fon af Ithagenes, a great Philosopher) be- Meliffus ing at that time generall of the SAMIANS, perceiving that few ships were left behind at the fiege Philosoof the city, and that the captaines also that had the charge of them were not very expert men of the ral of the war, periwaded his citizens to make a fallie vponthem. Wherupon they fought a battel, and the samians. Samian's ouercame: the Athenian's were taken prisoners, and they funke many of their ships. Now they being lords againe of the sea, did furnish their city with all manner of munition for wars, whereof beforethey had great want. Yet Aristotle writeth, that Pericles selfe was once ouercome in a battell at sea by Melissus. Furthermore the Samians, to be euen with the A-THENIANS for the iniury they had received of them before, did brand them in the forehead The owle with the stampe of an owle, the owle being then the stampe of their coine at ATHENS, euen as the stampe the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN prisoners before with the stampe of Samana. This of the toyne Samana is a kinde of ship amongst the Samians, low afore, and well laid out in the mid-ship, Samana a so that it is excellent good to rise with the waves of the sea, and is very swift under saile: and it find of this. was fo called, because the first ship that was made of this fashion, was made in the Ile of Samos, by the tyrant Polycrates. It is faid that the Poet Aristophanes, couertly conueying the stampe of Thewistie the Samians, speaking merily in a place of his Comedies, saith:

The Samians are great learned men. Pericles being aduertised of the overthrow of his army, returned presently to the rescue. Mes Samians. liss went to meete him, and gaue him battell but he was ouerthrowne, and driven back into his city, where Pericles walled them in round about the citie, defiring victoric rather by time and charge, then by danger, and losse of his fouldiers. But when he saw that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withhold them : he then deuided his army into eight companies, whom he made to draw lots, and that company that lighted vpon the white beane, they should be quiet, and make good cheere, while the other feuen fought. And they fay that from thence it came, that when any haue made good cheere, & taken pleature abroad, they do yet cal it a white day, because of the white

beane. Ephorus the historiographer writeth, that it was there, where first of all they begun to vie engines of warre to plucke downe great wals, and that Pericles vsed first this wonderfull inuention: and that Artemon an enginer was the first deuiser of them. He was caried vp and downe in a chaire, to set forward these workes, because he had a lame legge; and for this cause he was called Periphoretos. But Aeraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verses of Anacreon in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeares before this warre of Samos began: and faith, this Periphoretos was a maruellous tender man, and so foolishly afeard of his owneshadow that the most part of his time he stirred not out of his house, and did sit alwaies having two of his menby him, that held a copper target ouer his head, for feare least any thing should fall vpon him, And if you any occasion he were driven to go abroad out of his house : he would be caried in a litle bed hanging neare the ground, and for this cause he was surnamed Periphoretos. At the last, at nine moneths end, the Samian's were compelled to yeeld. So Pericles tooke the city & razed their wals to the ground: he brought their ships away, and made the pay a maruellous great tribute, whereof part he received in hand, and the rest payable at a certaine time, taking ho stages with him for affurance of payment. But Duris the Samian dilateth these matters maruellous pittifully, burthening the ATHENIANS, and Persoles felfe with vnnatural cruelty: whereof neither Thucydides, nor Ephorus, nor Ariflotle himselfe maketh mention. And fure I cannot beleeue it is true that is written. That he brought the captaines of the gallies, and the fouldiers thefelues of Samia, into the market place of the citic of MILETVM, where he made them to be bound fast vnto boords for the space of tenne dayes, and at the end of the same, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads pashed in peeces; and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crowes, and would not burie them. So Duris being accustomed to ouerreach, and to lye many times in things nothing touching him, feemeth in this place out of all reason to aggravate the calamities of his countrey, onely to accuse the Athenians. and to make them odious to the world. Pericles having won the city of Samos, he returned againeto ATHENS, where he did honourably burie the bones of his flaine citizens in this warre and himselfe (according to their manner and custome) made the funerall oration, for the which he was maruelloufly effeemed. In fuch fortathat after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration, the ladies and gentlewomen of the citie came to falute him, and brought him garlands to put your his head, as they do to noble conquerers when they returne from games, where they have wonne the prize. But Elpinice coming to him, faid : Surely Pericles, thy good feruice done deferueth garlands of triumph; for thou haft loft vs many a good and valiant citizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOENICIANS, and with the barbarous people, as my brother Cimon did, but for destroying a cirie of our ownenation and kindred. Pericles to these words, fofely answered Elpinice, with Anchilochus verse, smiling:

Perisles taunt to an eld woman.

When thou art old paint not this felfe. But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and Rood mute in his owne conceit, after he had subdued the Samians, faying: Igamemnon was ten yeeres taking of a city of the barbarous people; and he in nine months only had won the strongest city of the whole nation of Ion ta. Indeed he had good cause to glory in his victories: for truely (if Thucydides report be true) his conquest was no lesse doubtfull, then he found it dangerous. For the Samian's had almost bene lords of the fea, and taken the feignoric thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the wars of PELOPONNESUS being hote againe, the Corinthians inuading the Ilanders of Corphy: Pericles did perswade the ATHENIANS to send aide vnto the CORPHIANS, and to joyne in league with that Iland, which were of great power by fea, faying: that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would have war with them. The ATHENIAN'S consented to his motion, to aide those of Corphy. Whereupon they fent thither Lacedemonius (Cimons son) with ten gallies only for a mockerie: for all Cimons familie and friends, were wholly at the LACED & MONI-ANS devotion. Therefore did Pericles cause Lacedamonius to have so few ships delivered him, and further, fent him thither against his will, to the end that if he did no notable exploit in this feruice, that they might then the more inftly suspect his goodwill to the LACED EMONIANS. Moreouer whilest he lived, he did cuer what he could to keepe cimons children backe from rifing: because that by their names they were no naturall borne Athenians, but strangers. cimins four. For the one was called Lacedamonius, the other The faulus, and the third Ælius: and the mother to all them three, was an Arcadian woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he

fent but ren galleys only, which was but a flender aide for those that had requested them, and a great matter to them that spake ill of him: he sent thitlier afterwards a great number of other galleys, which came when the battell was fought. But the Corinthians were maruellous angry, and went and complained to the councell of the Laced AMONIANS, where they laid open many grieuous complaints and accusations against the Athenians, and so did the ME - nians accus GARIANS also: alledging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauens, their staples fed at Laand all trafficke of merchandife in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly a cedemon. gainst the common lawes and articles of peace agreed upon by oath among all the Grecians. Moreover, the AGINETES finding themselves very ill and cruelly handled, did send secretly to make their mone and complaints to the Laced Amonians, being afraid openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While these things were a doing, the city of Potidea, subject at that time vnto the Athenians (and was built in old time by the Corinthians) did rebell, and was befreged by the ATHENIANS, which did haften on the warres. Notwithstanding this, ambassadors were first sent vnto Athens vpon these complaints: and Archidamus king of the LACED EMONIANS did all that he could to pacifie the most part of these quarrels and complaints, intreating their friends and allies. So as the Athenians had had no wars at all, for any other matters, wherewith they were burthened, if they would have granted to have revoked, the decree they had made against the MEGARIANS. Whereupon Pericles, that about all other ftood most against the renocation of that decree, and that did stir vp the people and made them fland to that they had once decreed and ordered against the MEGARIANS: was thought the Originall cause and author of the PELOPONNESIAN Warres. For it is said that the LACED &MO- there of the NIANS fent ambassadors vnto ATHENS for that matter only. And when Pexicles alledged alaw marges that did forbid them to take away the table whereupon before time had bene written any common law or edich Poliarces, one of LACED EM ON ambaffadors, faid vnto him: Well faid he. take it not away then, but turne the table onely: your law I am fure forbiddeth not that. This was pleafantly fpoken of the aimbaffadour, but Pericles could never be brought to it for all that: And therefore it feemeth he had fome feeret occasion of grudge against the MEGARIANS: yet Pericles MA as one that would finely conucy it vnder the common cause and cloke he tooke from them the lie against hely lands they were breaking vp. And to bring this to passe, he made an order, that they should the Megafend an herauld to fummon the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, and that the fame herauld should go also vnto the Laced Emonians to accuse the Megarians vnto them. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as also it was most just and reasonable; but it fortuned to, that the meffenger they fent thither died, and not without suspition that the ME-GARIANS made him away. Wherfore Charinus made a law presently against the MEGARIANS: that they should be proclaimed mortal enemies to the ATHENIANS for ever, without any hope of after reconciliation. And also if any MEGARIAN should once put his foote within the territories of Attica, that he should suffer the paines of death. And moreover, that their captaines taking yearely their ordinary oath, should fweare among other articles, that twife in the yeare they should go with their power, and destroy some part of the MEGARIAN's land. And lastly, that the herauld Anthemocritus should be buried by the place called then the gates Thriagenes, and now called Dipylon. But the MEGARIAN's stoutly denying, that they were any cause of the death of this Anthemocritus, did altogether burthen Aspassa and Pericles with the same, alleadging for proofe thereof, Aristophanes verses the Poet, in his Comedie he intituled the Archarnes. which are fo common, as every boy hath them at his tongues end.

The yong men of our land (to drunken bibbing bent) Ran out one day unrulily, and towards Megara went: From whence in their outrage, by force they tooke away, Simethanoble curtifan, as she did sport and play. Wherewith enraged all (with pepper in the nofe) The proud Megarians came to vs, as to their mortall foes, And tooke by stealth away of harlots eke a paire. Attending on Aspasia, which were both young and faire.

But in very deed, to tell the originall cause of this warre, and to deliuer the troth thereof, it is very hard. But all the historiographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefest author of the warre: because the decree made against the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe.

Yet some hold opinion, that Pericles did it of a noble mind and judgement, to be constant in that he thought most expedient. For he judged that this commandement of the LACED EMO-NIANS was but atriall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would grant them: and if they yeelded to them in that, then they manifestly shewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarily say, that it was done of a selfe-will and arrogancie, to shew his authoritic and power, and how he did de. fpife the LACED EMONIANS. But the shrewdest proofe of all, that bringeth best authoritie with it, is reported after this fort. Phideas the image-maker (as we have told you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friend, was in great estimation about him but that procured him many ill willers. Then they being defirous to heare by him what the people would judge of Pericles, they inticed Menon, one of the workmen that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to pray affurance of the people that he might openly accuse Phidias, for a fault he had committed about Pallas image. The people received his obedience, and his accusation was heard openly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all, because that Phidias (through Pericles counsell and deuice) had from the beginning so laid on the gold vpon the image, that it might be taken off and weyed enery whit. Whereupon Pericles openly said vnto his accusers, take of the gold and wey it. The glory of his works did purchase him this enuy. For he hauing grauen vpon the scutchion of the goddesse. the battell of the AMAZONS, had cut out the portraiture of himselfe maruellous lively, vnder the perso of an old bald man, lifting vp agreat stone with both his hands. Further, he had cut out Pericles image excellently wrought and artificially, feeming in manner to be Pericles felfe, fighting with an Amazon in this fort: the Amazon's hand being lift vp high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, to passing cunningly wrought, as it seemed to shadow the likenesse and refemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithstanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles selfe on either fide of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in prison, and there died of a ficknes, or els of poifon (as some fay) which his enemies had prepared for him: and all to bring Pericles into further fuspition, and to give them the more cause to accuse him. But how socuer it was, the people gaue Menon his freedome, and fet him free from paiment of all fubfidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captaines charge they should see him safely kept, and that he tooke no hurt. And about the same time also Aspassa was accused, that she did not beleeve in the gods: and her accuser was Hermippus, maker of the Comedies. He burdened her further, that she was a bawd to Pericles, and received citizens wives into her house, which Pericles kept. And Diephites at the fametime made a decree, that they should make search and enquirie for heritikes that did not beleeue in the gods, and that taught certaine new doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things aboue in the element, turning the suspicion vpon Pericles because of Anaxagoras. The people did receiue and confirme this inquisicion; and it was moned also then by Dracondites, that Pericles should deliuer an account of the mony he had spent, vnto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treasurers of the common fines and reuenues; and that the Judges deputed to give judgement, should give fentence within the citic vpon the alter. But Agnon put that word out of the decree, and placed in stead thereof, that the cause should be judged by the 15. hundred Judges, as they thought good, if any man brought his action for theft, for battery, or for iniuftice. As for Aspasia, he saued her, euen for the very pity & copassion the judges took of him, for the teares he shed in making his humble suit for her, all the time he pleaded her case as A. fehines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not do so much for him, he sent him out of the city, & himsclife did accompany him. And furthermore, seeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias fact, and for this cause fearing the issue of the judgment: he set the wars a fire againe, that alwaies went backward, and did but fmoke a litle, hoping by this means to weare out the accusations against him, & to root out the malice some did beare him. For the people having weighty matters in hand and very dangerous also, he knew they wold put all into his hands alone, he hauing won already fuch great authority & reputation among them. And these bethe causes why he would not (as it is faid) fuffer the ATHENIANS to yeeld vnto the LAGED ÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit thetruth cannot certainely be knowne. But the LACED EMONTANS knowing well, that if they could weed out Pericles, and ouerthrow him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS: they commanded them they should purge their city of Gylons rebellion, because they knew well inough that Pericles kin by the mothers side were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practife fel out contrary to their hope and expectation, that were fent to Athens for this purpose. For, weening to have brought Pericles into further furbition, & displeasure, the citizens honored him the more, and had a better affiance in him then before because they saw his enemies did so much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before King Archidamus entred with the army of the PELOPONNESIANS into the country of ATTICA-he told the ATHENIANS, that if King Archidamus fortuned to wast and destroy all the country about, and should spare his lands and goods for the old love and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to give his enemies occasion falfly to accuse him: that from thence forth, he gave all the lands and tenements he had in the country, vnto the common wealth. So it fortuned that the LACED EM ONIANS with all their friends and confederates, brought a maruellous army into the country of Arrica, vnder the leading of King Archidamus: who burning and spoiling all demonians the country he came along, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, where they encamped, inuale Assupposing the ATHENIANS would neuer suffer them to approch so neere, but that they would gue them battell for the honour and defence of their countrey, and to shew that they were no cowards. But Pericles wifely confidered how the danger was too great to hazard battell, where the loss of the citie of Athens stood in perill seeing they were threescore thousand footmen of the Peloponnesians, and of the Boeotians together: for fo many was their number in the first voyage they made against the ATHENIANS. And as for those that were very defirous to fight, and to put themselves to any hazard, being mad to see their country thus wasted & destroyed before their cies, Pericles did comfort & pacific them with these words: That trees being Anexelcut and hewne downe, did fpring againe in fhort time: but men being once dead, by no possibi- lent compalitic could be brought again. Therefore he neuer durft affemble the people in councell, fearing flating flat the left he should be enforced by the multitude, to do something still against his will. But as a wife foulding Pilote, when he feeth a storme coming on the sea, doth straight give order to make all things fight. fafe in the shippe, preparing enery thing ready to defend the storme, according to his art and skill, not hearkening to the paffengers fearefull cries and pitifull teares, who thinke themselues cast away : euen so did Pericles rule all things according to his wisdome, having walled the city substantially about, and set good watch in cuery corner and passed not for those that were angry and offended with him, neither would he be perswaded by his friends earnest requests & intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threats nor accusations against him, nor yet reckoned of all their foolish scoffing songs they sung of him in the city to the shame and reproch of his government, faying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for dastardlinesse he let the enemies take all, and ipoile what they would. Of which number Clean was one that most defamed him, and be- clean accugan to enter into some pretie credite and fauour with the common people, for that they were subsenangry, and misliked with Pericles: as appeareth by these standerous verses of Hirmippus, which were then abroade:

PERICLES.

O King of Satyres thou who with such manly speech. Of bloudy warres and doughty deeds, dost dayly to ws preach: Why art thou now afraid to take thy lance in hand, Or with thy pike against thy focs, couragiously to stand?

Since Cleon flont and fierce, doth dayly thee prouoke With biting words with trenchant blades, and deadly dannting froke.

All this not with filence did patiently beare all iniuries and fcoffings of his enemies, and did fend for all that, a nauy of a hundred faile vnto Peroponnesvs, whither he would not go in person, but kept himselfe at home, to keepe the people in quiet, vntill fuch time as the enemies had raifed their campe, and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angry at this war, he com- Note Periforted the poore people againe, with caufing a certaine distribution to be made among it them eliminated the policies of the common treasure, and division also of the lands that were got by conquest. For after he had driven all the ÆGINETES out of their countrey, he caused the whole He of ÆGINA to be denided by lot amongst the citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comfort to them by the A. in this aduerfity, to heave of their enemies hurt and loffe in fuch manner as it did fall out. For thenians. their army that was fent by feavnto Peloponnesvs, had wasted and destroyed a great part of the champion country there, and had facked befides many finall cities and townes. Pericles felfe alfochtring into the Megarians country by land, did wafte the whole country all afore him. Sothe PELOPONNESTANS receining by sea as much hurt and losseat the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land vnto the Athenian sithey had not holden out warres folong with the ATHENIANS, but would foone have given over (as Pericles had told them before) had not the gods aboue secretly hindred mans reason & policie. For first of all there came such a fore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole city besides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infected with this disease, their hearts also were so sharpely bent against Pericles, that the ficknesse having troubled their braines, they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the patient a. gainst his physitian, or children against their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocati. on of his enemies: who bruited abroade, that the plague came of no cause else, but of the great multitude of the country men that came into the city on heapes, one vpon anothers necke in the heate of the summer, where they were copelled to lie many together, smothered vp in litle tents and cabines, remaining there all day long, cowring downewards, and doing nothing, where before they lived in the countrey in a fresh open ayre, and at liberty And of all this (fay they) Peri. cles is the only cause, who procuring this war, hath pent and shrouded the country mentogether within the wals of a city, employing them to no manner of vse nor service, but keeping them like sheep in a pinfold, maketh one to poison another with the infectio of their plague fores running vpon them, and giving them no leave to change aire, that they might fo much as take breath abroad. Pericles to remedy this, and to do their enemies a litle mischief, armed a hundred & fifty ships, and shipped into them a great number of armed footmen and horsemen also. Hereby he put the citizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, seeing so great a power. But when he had shipped all his men, and was himselfe also in the admirall ready to hoise sayle: sodainely there was a great eclips of the Suffine, and the day was very dark, that all the army was stricken with a maruellous feare, as of some dangerous and very ill token towards them. Pericles seeing the master of his gally in a maze withall, not knowing what to do, cast his cloak ouer the masters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harme or no. The mafter answer red him, he thought it none. Then faid Pericles againe to him: There is no difference betweene this and that, fauing that the body which maketh the darkneffe is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eies. The fethings are thus disputed of in the schooles of the Philosophers. But Pericles hoifing faile notwithstanding, did no notable nor speciall service, answerable to so great an army and preparation. For he laying fiege vnto the holy city of EPIDAVRVM, when every man looked they should have taken it, was compelled to raise his siege for the plague that was so vehement that it did not only kill the Athenians themselves, but all other also (were they never so few) that came to them or neere the campe. Wherefore perceiuing the Athenians were maruellously offended with him, he did what he could to comfort them, and put them in heart againe; but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them: for by the most part of voices, they deprived him of his charge of Generall, and condemned him in a maruellous great fine and fumme of money the which those that tell the least, do write, that it was the summe of fifteene talents; and those that fay more, speake of fiftie talents. The accuser subscribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomeneus, or Simmias fay, or as Theophrastus writeth: yet Heraclides Ponticus faith, one Lacratidas. Now his common griefes were soone blown ouer: for the people did easily let fall their displeafures towards him, as the waspe leaueth her sting behind her with them she had stung. But his owne private affaires and houshold causes were in very ill case: both for that the plague had taken away many of his friends and kinfmen from him, as also for that he and his house had continued a long time in difgrace. For Xantippus (Pericles sonne and heire) being a man of a very ill disposition and nature, and having maried a young woman very prodigall and lauish of expence, the daughter of Isander, sonne of Epylichus, he grudged much at his fathers hardnesse, who scantly gaue him mony and but a litle at a time. Whereupon he sent on a time to one of his fathers friends in Pericles name, to pray him to lend him fome money, who fent it vnto him. But afterwards when he came to demand it againe, Pericles did not onely refuse to pay it him, but further also he put him in suite. But this made the young man Xantippus so angrie with his father, that he spake very ill of him in euery place where he came: and reported in way of mockery, how his father ipent his time when he was at home, and what talke he had with the Sophisters, and the master Rhetoricians. For a mischance fortuning on a time, at the game of thethrowing of the dart, who should throw best, that he that threw, did vafortunately kill one Epitimeus a Thessalian: Xantippus went pratting vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole day disputing with Protagoras the Rhetorician to know which of the three by law and reason should be condemned for this murther. The dart the that threw the darts or the deuiser of the game. Moreouer Stefimbrotus writeth, that the bruite that ranne thorough the citie, that Pericles did keepe his wife, was fowne abroade by Xantippus himselfe. But to it is, this quarrell and hate between the father and the fonne continued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xantippus died in the great plague, and Pericles owne fifter also: moreouer he lost at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinsfolkes, and those specially that did him greatest pleasure in gouerning of the state. But all this did neuer pul down his countenance, nor any thing abate the greatnesse of his mind, what misfortune soeuer he had sustain ned, Neither faw they him weep at any time, nor mourne at the funerals of any of his kinfmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his yongest and lawfull begotten sonne: for, the losse of him a. lone did onely melt his heart. Yet he did ftriue to shew his naturall constancie, and to keepe his accustomed modestie. But as he would have put a garland of flowers vpon his head, sorrow did fo pierce his heart when he faw his face, that then he burft out in teares and cried amaine; which they neuer faw him do before all the dayes of his life. Furthermore the people having proved other Captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgement & authority sufficient, for so great a charge; in the end, of themselues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counfels, and to the state of a captaine also to take charge of the state. But at that time he kept himselfe close in his house, as one bewailing his late grieuous losse and forrow. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friends, perswaded him to hew himself vnto the people: who did excuse theselues vnto him, for their ingratitude towards him. Pericles then taking the gouernement againe vpon him, the first matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to reuoke the statute he had made for base borne children, fearing left his lawful heires would faile, and so his house and name should fal to the ground. But as for the law, thus it flood. Pericles when he was in his best authoritie, caused a law to be made, that they onely should be counted citizens of Athens, which were natural Athenians borne by father and Athensor mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of Æ GYPT having fent a gift vnto the peo. baje barne ple of ATHENS, of 40 thousand bushels of corne, to be distributed among the citizens there: many by occasion of this law were accused to be base borne, and specially men of the baser sort ofpeople, which were not knowne before, or at the least had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were fallly and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon so it fellout, that there were no leffe then fine thousand of them connicted and fold for flaves: and those that remained as free men, and were judged to be naturall citizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thousand, and fortie persons. Now this was much misliked of the people, that a law enatted, and that had bene of fuch force; should by the selfe same maker and deuiser of the same be againe reuoked and called in. Howbeit Perisles late calamitie that fortuned to his house, did break the peoples hardened hearts against him: who thinking these forrowes smart to be punishment enough vnto him for his former pride, and judging that by Gods divine justice and permiffion this plague and loffe fell upon him, and that his request also was tollerable: they suffered him to enrole his base borne sonne in the register of the lawfull citizens of his family, giving him his owne name, Pericles. It is the felfe fame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELO-Ponne sians inagreat battell by sea, neere unto the Iles of Arginuses, was put to death Perioles the by sentence of the people, with other captaines his companions. Now was Pericles at that time base borne infected with the plague, but not fo vehemently as other were, but more temperatly: which by long space of time, with many alterations and changes, did by little and little decay and confume the strength of his body, and ouercame his senses and noble mind. Therefore The ophrastus in his Moralls declareth, in a place where he disputeth, whether mens manners doe change appliedwith their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions do foalter men, that third quethey forget vertue, and abandon reason: that Pericles in his sickenesse showed a friend of his shing the that came to fee him, I cannot tell what a preferuing charme, that the women had tied (as a car-change of kanet) about his necke, to let him vnderstand he was very ill, fince he suffered them to apply meniman fuch a foolish bable to him. In the end Pericles drawing fast vnto his death, the Nobilitie fortunes. of the citie, and such his friends as were left aliue, standing about his bed, beganne to speake Perists of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, considering the greatnesse of his noble acts, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine foughten nour of his countrey) they reckened vp among themselues all these matters, as if he had not vn-

Fabius Maximus.

FABIVS.

MING AVING already declared vnto you fuch things worthy memory as we could collect and gather of the life of Pericles: it is now good time we should proceed to write also of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is faid the first Fabius, from whom the house and family of the Fabians did descend, (being the effeatest and noblest house of all other in Roma) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymph or (as other say) a woman of the country by the river of Tyber. And some fay, that the first of this house, were called at the beginning Fodians, because they did hunt wild beafts, with pitfals and ditches. For vnto this present the

ROMAINES cal ditches, Fosse: and to dig Fodere. Since that time, the two second letters have bene changed and they have called them Fabians. But how soeuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that house; and among other, there was one of that house called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMAINES for his noble acts did furname Maximus, very great. Afterhim Fabius Maximus, whose life we have now in hand, was the fourth lineally descended lus. of the same line, and he was surnamed Verrucosus, because of a certaine birth-marke he had vpon one of his lips, like a litle warr. And he was also surnamed ouicula, a litle lambe, for his softnesse, alled Perflownes, and gravity of his doings whileft he was a child. But because of nature he was dull, ftil, rucofus and and very filent, and that he was feldome feene to play at any pastime among the boyes, and for Ouicula. that they faw he was but of flow capacitie, and hard to learne and conceiue, and withall that the boyes might do to him what they would, he was so lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked not into him, that he would proue a very foole and idiot. Yet other were incontrary opinion of him: who confidering more deeply the man, perceived in his nature a certaine secret constancie and the maiestie of a lion. But Fabius selse when he was called to serve the common-weale, did quickly shew to the world, that which they tooke for dulnesse in him, was his grauity, which neuer altered for no cause or respect; and that which other judged searefulnesse in him, was very wisedome. And where he shewed himself not hastie nor sodaine in any thing, it was found in him an affured and fetled constancy. Wherefore when he came to consider the great foueraignty of their common-weale, and the continuall warres it was in, he did vie his body to all hardnes, and brought vp himfelf therewithall, that he might be the betterable to ferue in the field: and he gaue himselfe much to eloquence also, as a necessary instrument to perswade souldiers vnto reason. His tongue likewise did agree with his conditions, and manner oflife. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfeire finenes in his speech, but his words derstood them, imagining his senses had bene gone. But he contrarily being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had faid, and thus he began to speake vnto them: That he maruelled why they had so highly praised that in him, which was common to many other captaines, and wherin fortune dealt with the in equalitie alike, & all this while they had forgotten to speak of the best & most notable thing that was in him, which was, that no ATHENIAN had ever worne blacke gowne through his occasion, And fure so was he a noble and worthy person. For he did not onely flew himfelfe mercifull and courteous, euen in most weightie matters of gouernment among so enuious people and hatefull enemies: but he had this judgement also to think, that the most noble acts hedid were these, that he neuer gaue himselfe to hatred, enuy, nor choler, to be reuenged of his most mortal enemy, without mercy shewed towards him, though he had comir. ted vnto him such absolute power & sole gouernment among them. And this made his surname be Olympius (as to fay divine or celestiall) which otherwise for him had bene too proud and arrogant a name, because he was of so good and gentle a nature, and for that in so great libertie he had kept cleane hands and videfiled: euen as we esteeme the gods authors of all good, and causers of no cuill, and so worthy to gouerne and rule the whole monarchy of the world. And not as Poets say, which do confound our wits by their follies, and fond fainings, and are also contrary to themselues, considering that they call heauen (which containeth the gods) the euer. lasting seate, which trembleth not, and is not driven nor moved with winds, neither is darkned with clouds, but is alwayes bright and cleare, and at all times shining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and mansion place of the eternal God, only happie and im. mortall: and afterwards they defcribe it themselves, full of diffentions, and enmities, of anger, and passions, which do nothing become wise and learned men. But this discourse peraduenture would be better spoken of in some other booke. Now the troubles the ATHENIANS felt imme. diatly after Pericles death, made them then lament the losse of so noble a member. For those who vnpatiently did brooke his great authority while he liued, because it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other speakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confesse, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor grave, with lenitie and mercy, then was his. And that most hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, did then most plainely appeare vnto them, to have bene the manifest rampire and bulwarke of the safety of their whole state and common weale: such corruption and vice in gouernment of the state did then spring vp immediatly after his death, which when he was aliue, he did euer suppresse and keepe vnder, in such sort, that either it did not appeare at all, or at the least it came not to that head and libertie that such faults were committed, as were vnpossible to be remedied.

were every grave and profound, and his fentences even grafted in him by nature, and (as fome fay) were much like Thueydides fayings. As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praise of his sonne; who died when he came out of his Consulship, which is yet extant to be seene. Now as for him, having bone fluetimes chosen Consull, in his first yeare of his Confulship, he triumphed ouer the LIGVRIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coast of Genva) who being overthrowne by him in a great battell, where they had loft many men, they were compelled to go their way, and to take the ALPES for their fuccour and durft no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALY, whereupon they did confine. Hannibal entring ITALY afterwards with a great army, and having wonne the first battell necre vnto the river of TREBIA: he passed further, and went through THVSCAN, wasting and destroying all the country as he paifed by. This made Rome quake for feare. Besides they saw many signes and token's force common vito them, as thundring, lightning and fuch other like: but other also morestrange, neuer seene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certain targets were wa xen all bloudy of themselues, and that about the city of Antium they found wheate eares. which were all bloudy when they were reaped: that there fell from heaven burning stones, all in a flame of fire: and in the countrey of the PHALERIAN'S how the element seemed to open and many little written icroles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written these words, word for word: Mars doth now handle his weapons. But all these fignes and wonders did nothing appalle nor daunt the boldnesse of Caius Flaminius, Consult then: who besides the naturall great courage, and aspiring mind he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reason increased in him, by the wonderf. It good successe he had before. For, notwithstanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his feilow Confail stood against his intent: he for all that did giue battell to the GAVLEs, in despight of them all, and wanne the victory. Likewise, though all these fignes and wonders in the ayre, did greatly trouble & amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he faw no apparant cause to be troubled withall. But he vnderstanding the small number of his enemies, and Jacke of mony that was among them: gaue counfell, & was of opinion that they should pariently for beare a litle, and not to hazard battell against a man, whose army had bene long trained in wars, and by many foughten fields was grown valiant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they should send aide to their subjects, and other their allies and confederates, as need required, to keep their cities still vnder their obedience: in themeane season by tract of time, to weare out Hannibals force and power, which was like straw set on fire, that straight giueth forth a blase, and yet hath no substance to hold fire long, When Fabrus had thus faid inough to perswade Flaminius, yet it would not finke into Flaminius head: for faid he, I will not tarie vntill the wars come to Rome gates, neither will I be brough to fight vpon the walles of the city to defend it, as Camillus did, that fought within the city him felse in old rim. Wherupon he commanded his captaines to set out their bands to the field and he himselfe tooke his horse-backe: which vpon the suddaine, without any cause was so affeard and took fo on with himselfe, that he cast the Consult to the ground with his head forward. For all this fall he would not change his mind, but held on his journey toward Hannibal, and present ted him battell in THUSCAN, by the lake called Thrasimena, which is the lake of PERVSIA. This battell was so fiercely fought on both sides, that notwith standing there was such a terrible earthquake therewhile, that some cities were ouerthrowne and turned topsie turuie, some rivers had their streames turned against their course, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in sunder & broken open yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any fuch thing at all. Flaminius the Consul selfe was slaine at that battel, after he had in his own person done many valiant acts, and many of the worthiest gentlemen and valiant souldiers of his army lay dead about him: there sidue being fled, the slaughter was great, for the bodies slaine were fifteene thousand, and some ny prisoners left aliue. After this ouerthrow, Hannibal made all the search he could possibly to find the body of Flaminius, to bury him honourably, because of his valiant nesses but he could ne uer be found amongst the dead bodies, neither was it euer heard what became of it. Now as touching the first overthrow at TREBIA, neither the General that wrote it, nor the post that brought the first newes to Rome, told the troth of it as it was, but fained that the end was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the best. But of this battel, so soone as the Prator Pomponius had received the newes, he called all the people to counfell, where without difguifing or diffembling at all, he plainly faid thus vnto them: My Lords, we have lost the battel, our army is ouerthrow and the Confull himselfe is flaine in the field: wherefore, consider what you have to do, and provide for your fafety. These words spoken to the people, as it had bene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from the sea to put them in danger, did so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole citie for feare, that they were all in amaze, and knew nor what to determine. Yet in the end they all agreed that it stood them upon to have a chiefe magistrate, called in Latine Dictator, that should be a man of courage, and could stoutly vse it without sparing or searing any person. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the onely man meete to be chosen, as he, whose noble courage and graue behauiour was answerable, to the dignitie and foueraigntie of the office; and moreover, that to his gravitie and wifedomethere was joyned (by reasonable age) strength of body, and valiantnesse with experience. This counsell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dictator, who named Lucius Fabius Di. Minutius Generall of the horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would grant chair. him he might have his horse in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expreffely forbidden by an ancient order. Either because they thought the chiefest force of their armie did confist in their footemen, which caused the making of this law: whereby the Generall should be amongst them in the day of the battell, and in no wife should for sake them. Or els because the authority of this magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King: Yet all this notwithstanding, they were willing thereunto, and the warres, that the Dictator should have absolute power over the people. Fabius at his first coming, because he would shew the maiestie and dignitie of his office, that every man should be the more obedient and ready at his commandement: when he went abroade, he had foure and twenty The Mafergeants before him, carying the bundels of rods, and axes. And when one of the Confuls bins the came to him, he sent a sergeant to command his bundell of rods that were caried before him, to Diffator. be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layd aside: and that he should come and speake with him, as a private man. And first to make a good foundation, and to begin with the Fabius reliferuice of the gods, he declared vnto the people, that the losse they had received, came through the rashnesse and will full negligence of their captaine, who made no reckning of the gods nor religion: and not through any default and cowardline se of the souldiers. And for this cause he did perswade them not to be affraid of their enemies, but to appeale the wrath of the gods, and to serue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but did confirme their valiancie with true religion and godlinesse: and besides did vtterly take away and asswage their feare of their enemies, by giving them certaine hope and affurance of the aide of the gods. Then were the holy bookes of the sibylles prophefies perufed, which were kept very fecret, and there. The sibylles in they found certaine ancient prophefies and oracles, which spake of the present missortunes propheses. of the time. But what was contained therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered to any person. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open affembly of the people, made a folemne vow vnto the gods, Fabius 200 that he would facrifice all the profits & fruits that should fall the next yeare, of sheep, of sowes, of milch-kine, and of goats in all the mountaines, champion countrey, rivers or medowes of I-TALLE. And he would celebrate playes of musicke, and shew other fights in the honour of the gods, and would bestow upon the same the summe of three hundreth three and thirtie Sestercians, and three hundreth three and thirtie Romains pence, and a third part ouer. All which fum reduced into Grecian mony, amounteth to fourescore & three thousand, five hundreth. and fourescore and three silver drachmaes, and two oboles. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why he did deuide it by three. vnlesse it were to extoll the power of the number of three: because it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of divers numbers, and containeth in it selfethe first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius having brought the people to hope and trust to have the ayde and fauour of the gods, made them in the end the better disposed to line well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the gods would fend good lucke and prosperity vnto men through their valiantnesse and wildome did straight set forwards vnto Hanibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully refolued to weare out his strength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increase his pouertie by the long spending of his owne money, and to Fabina do confume the finall number of his people, with the great number of his fouldiers. Fabius camped ingreguing the high places of the mountaines our of all denotes of his enemies boyle. alwaies in the strong and high places of the mountaines, out of all danger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemies so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal remoued, he followed him straight, and would be alwayes necrehim, but neuer forfooke the hils, neither would he come so neere him, as that he should be enforced to fight against his will. Yet alwayes he followed the enemy at his taile, and made him cuerafeard of him, thinking still that he sought to get the vantage, to give the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this fort, he became difliked of enery body: for enery man both in his owne campe, and abroad, spake very ill of him openly and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better then a rancke coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiuing his great reach and policy, and forefeeing his manner of fight, faw there was no remedy, but by plaine force or flight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delay would ouerthrow the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein onely confisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his souldiers should fall away and dye, and his money wax scant, and himselfe should grow the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratagemes and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wreftler, to feeke out all the trickes he could to give his adversarie the fall. For suddenly he would go and giuealarum to his campe: by and by againe he would retire, Another time he would remoue his campe from one place to another, and give him fome aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuice out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued fill resolute in the first determination : that delay of fight was the best way so to ouerthrow him. Howbeit Minutius, Generall of his horsemen, did trouble him much: for he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauing of a lustie courage crept into opinion with the fouldiers, by his hote fury and defire to fight. Which wrought much in them, and fo firred vp their courages, that they mocked Fabius altogether. and called him Hannibals schoole-master: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valiant captaine, and worthy Romaine. This made Minutius looke high, and have a proud opinion of himselfe, mocking Fabius because he ever-lodged on the hils, with saying the Dictator would make them goodly sports, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALIE before their faces. Moreouer he asked Fabius friends, whether he would in the end lodge his campe in the skie, that he did climbe vp so high vpon mountaines, mistrusting the earth: or else that he was so affraide, his enemics would find him out, that he went to hide himselfe in the cloudes. Fabrus friends made report of these iests, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare fuch reproachfull words as were spoken of him. But Fabius answered them: If I should yeeld to that you counsell me, I should shew my selfea greater coward then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and spightefull words. For it is no shame for a man to stand searefull and icalous of the welfare and safety of his countrey: but otherwise to be afeard of the wagging of euery straw, or to regard enery common prating, it is not the part of a worthy man of courage, but rather of a base minded person, to seeke to please those whom he ought to command and gouerne, because they are but fooles. After this, Hannibal chanced to fall into a great errour: for intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the plaines, where there was plenty of victuals, and store of pasture to feede his horse and cattell : he commanded his guides to bring him straight after supper, into the plaine of CASINVM. They mistaking his words, and not vnderstanding well what he said, because his ITALIAN tongue was but meane, tooke one thing for another, and so brought him and his army to the end of a field neere the citic of CASILINVM, through the middest of the which runneth a river, the Romaines call Vulturnus. Now the countrey lying by it, was a valley compassed in with mountaines round about, sauing that the river went to the sea: where leauing his owne bankes, it spreadeth abroad into the marrishes, and bankes of fand very deepe, and in the end fell into that part of the sea which is most dangerous, and where was neither fuccour nor couert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a facke, Fabius that knew the countrey, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabouts, followed him steppe by steppe, and stopped his passage, where they should have come out of the valley, with foure thousand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the straight, and disposed the rest of his army vpon the hangings of the hilles, in the most apt and sit places all about. Then with his light horsemen he gaue a charge vpon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hannibals army by and by out of order, and so there were flaine eight hundreth of his men. Whreupon Hannibal would haue remooued his campe thence immediatly: and knowing then the fault his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the danger wherein they had brought him, he roundly truffed them vp, and hung them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the tops of the hils, and to win them from their strength, he faw it was impossible, and out of all hope. Wherfore perceiuing his fouldiers both affraid and difcouraged, for that they faw themselves hemmed in on all sides. without any order to escape, Hanibal determined to deceive Fabius by a device. He caused Hannibals fraight two thousand oxen to be chosen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their fraigeme. fpoiles, and tied to their hornes light bundels of reedes, and fallow faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commanded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they saw any signall or token lift up in the aire in the night, they should then straight set fire on those bundels and bunches, and drive vp the beasts to the hils, towards the waies where the enemies lay. Whilest these things were a preparing, he on the other side ranged his army in order of battell, and when night came, caused them to march faire and softly. Now these beasts, whilest the fire was but little that burnt vpon their hornes, went but faire and softly vp the hill from the foore of the mountaines from whence they were driven: in fo much as the heardmen that were on the top of the mountaines, wondered maruellously to see such flames of fire about the hornes of fo many beafts, as if it had beene an army marching in order of battell with lights and torches. But when their hornes came to be burne to the stumpes, and that the force of the fire did frie their very flesh, then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to sinke their heads, whereby they did fet one another on fire. Then left they their foft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extreme paine they felt, began to runne here and there in the mountaines, carying fire still about their hornes, and in their tailes, and set fire or all the boughes and coppefies they passed by. This was a strange sight to look vpon, and did much amaze the Romaines that kept the passages of the mountaines, for they thought they had beene men that ranne here and there with torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a maruellous feareand trouble, supposing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuiron them on all fides, to as they durft no more keepe the paffages which they were commanded, but forfaking their straights, began to flie towards their maine and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horfemen immediatly possessed the straights that were kept; by reafon whereof, all the rest of his army marched out at their ease and leisure, without seare or danger, norwith standing that they were loden and troubled with maruellous great spoiles, and of all kind of forts. Fabius then perceived very well the fame nigh , that it was but a fleight of Hannibal; for some of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his army. Whereupon fearing to fall vpon some ambush by reason of the darke night, he kept his men in battell ray, without stirring, or making any noyse. The next morning by breake of day, he began to follow his enemies by the tracke, and fell vpon the taile of the rereward, with whom he skirm shed within the straights of the mountaines, and so did distresse somewhat Hannibals army. Hannibal thereupon fent out of his vauntgard a certaine number of Spaniards (very lufty and numble fellows that were yied to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who coming downe, and fetting vpon the Romaines that were heavie armed, flue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they despised Fabius the more, and thought worse of him then they did before, because his pretence and determination was, not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wisedome and policie to ouerthrow him, whereas he himselfe by Hannibal was first finely handled and deceived. Hannbial then to bring Fabius fur- Hannibal ther in diffiking and fuspition with the Romaines, commanded his fouldiers when they came stationally neare any of Fabrus lands, that they should burne and destroy all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wife to medle with Fabius lands, nor any thing of his, and did purpofely appoint a garifon to feethat nothing of Fabius should miscary, nor yet take hurt. This was straight caried to Rome, which did therby the more incense the people against him. And to help it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceased crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus speciall procurement and perswasion: who of himselse had no cause to mislike with F4bius, but onely because he was Minutius kinsmen (generall of the horseman) and thought that the ill opinion they beare to Fabius, would turne to the praise and advancement of Minutius. The Senate also were much offended with Fabius, for the composition he made with Hannibal, R 2 touching the prisoners taking of either side. For it was articled betweene them, that they should change prisoners, deliuering man for man, or else two hundreth and fiftie filuers drachmas for a man, if the one chanced to have moe prisoners then the other. When exchange was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his hands of Romaine prisoners, two hundred and fortie moe then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commanded there should be no money sent to redeeme them, and greatly found fault with Fabius for making this accord : because it was neither honourable, nor profitable for the common-weale; to redeeme men that cowardly suffered themselues to be taken prisoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderstanding it, did patiently beare this displeasure conceiued against him by the Senate. Howbeir hauing no mony, and meaning to keep his word, & not to leaue the poore citizens prisoners behind him he fent his fon to Rome, with commission to fell his lands, and to bring him money immediatly. The yong man went his way to Rome, and fold his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the prisoners, and sent their ransome vnto Hannibal. Many of the prisoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay him their ransome:but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ransome freely. Afterwards being called to Rome by the priests to do certain solemne sacrifices, he lest the ar-Falimilea. my in charge with Minutius to gouerne the fame in his absence, with condition not to set vpon the enemy, nor to fight with him at all: the which not only by his authoritie he did expressely forbidhim, but also as his very friend, he did warne and intreat him in no wise to attempt. How. beit Minutum litle regarding his commandements or requests, so soone as Fabius backe was turned, began to be somewhat lustie, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongst the rest. Minutius perceiuing Hamibal had sent a great part of his army abroade to forrage and get vi-Etuals, came and fer your them that remained behind, and draue them into their campe, with great flaughter, and did put them in a maruellous feare that were faued, as men that looked for no lesse, but to haue bin besieged in their campe. Afterwards also, when their whole army came together againe, he retired backe in spight of them all, and lost not a man. This exploit set Mi. metrus in a pride, and brought the fouldiers to be more rash then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrow went with speed to Rome, and therethey made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, faid : he was more afeard of Minutius prosperity, then of his owne aduersitie. But the common people reioyced maruellously, and made great shew of ioy vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlinesse, but with slat treafon. Furthermore, hedid accuse the Nobility and greatest men of Rome, saying: that from the first beginning they had laid a plot to draw these warres out at length, onely to destroy the peoples power and authority, having brought the whole common weale to the state of a monarchie, and into the hands of a private person: who by 1 is remissenesse and delayes, would giue Hannibal leysure to plant himselse in ITALY, and by time giue open passage to the Car-THAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send Hannibal a second aide and armie, to make a full conquest of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing these words, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried nor about the answering of the accusations the Tribune had burthened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatch these facrifices and ceremonies of the gods, that he might speedily returne agains to the campe, to punish Minutius, for breaking his commandement, in fighting with the enemy. He had no fooner spoken these words, hut there arose a maruellous tumult and hurley burley presently among the people, for the danger Minutus stood in then, because the Dictator had absolute power and authoritie to imprison and put to death whom he thought good, without ordinarie course of law or araignement. Moreouer, they did iudge, since Fabius had of late left his accustomed mildnesse and affabilitie, that he would grow to such seueritie in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appeale him. Wherefore every man held their peace for feare, fauing only Metellus the Tribune: he having authority by vertue of his office, to fay what he thought good, and who only of all other kept still his place and authority, when any Distator was chosen. Then all the officers that were put down, instant-The crue tv ly befought the people not to forfake Minutius, nor to fuffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his sonne, who strook off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and ouercome them, for breaking his commandement. And began to perswade them further, to take this tyrannicall power of the Dictatorship from Fabius: and to put their affaires into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them fafely to paffe. The people were tickled maruellously with these seditions words, but yet they durst not force Fabius to refigne his Dictatorship, though they bare him great grudge, and were angry with him in their hearts. Howbeit they ordained that Minuteus thenceforth should have equall power and autho- The Differity with the Dictator in the warres; a thing that was neuer seene nor heard of before, and yet the tor and gevery same done in that fort againe, after the battell of CANNES. For Marcus Iunius being at that borfomen time Dictator in the campe, they did chuse another Dictator at Rome, which was Fabius Buteo, made equal to name and create new Senators in the place of those that were slaine in the battell. But after he in authorihad named them, and restored the full number againe of the counsell of the Senate, he discharged the selfe same day the sergeants that caried the axes before him, and sent away the train that waited vpon him, and did so put himselfe in prease of the people in the market place, and followed his own peculiar bufineffe as a private perfon. Now the Romaines imagined, that when Fabius should see how they had made Minutius equall in authoritie with him, it would grieve him to the heart for very anger: but they came short to judge of his nature, for he did not thinke that their folly should hurt or dishonour him at all. But as wise Diogenes answered one that faid Diogenes vnto him, looke, they mocke thee : tush (faid he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby that he words, tooke them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius took enery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and did comfort himselfe with the Philosophers rules and examples: who did maintaine, that an honest and wise man, can no way be injured nor dishonored. For all the displeasure he received by the peoples folly, was in respect of the commonwealth: because they had put a sword into a mad mans hand, in giving Minutius authoritie to follow his rash humor, and fond ambition in the wars. Wherefore, fearing lest he being blinded with aine glory, and prefumptuous opinion of himselfe, should rashly (and vpon a head) hasten tod some great hurt before he came to the campe, he departed suddenly out of Rome without any mans knowledge, to return eagaine to the campe, where he found Minutius fo proud and Minutius four, that he was not to be dealt with. For he would needs haue the authority to command the pride. whole army when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not confent to that, but deuided the one halfe of the army betweene them thinking it better he should alone command the one half. then the whole army by turnes. So he chose for himselfe, the first and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the fecond and fourth, and deuided also betweene them the aide of their friends. And when Minutius made his boast, that the maiesty of the highest magistrate was brought lower for his fake, Fabius told him that he might thinke, if he were wife, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would needes contend against his companion, yet he should have a special! regard and confideration, that having wonne now the citizens good wils, by whom he was fo much honored, he should have no lesse care of their health and fafety, then he had, who was now troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his lefton for a counterfeit mock, after old mens maners and fashion; and so taking the one half of the army vitto him, went and lodged alone by himselse. Hannibal hearing of their jarre and squaring together, sought straight oportunity to make their discord finely to serue his turne. Now there was a hil between both their campes not very hard to be won, & it was an excellent place to lodge a campe fafely in, and was very fit and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, did feeme afar offto be very plaine and euen ground, because they had no couert of wood to shadow them, yet were there many ditches and little vallies in them wherefore Hannibal though he might eafily haue taken it at his pleasure if he had listed, did let it alone in the middest betweene them, for a baite to draw out his enemies to battell. Now when Hannibal faw Fabius and Minutius Hannibal lodged afunder, he placed certaine bands in the night among those ditches and vallies. After-laid ambush wards the next morning by breake of day, he fent a small number of men openly to winne this for Minuhill:hoping by this policy to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out indeed. For first Minutius fent thither his light horsemen, & afterwards all his men at armes: and lastly perceiving that Hannibal himselfe came to releeue his menthat were vponthe hill, he himselfe marched forward also with all the rest of his army in order of battell, and gaue a hot charge vpon them that defended the hill, to drive them thence. The fight continued equall agood space betweene them both, vntill such time as Hannibal saw his enemie come directly within his danger, and shewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had laid in ambush:he straight raised the signall he had given them. They vpon that discovered all together. and with great cries did fet vpon the rereward of the Romaines, & flue a great number of them at the first charge; and did put the rest in such a seare and disorder, as it is vnpossible to expresse in Then was Minutus rash brauery and fond boasts much cooled, when he looked first vpon one captaine, then you another, and faw in none of them any courage to tary by it, but rather that they were all ready to run away. Which if they had done, they had bene cast away every man: for the NVMIDIANS finding they were the stronger, did disperse theselues all about the plaine, killing all straglers that fled. Minutius souldiers being brought to this danger and distresse, which Fabius foresaw they would fall into; and having vpon this occasion his army ready ranged in order of battel, to see what would become of Minutius, not by report of messengers, but with his own eyes: he got him to a litle hill before his campe, where when he saw Minutius & all his men compaffed about on every fide, and even ftaggering & ready to flie, and heard befides their cries not like men thathad harts to fight, but as men scared, & ready to flie for feare to saue theselues: he clapped his hand on his thigh, and fetched a great figh, faying to those that were about him: O gods, how Minutius is gone to cast himselfe away, sooner then I looked for, and later then he defired. But in speaking these words, he made his ensignes march on in haste, crying out aloud; O my friends, we must dispatch with speed to succour Minutius: for he is a valiant man of person, and one that loueth the honour of his country. And though with ouermuch hardinesse he hath ventured too farre, and made a fault, thinking to have put the enemies to flight: time serueth not now to accuse him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he presently brake the Nomines, and disperfed them, that lay waiting in the fields for the Romaines, which they thought would have fled. Afterwards he went further, & did fet vpon them that had given charge vpon the rereward of Minutius battel, where he flue them that made head against him. The residue, searing lest they should falinto the danger they had brought the Romaines vnto before they were enuironed in of all sides, did turne taile straight to Fabius. Now Hannibal seeing this charge, and considering how Fabius in person, with more courage then his age required, did make a lane in the middest of those that fought against the side of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was the made the battell to ceasife, and commanded to found the retreate, & fo drew backe his menagain into his campe, the Romaines being very glad alfothey might retire with fafety. They say Hamibal in his retiring, said merrily to his friends: Haue not I told you (Sirs) many a time and oft, of the hanging cloud we saw on the top of the mountaines, how it wold breake out in the end with a tempest that would fall vpon vs? After this battell, Fabius having stript those that were left dead in the field, retired agains to his owne campe, and spake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his campe, affembled his fouldiers, and spake thus to them: My friends, not to erre at all, enterprifing great matters, it is athing passing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faults that are pail and done, it is the part of a wife & valiant man. For my selie, I acknowledge I haue no lesse occasion to praise fortune, then I haue also cause to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I have learned by experience in one litle pecce of a day; and that is this, That I am not able to command, but am my selfe fitter to be gouerned and commanded by another; and that I am but a foole to stand in mine own conceipt, thinking to ouercome those, of whom it is more honour for me to confesse my selfe to be ouercome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth shall be he, who alone shall command you in all things. And to let him know that we do all acknowledge the fauour which we have prefently received at his hands, I will leade you to give him thanks, and will my felfe be the first man to offer to obey him in all that he shall comand me. These words being spoken, he commanded his enfigne-bearers to follow him, & he himself marched formost towards Fabius campe. When he came thither, he went directly to the Dictators tent: whereat enery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to meete him, Minutius after he had fet down his enfignes at his feete, faid with a loud voice; ô father: and his fouldiers vnto Fabius fouldiers; ô masters: which name the bondmen that are infranchised, do vse to them that have manumissed them. Afterwards every man being filent, Minutius began aloud to fay vnto him: My lord Dictater, this day you have won two victories: the one of Hannibal, whom valiantly you have overcome the fecond, of my felfe your companion, whom also your wisdome and goodnesse hath vanquished, By the one, you have faued our lives and by the other, you have wisely taught vs. So haue we also bene ouercome in two forts: the one by Hannibal to our shame, and the other by vour selfe, to our honor and preservation. And therefore do I now call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honor you acknowledging my selfe more bound vnto you for the present grace and fauour I haue received of you, then ynto my naturall father that begot me. For by him only I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all these honest citizens littes have bene saued. And having spoken these words, he embraced Fabius: and so did the souldiers also, heartily embrace together, and kitse one another. Thus the joy was great through the whole campe, and one was so glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their cheekes for ioy. Now when Fabius was afterwards put out of his office of Dictatorthip, there were new Confuls chosen againsthe two first followed directly Fabius former order he had begun: for they kept themselves from giving Hannibal any battell, and did alwayes send aid to their subjects & friends, to keep them from rebellion, vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of Therashness meane birth, and known to be very bold and rash) by flattering of the people, wan credit among of terentia them to be made Confull. Then they thought that he by his rashnesse and lacke of experience, Terenting would incontinently hazard battel, because he had cried out in al the assemblies before, that this Parro, war would be cuerlasting, so long as the people did chuse any of the Fabians to be their generals; Panlas Aand vanted himselfe openly, that the first day he came to see his enemies, he would ouerthrow fuls. the. In giving out these brave words, he affembled such a power that the ROMAINES never saw so great a number together against any enemy that they euer had: for he put into one campe 88000 fighting men. This made Fabius and the other ROMAINES, men of great wisedome and indgement, greatly affraid because they faw no hope for Rome to rise againe, if it fortuned that maines they should lose so great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other campe you Consul, called Paulus Æmilius, a man very skilfull & expert in wars, but ill beloued of the common people, whose fury he yet feared, for that they had condemned him a litle before to pay a 88000. great fine to the treasury; and after he had somewhat comforted him, he began to perswade and encourage him to refift the fond rafhnesse of his companion, telling him, that he should have afmuch to do with Terentius Parro for the preservation and safety of his country, as to fight with Paulus, Hannibal for defence of the same. For they were both Martiall men, and had a like desire to fight, the one because he knew not wherein the vantage of his strength consisted, and the other because he knew very well his weaknes. You shall have reason to beleeue me better, for matters touching Hannibal, then Terentius Varro: for I dare warrant you, if you keepe Hannibal from battell, but this yeare, he shall of necessity, if he tarry, consume himselfe, or else for shame be driven to flie with his army. And the rather, because hitherto (though he seeme to be lord of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his part; and moreouer because there remaines at this day in his campe not the third part of his army, he brought with him out of his countrey. Vnto these persivasions, the Consull(as it is reported) answered thus: When I looke into my selfe, my lord Fabins, me thinks my best way were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once again to light into the hands & voices of our citizens. Therfore, fith the efface of the common wealth fo requireth it, that it behoueth a man to do as you have faid, I will do my best endeuor to shew my selfe a wise captain, for your sake only, rather then for all other that should aduise me to the contrary. And so Paulus departed from Rom E with this mind. But Terentius his copanion would inany case they should command the whole army by turnes, each his day by himselfe; and went to encampe hard by Hannibal, by the river of AVFIDE, neere vnto the village called CANNES. Now when it came to his day to comand by turnes, early in the morning he caused the fignallof Aufdin Re battelto be set out, which was a coate-armour of skarler in graine, that they did lay out vpon the pauilió of the generall: so that the enemics at the first sight, began to be affraid, to see the lustines of this new come generall, and the great number of fouldiers he had also in his hoast, in comparison of them that were not halfe so many. Yet Hannibal of a good courage, commanded every man to arme, and to put themselues in order of battell: and himselse in the meane time taking his horse backe, followed with a few, gallopped vp to the top of a litle hill not very steep, from whence he might plainly discerne all the ROMAINE's campe, and saw how they did range their men in order of battell. Now one Gifcon(a man of like state and nobility as himselfe) being with him at that time, told him, that the enemies seemed afarre off to be a maruellous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forchead, answered him: Yea said he, but there is another thing more to be wondred at then you thinke of Gifcon. Gifcon straight asked him: What: Marry faith he, this: that of all the great number of fouldiers you fee yonder, there is not a man of them called Gifeon as you are. This merry answer deliuered contrary to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great weighty matter, made them all laugh agood. So down the hill they came laugh ing aloud, and told this prety iest to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ran ouer all the campe, in so much as Hannibal himselfe could not hold from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN fouldiers perceiuing this, began to be of a good courage, imagining that their Generall would not be so merily disposed as to fall a laughing, being so neere danger, if he had not perceived himselfe a great deale to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore, he shewed two policies of a skilfull Captaine in the battel. The first was, the cituation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, so as they had the wind on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raifed a sharpe dust out of the open fandy vally, and paffing ouer the CARTHAGINIAN'S fquadron, blew full in the Ro-MAINES faces, with fuch a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne rankes, The second policy was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either fide of his wings, the best and valiantest souldiers he had in all his army: and did fill vn the middest of his battell with the worst of his men, which he made like a point, and was farther out by a great deale, then the two wings of the front of his battell. So he commanded those of the wings, that when the ROMAINES had broken his first front, and followed those that game backe, whereby the middeft of his battell should leave an hollow place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compasse of his two wings: that then they should set vpon them on both fides, and charge their flankes immediatly, and fo inclose them in behind. And this was cause of greater slaughter. For when the middle battell began to give backe, and to receive the Romaines within it, who purfued the other very hotly, Hannibals battell changed her forme; and where at the beginning it was like a point, it became now in the middest like a cressant or half Moone. Then the captaines of the chosen bands that lay out in both the wings, made their mento turn, some on their left hand, & some on the right, & charged the Romaines on the flanks, and behind, where they were all naked fo they killed all those that could not save themselues by slying before they were enuironed. They say also, that there fel out another mischiefe by misfortune vnto the horfemen of the Romaines, and by this occasion. The horfe of Paulus Émilius the Consull being hurt, did throw his maister on the ground: whereupon those that were next him, did light from their horse backs to helpe him. The residue of the horsemen that were a great way behind him, seeing them light, thought they had bene all commanded to light: hereupon euery man forsooke their horse, and fought it out on soote. Hannibal when he faw that, faid: yea mary, I had rather haue them fo, then deliuered me bound hand and foote. But for these matters the historiographers do dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Consuls, Paulus E- Varro faued himselfe by his horse, with a few following him, within the city of VENVSA. Paulus being in the middest of the throng of all the army, his body full of arrowes that stucke fast in his wounds, and his heart fore loden with grieuous forrow and anguish, to see the ouerthrow of his men:was fet downe by a rocke, looking for fome of his enemies, to come and rid him out of his paine. But few could know him, his head and face was on fuch a gore bloud: infomuch as his friends & servants also passed by him & knew him not. And there was but one yong gentleman of anoble house of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knew him, who did his best endeuour to faue him. For he lighted on foot presently, and brought him his horse, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could faue himselfe for the necessity of his country, which now more then ever had need of a good and wife captaine. But he refused the gentlemans offer & his intreatie, & compelled him to take his horse back againe, though the teares ran down his cheeks for pity; and raifing himselfe up to take him by the hand, he said unto him: I pray youtell Fabins Maximus from me, & witnesse with me, that Paulus Amilius even to his last house hath followed his counfell, and did neuer swarue from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had deliuered these words, he bad Lentulus farewell:and running againe into the fury of the flaughter, there he died among his flaine com-50000 Romain Es, and 4000 taken priso ners: and other 10000 that were taken prisoners in two campes after the battell. When this noble victory was gotten, Hannibals friends gaue him counfell to follow his good fortune, andto enter Rome after the scattered number that fled thither: so as within few dayes following he might fup in their Capitoll. Amancannot eafily gesse what was the cause that stayed him, that he went not, vnlesse it was (as I thinke) some good fortune, or fauourable God toward the Ro-MAINES that withstood him, and made him afeard and glad to retire, Whereupon they say, that one Barca a CARTHAGINIAN, in his anger faid to Hannibal: Sir, you have the way to overcome, but you cannot vievictory. Notwithstanding, this victory made a maruellous change for him: for hereupon, all ITALY in maner came in to submitthemselves to him, where before he had no rown at commandement, nor any storehouse or port through all ITALY: yea he did maruellous hardly, and with much ado victuall his army with that he could daily rob and spoile, having no certaine place to retire vnto, nor grounded hope to entertaine these wars, but kept the field with his army, remouing fro place to place, as they had bin a great number of murtherers & theeues seathers. together. For the most part of the courty, did yeeld immediatly vnto him; as the city of CAPVA being the chiefest and greatest city of all ITALY but ROME, and did receive Hannibal, and were at his devotion. Thus we may plainly fee, that as the poet Euripides faith: It is a great mischiefe not onely to be driven to make triall of friends, but proofe also of captaines wildome. For that which before they accounted cowardlinesse and faint heart in Fabius, immediatly after the battell they thought it more then mans reason, and rather an heauenly wisdome & influence that follong forefaw the things to come, which the parties felues that afterwards felt the gaue litle credit vnto before. Vpon this occasion, Rome reposed incontinently all their hope and trust in Fabius, & they repaired to him for counfel, as they would have ran vnto some teple or altar for fanctuary. So as the first and chiefest cause of staying the people together from dispersing themfelues abroad as they did when Rome was taken by the GAVLES, was the only opinion & confidence they had in Fabius wildome. For where before he feemed to be a coward and timerous, when there was no danger nor misfortune happened; then when every man wept and cried out for forow, which could not helpe, & that all the world was so troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the city very modeftly, with a bold contenance, speaking courteously to every one, & did appease their womanish cries & Fabius conlamentations, & did forbid the common affemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead flames after corfe at their burials. Then he perfwaded the Senate to affemble in counfell, & did comfort vp those that were magistrates, and he alone was the only force & power of the city; for there was cannet. not aman that bare any office, but did cast his eye vpon Fabius, to know what he should do. He it was that caused the gates of the city straight to be warded, & to keepe those in for going their way that would have for faken the city. He moreover did appoint the time & place of mourning and did command who foeuer was disposed to mourne, that he should do it privately in his own dee for house, and to continue only but 30 daies. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, & that the mourning. city might be cleane from fuch vincleane things. So the feast of ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leave off the facrifices and procession they were wont to keepe on Geres day: then by their small number that were left, and forow of those that remained, to let their enemies vnderstand their exceeding great losse. For the gods delight to be served with glad & reioycing hearts, and with those that are in prosperity. But all this not with standing, what so cuer the priests wold haue done either to pacifie the wrath of the gods, or to turne away the threatnings of thefe finister signes, it was forthwith done For they did send to the oracle of Apollo, in the city of DE L PHE stone of Fabius kinfinen furnamed Pictor, And two of the Westall Nuns being defloured the onewas buried aliue according to the law and custome, and the other made her felfe away. But herin the great courage and noble clemency of the ROMAINES, is maruelloufly to be noted and The may regarded. For the Confull Terentius Varro returning backe to Rome, with the shume of his ex-naminal treme misfortune & ouerthrow, that he durft not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithstanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the city to meete him, & did hono- werthrows rably receive him Nay furthermore, those that were the chiefe magistrates & Senators, among Cannes. whom Fabius was one, when filence was made, they commended Varro much because he did not dispaire of the preservation of the common-weale after so great calamity, but did return againto the city, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vsing the authority of the law, & the seruice of the citizens, as not being altogether under foot, but standing yet in reasonable termes of good recourry But when they vinder frood that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other parts of Maximus. Iral v, then they began to be of good cheere again, & fent a new army and generals to the field, and claude among which the two chiefe generals were Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which lusgenerals in his life) was a man of speedy executio, of a quick hand, of a valiant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them that valiantly put themselues in any danger: by reason whereof ha uing to deale with another captaine alike venturous and valiant as himselfe, in all service and execution, he shewed the selfe boldnesse and courage that Hannibal did. But Fabius persisting still vpon his first determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hannibal, nor stirre him at all, yet continual warres would confume him and his army in the end, and bring them bothm nought, as a common wrettler that forceth his body aboue his naturall strength, doth in the end become a lame and brused man. Hereupon Posidonius writeth, that the one was called the Ro-MAINES fivord, and the other their target. And that Fabius constancy and resolutenes in wars to fight with security, and to commit nothing to hazard and danger, being mingled with Marcellus heate and fury, was that only which preserved the ROMAINES empire. For Hannibal meeting alwaies in his way the one that was furious as a ftrong running ftreame, found that his army was continually turmoyled & ouerharried and the other that was flow as a litle prety river, he found that his army ran foftly under him without any noise, but yet cotinually by litle & licle it did fil confirme & diminish him, until he saw himself at the last brought to that passe, that he was wear of fighting with Marcellus, and affraid of Fabius, because he fought not. For during all the time of their, wars, he had euer their two captaines almost against him, which were made either Pre. tors, Confuls or Proconfuls, for either of them both had bene five times before chosen Conful Yet us for Marcellus, Hannibal had laid in ambush for him in the fifth & last yeare of his Consul ship, where he fet you him on a sudden, and flew him. But as for Fabius, he layd many baites for him, and did what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambushes, and other warlike pol licies to entrap him, but he could never draw him within his danger. Howbeit at one time he but him to a little trouble, and was in good hope then to have made him fall vpon his ambush he had laid for him, and by this policy. He had coun erfeited letters written & fent vnto him from amb shlaid the city of Metapont to pray him to come to them, and they would deliuer their city into his liands: and withall, that fuch as were privy to the contents of the fame, defired no other thing but his repaire thither. These letters pretily quickned Fabius, infomuch as he was determined on night to haue taken part of his army, & to haue gone to them. But because the fignes of the birds did promise him no good successe, he left off his purpose. Soone after he vnderstood they wen counterfeit letters, made by Hannibals fine device to have drawn him out, and to have entrapped him, for whom himselfe lay in person in ambush neare the city, looking and waiting for his com ming: but the gods who would have him faued, were onely to be thanked for his happy feare Furthermore concerning the revolt of the cities that were subject vnto him, & the rising of their allies and friends against them: Fabius thought it farre better to intreat them curteously making them assamed without occasion to rebell against them, rather than openly to suspect them, and to deale straightly with those that were so to be suspected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabrus had a fouldier in his campe that was a Mars: An borne by nation a valiant man of his per. fon, & alfo of as noble a house, as any that were of all the allies of the Romarnus: who had practi fed with other his fellowes of the band he ferued in to go ferue the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practife he went about, gaue him no ill countenance for it, but calling him to him, he faid: I mult confesse there is no reckoning made of you, as your good service doth deserve, wherefore for this time (faith he)I blame the pety captaines only, which in such fort do bestow their goodwill and fauor rat adventure, and not by defert. But henceforth it shall be your owne fault if you'de not declare your minde vnto me, and betweene you and me make me priuy of your lacke and no ceffity. When he had spoken these words to him, he gaue him a very good horse for service, and did reward him with other honourable gifts, as men of good feruice and defert haue commonly bestowed on them. And this did so incourage his souldiers thenceforth, that he became a very fai hfull and feruiceable fouldier to the ROMAINES, For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horses, and such like as take vpon them to tame bruit beasts, should sooner make them leaue their fauage and churlish nature by gentle v sage and manning of them, then by beating, shackling of them. And so a gouernour of men, should rather correct his souldiers by patience gentlenetie, & clemency, then by rigor, violence, or feuerity. Otherwife he should handle them more rudely and sharpely then husbandmen doth fig-trees, oliue-trees, and wilde pomegarnats: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, do alter their hard and wild nature, and cause them in the end to bring forth good figs, oliues and pomegarnets. Another time certains captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their fouldiers which would ever co our of the campe, and leave his enfigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was. They anfwered him all together, that he was a very good fouldier, & that they could hardly find out fuch another in all their bands as he and therewithall they told him of some notable service they had feene him do in person. Wherupon Fabius made a diligent enquirie to know what the cause was that made him go fo off out of the campe: in the end he found he was in loue with a young woman, and that to go fee her was the cause he did so oft leave his ensigne, and did put his life in so great danger, for that the was fo farre off. When Fabius understood this, he fent certain fouldiers (ynknowing to the fouldier to bring the woman away he loued, and willed them to hide her in his tent, and then called he the fouldier to him, that was a Lvean tan borne, & taking him afide, faid vnto him thus: My friend, it hath bene told me, that thou hast lyen many nights out of the campe, against the law of armes, and order of the Romain Bs, but therwithall I vnderstand also that otherwise thouart an honest man, and therefore I pardon thy faults past, in consideration of thy good feruice but from henceforth I will give thee in cuftody to fuch a one as shall make me accompt of thee. The fouldier was blanke when he heard these words. Fabrus with that, caused the woman he was in loue with to be brought forth, and deliucred her into his hands, faying ynto him: This woman hereafter shall answer me thy body to be forth coming in the campeamongst vs: and from henceforth thy deeds shall witnesse for the rest, that thy love vnto this woman, may be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practife or intent. Thus much we find written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after fuch a fort, recoursed a- How Fabius gaine the city of TARENTYM, & brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had wan Tarenoftby treason. It fortuned there was a yong man in his campe, a TAR ENTINE borne, that had a fifter within TARENTYM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruellous dearely: nowthere was a captain, a Brytian borne, that fell in loue with her, & was one of those to who Hannibal had committed the charge of the city of TARENTVM. This gaue the yong fouldier the TARENTINE, very good hope and way, to bring his enterprise to good effect: wherupon he renealed his intent to Fabius, and with his privity fled from his campe, and got into the city of TA. RENTYM, giving it out in the city, that he would altogether dwell with his fifter. Now for a few daies at his first coming the BRVTIAN captaine lay alone by himselfe, at the request of the maid his fifter, who thought her brother had not known of her loue: & shortly after the yong fellow took his fifter afide, and faid vnto her: My good fifter, there was a great speech in the Romains campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefest captaines of the garison: I pray thee if it be so, letme know what he is: for so he be a good fellow, and an honest man (as they say he is) I care nonfor wars that turneth all things topfi-turney, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of. and still maketh vertue of necessity, without respect of shame. And it is a special good fortune, at suchtime as neither right nor reason rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His fifter hearing him speake these words, sent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loucs, and indeuored himfelfe to frame his fifters loue in better fort towards him, then it was before: by reason wherof, the captaine also began to trust him very much. So this yong TARENTINE saw it was very easie to win and turne the mind of this amorous and mercinary man, with hope of great gifts that were promifed him, and Fabius should performe. Thus do the most part of writers set downe this story. Howbeit some writers say, that this woman who wan the BRVTIAN captain, was not a TARENTINE, but a Brytian borne, whom Fabius it is faid, kept afterwards for his concubine, and that the underflanding the captain of the Brytians (who lay in garison within the city of Tarentym) was alfoa Brytian borne, and of her own native country, made Fabius privy to her intent, and with his consent, she coming to the walles of the city, spake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom she was by a handled in fuch fort, that she wan him. But whilest this geare was a brewing, Fabius, because he womans would traine Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote vnto the souldiers of RHEGIO, which belonged to the Romain Bs, that they should enter the borders of the Bryrians, and lay siege to the city of CAVL ON IA, and raze it to the groud. These RHEGIAN souldiers were about the nuber of 8000, and the most of them traitors, and runagates from one campe to another: and the worst fort of them and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, so that in losing them all, the losse were nothing to the common-wealth, & the forrow much lesse. So Fabius thought, that putting these fellowes out for a prey to Hannibal (as a stale to draw him from those quarters) he should plucke him by this meanes from Tarentym and so it came to passe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his army to intrap them; and in the meane time Fabius went to lay fiege to TERENTVM, where he had not lien fixe daies before it, but the yong man (who together with his fifter had drawn the BRYTIAN captain to this trea. fon) (tole out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, having taken very good markes of that fide of the wall the BRYTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promifed him to keep it fecret, and to fuffer them to enter, that came to affault that fide. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether upon the BRUTIANS executing this treason, but went himself in person to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time; and in the meane feafon, he gaue a general affault to all parts of the city (as well by fea as by land) with great shouts & cries. Then the BRVTIAN captain feeing all the citizens and garifons run to that part wherethey perceined the noise to be greatest, made a signall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought apace, wherupon himselfe with his copany scaled the wals and so wan the city. But it appeared here, that ambition ouercame him: for first he commanded they should kill all the BRYTIANS, because it should not be knowne he had won the city by tree son. But this bloudy policy failed him: for he missed not only of the glory he looked for but most deservedly he had the reproch of cruel: y and falshood. At the taking of this city, a marvel. lous number of the TARENTINES were flaine, besides there were sold 30000 of the chiefest of them, and all the city was facked: and of the spoile thereof was carried to the common store treat fure at Rome, 2000 talents. It is reported also, that when they did spoile and cary away all other spoiles lest behind, the recorder of the city asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to do with the gods, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius answered him: Let vs leave the Ta RENTINES their gods that be angrie with them. This notwithstanding, he caried from theme Hercules statue, that was of a monstrous bignesse, and caused it to be set vp in the Capitoll, and withall did fet vp his owne image in braffe on horsebacke by him. But in that act he shewed him felfe farre harder hearted then Marcellus had done, or to fay more truly, thereby he made the world know how much Marcellus curtefie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at: as we haue written in his life. Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTYM was befieged, h marched presently with all speed possible to raise the siege; and they say he had almost comein time, for he was within fortie furlongs of the city when he understood the troth of the taking of it. Then faid he out aloud, Sure the ROMAINES haue their Hannibal too; for as we wan TAREN TVM, so have we lost it. But after that, to his friends he said plainely (and that was the first time they ever heard him speake it) that he saw long before, and now appeared plainly, that they could not possibly with this small power keepe ITALY. Fabius made his triumph and entry into Rome the second time, by reason of taking this city: & his second triumph was much more honourable then the first, as of a valiant captaine that held out still with Hannibal, and easily met with all his fine policies, much like the flight trickes of a cunning wreftler, which caried not now the for mer roughnesse and strength any more, because that his army was given to take their ease, and growne to delicacie, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly also for thatig was fore wasted and diminished, through the sundry foughten battels and blowes they had bene at. Now there was one Marcus Linius a Romaine, that was governor of Tarentym at that time when Hannibal tooke it, and neuerthelesse kept the castell still out of Hannibals hands, and so held it untill the city came againe into the hands of the Romaines. This Liuius spited to see fuch honour done to Fabius, so that one day in open Senate, being drowned with enuy and ambition, he burst out and said: that it was himselfe, not Fabius, that was cause of taking of the citie of TARENTYM again. Fabius smiling to heare him, answered him openly: indeed thou faiest true. for if thou hadft not lost it, I had never won it again. But the Romaine's in all other respects die greatly honor Fabius, and specially for that they chose his son Consull He having already taken possession of his office, as he was dispatching certaine causes touching the wars, his father (whether it was for debility of his age, or to proue his fon) tooke his horse to come to him, and rode through the prease of the people that thronged about him, having busines with him. But his son feeing him coming a farre off, would not fuffer it, but fent an officer of his vnto him, to comand him to light off his horse, and to come on foot if he had any thing to do with the Consull. This commandement missiked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but said not a word: chinking with themselves, that the Consull did great wrong to his, fathers greatnesses. So he lighted straight, and went a good round pace to embrace his sonne, and said vnto him: You The father haue reason sonne, and do well to shew ouer whom you command, vnderstanding the authority of a Confull, which place you have received. For it is the direct course, by the which we & our ring and ancesters have increased the Romain empire: preferring ever the honor and state of our coun. trey, about father, mother, or children. And truly they fay, that Fabius great grandfather being the greatest and most noble person of Rome in his time, having five times bin Consull, and had obtained many triumphs, for divers honourable and fundry victories he had won: was contented after all these, to be his sonnes lieutenant, and to go to the warres with him, he being chosen Consull. And last of all, the Consull his sonne returning home to Rome a conquerour, in his triumphing chariot drawne with foure horses, he followed him on horsebacke also, in troope with the rest thinking it honor to him, that having authority over his son in the right of a sather, and being also the noblest man of all the citizens, so taken & reputed, neuerthelesse he willingly submitted himselfe to the law and magistrate, who had authority of him. Yet besides all this, he had far more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then those already spoken of. But it fortuned that this fon of Fabius died before him, whose death he tooke patiently, like a wise man, and a good father. Now the custome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neerest kinsman should make a funerall oration in his praise at their obsequies: he himselfe made the fame oration in honor of his fon, & did openly speake it in the market place, and moreover wrot in, and deliuered it out abroad. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was sent into Spain E, who draue out the Carthaginians from thence, after he had ouerthrowne them in many battels, and had conquered many great cities, and greatly advanced the honor and estimation of the state of Rome: for the which at his returne, he was a finuch, or rather more honored, beloued and effecmed, then any other that was in the city of Rome. Hereupon Scipio being made Confull, confi- Scipio Condered that the people of Rome looked for some great matter at his hands, about all other. Fit. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight against Hannibal in ITALY, he should but follow the old maner, and tread too much in the steps of the old man: whereupon he resolved immediatly to make wars in Africke, and to burne and destroy the country even vnto Carthaga gates, and so to transferre the wars out of ITALY into LIBYA, procuring by all possible device he could, to put it into the peoples heads, &to make the like of it. But Fabius contrarily, perfwading Fabius mass himself that the enterprise this yong rash youth tooke in hand, was vtterly to ouerthrow the comon-weale, or to put the state of Rome in great danger: denised to put Rome in the greatest counsell and feare he could possible, without sparing speech or deed he thought might serue for his purpose, Scipio 4. to make the people change from that minde. Now he could so cunningly worke his purpose, frience. what with speaking and doing, that he had drawne all the Senate to his opinion. But the people indged, it was the fecret enuie he bare to Scipioes glory, that drew him to encounter this device, only to blemish Scipices noble fortune, fearing, left if he shold happen to do some honorable sernice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwise to draw Hannibal out of ITALY) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bin too foft; or too negligent, to draw this war out to such a length. For my part, methinkes the only matter that moved Fabius from the beginning to be against Scipio, was the great care he had of the safety of the common-weale, by reafon of the great danger depending vpon fuch a resolution. And yet I do thinke also, that afterwards he went further then he should, contending too fore again st him (whether it were through ambition or obstinacie) seeking to hinder and suppresse the greatnesse of Scipio: considering also he did his best to perswade Crassus, Scipioes companion in the Consulship, that he should not grant vnto him the leading of the army, but if he thought good to go into Africke, to make warsvponthe Carthaginians, that he should rather go himself. And moreover, he was the let that they gaue him no mony for maintenance of these wars. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furnish himselfe as he could he leuied great sums of mony in the cities of Thus can, who for the great loue they bare him, made contributio towards his journy. And Crassus remained at home, both because he was a soft and no ambitious nor contentions man of nature as also, because he was the chiefest presate and high bishop, who by the law of their religion, was constrained to keepe Rome. Fabius seeing his labour loss that way, tooke againe anobigo bishop ther course to crosse scipio, denisting to stay the yong men at home, that had great desire to go this of Reme. ourney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all assemblies of the Senate and people, that Scipio was not contented onely to flie Hannibal, but that he would carie with him besides the whole force of ITALY that remained: alluring the youth with fweete baites of vaine hope and perswading them to leaue their wives, their fathers, mothers, and their country, evennow when their enemy knocked at Rome gates, who did cuer conquer, & was yet neuer conquered. These words of Fabius did so dampe the Romaines, that they appointed Scipio should furnish his journey onely with the army that was in Sicilia, saving that he might supply to them if he would, 300 of the best soldiers that had served him faithfully in Spain E. And so it doth appeare euen to this present, that Fabius both did and said all things, according to his wonted maner, and naturall disposition. Now Scipio was no sooner arrived in Africk E, but newes were brought to Rome incontinently, of wonderfull exploits, and noble feruice done beyond measure; and of great spoiles taken by him, which argued the troth of the newes. As the king of the NV MIDIANI taken prisoner, two campes of the enemies burnt and destroyed at a time, with losse of a great number of people, armor, & houses, that were consumed in the same eletters & posts for life running in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hannibal home, and to pray him to hunt no longer after vaine hope that would neuer hauc end, hafting himselfe with all speed posfible to come to the rescue of his country. These wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of such renowne and fame within Rome, that there was no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwith. standing defisted not to make a new request, being of opinion they should fend him a successor. alledging no other cause nor reason, but a common speech of every body that it was a dange rous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, fo great exceeding prosperity and good fuccesse, because it is a rare matter to see one man happy in all things. These words did so much mislike the people, that they thought him an envious troublesome man, or else they thought his age had made him fearefull; and that his courage failed with his strength, fearing Hannibal more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hannibal was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to re turne into Africk E, yet Fabius Would not grant, that the peoples ioy & fecurity they thought they were in, was altogether cleere, and without feare and mistrust; but gaue it out, that then they were in greatest danger, and that the common-weale was breeding more mischiese now then be fore. For when Hamibal (faidhe) shall returne home into Africk E, and come before Can-THAGE wals, the ROMAINES shall be lesse able to abide him there, then they have bene before and Scipio moreouer, shall meete with an army yet warme, and embrued with the bloud off many Prætors, Dictators, and Confuls of Rome, which they have overcome, and put to the fword in ITALY, with the sevn comfortable speeches, he still troubled and disquieted the whole city, perswading them that notwithstanding the warre was transferred out of ITALY int Africk E, yet that the occasion of feare was no lesse neere vnto Rome, then it was enerbe fore. But within short space after, Scipio having overcome Hannibal in plaine battell in the field, the people, because he died in so great pouerty, that when he was dead, they found nothing the house but a little iron spit. Now the Romaines buried not Fabius so, at the common charge of the city, but every man of beneuolence gave towards his funerall charge, a peece coine that caried the left value of their currant money: not for that he lacked ability to bring him to the ground, but only to honor his memory:in making his obsequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. THE COMPARISON OF Pericles with Fabius. .

§ ERE haue you heard what is written of these two great persons. And for as much as they have both left behind them many notable examples of vertue, as well in martiall matters, as in civill government, let vs begin to compare them together. First of all, Pericles began to gouerne the fest prosperity, & of greater power and wealth, then ever they had bene commonweale, at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chienuall maintenance of the same in security without danger of falling not so much for their worthinesse, as for their common power and felicity: where contrariwife Fabius acts fell out in the most dishonourable and vn fortunate time. that euer hapned to his countrey, in the which he did not onely keepe the city in good state from declining, but raifed it vp, and deliuered it from calamity, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and successe, the victories and triumphs of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deeds at armes of Tolmides, gaue good cause to Pericles, to entertaine his city in feasts, and playes, whilest he did gouerne thesame; and he did not find it in such ill case and distresse, that he was driven to defend Itby force of armes, or to conquer that againe which before was loft. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he faw before him many ouerthrowes, great flying away, much murder, great flaughters of the Generals of the Romain Earmies, the lakes, the plaines, the woods filled with scattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds & rivers running all agore-bloud (by reafon of the great flaughter) and the streame carying downe the dead bodies to the maine sea: did take in hand the government of his country, and by a course farre contrary to all other, he did so vnderprop and beare vp the fame, that he kept it from falling flat to the ground, among st those mines and ouerthrowes other had brought it to before him. Yeta man may tay alfo, that it is no matter of so great difficulty to rule a city already brought low by aduersity, & which compelled by necessity, is contented to be gouerned by a wise man: as it is to bridle and keepe under the infolency of a people, puft vp with pride, and prefumption of long prosperity, as Pericles found it amongst the Athenians. The great multitude also of so many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the Romaine's necks at that time, did plainely shew Fabius to be a grave and constant man. which would neuer give way vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could ever be remoued from that he had at the first determined. The winning and recourring againe of Ta-RENTYM, may well be compared to the taking of Samos, which Pericles wan by force: and the THE cities of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EVBOBA: excepting the city of CAPVA, which the Confuls Fuluius and Appius recoucred againe. But it feemeth that Fabius neuer wan battel, faue that onely for which he triumphed the first time: where Perioles set vp nine triumphs, of battels and victones he had won, aswell by sea as by land. And so also, they cannot alledge such an act done by

PERICLES AND FABIVS: 106 by Pericles as Fabius did, when he refcued Minutius out of the hands of Hannibal, and faued a whole army of the ROMAINES: which doubtlesse was a famous act and proceeded of a noble mind, great wisdome, and an honorable heart. But Perioles againe did neuer commit so grossean error as Fabius did, when he was out-reached and deceived by Hannibals fine stratageme of his oxen who having found his enemy by chance to have flut himselfe vp in the straight of a vally, did suffer him to escape in the night by a subtilty, & in the day by plaine force: for he was preue. ted by ouermuch delay, and fought with all by him he kept inclosed. Now if it be requisite, a The gift of of Generals fit oportunity offered, to do any notable peece of service. For like default & lacke of experience, good Captainedo not only vse well that he hath in his hands, but that he wisely indge also what will follow after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in such fort, as Pericles said they would come to passe: for with ambition to imbrace too much, they ouerthrew their estate. But the ROMAINES Cotrariwise, having sent Scipio into Africk to make wars with the Cartha-GINIANS, wan all that they tooke in hand: where their General did not ouercome the enemy by fortune, but by valiant nesses. So that the wisdome of the one is witnessed, by the ruine of his cou. try and the error of the other testified, by the happy event of that he would have let. Now the fault is alike in a General, to fal into danger, for lacke of forecast: as for cowardlinesse to let slipa maketh the one too hardy, and the other too fearefull. And thus much touching the wars. Now for civil! gouernment: it was a foule blot to Pericles, to be the author of wars. For it is thought, that he alone was the cause of the same, for that he wold not have them yeeld to the Lace ex-MONIANS in any respect. And yet me thinks Fabius Maximus also wold no more give place vnto the Carthaginians, but flood firme and bold in all danger, to maintaine the empire of his country against them. Bet the goodnesse & clemency Fabrus shewed vnto Minutius, doth much commend Pericles acculations and practiles, ag unft Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being noble and good men, and taking part with the Nobility, who he expulsed out of Athens, and banished for a time. So was Pericles power & authority in the commonweale greater: by reason wherof he did euer foresee, that no Generall in all his time did rashly attempt any thing hurtfull vnto the commonweale, except Telmides only: who fled from him, and in despite of him went to fight with the Bo E OT I ANS, where he was flain. As for all other Generals, they wholly put themselues into his hands, and did obey him for the greatnesse of his authority. But Fabius, al though for his part he neuer committed any fault, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernment: yet because he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it seemeth in this refpect he was defective. For if Fabiushad caried lik authority in Rome, as Pericles didin Athens the Romaines had not fallen into fo great mifery as they did. And for liberality, the one shewed it, in refusing the mony offered him: & the other, in giuing vnto those that needed, & re. deeming his poore captiue country men. And yet Fabius might dispend no great reuenue, for his whole receipts came only to fixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to fay how rich he was, who had coming in to him, great prefents by his authority, as well of the subject, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as also of Kings and strange Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any person living. And to conclude, as for the sumptuous building of temples, the flately workes and common buildings:put all the ornaments together that euer were in Rome, before the times of the Cafars, they are not to be compared with those, wherewith Pericles did beautifie and adorne the city of ATHENS. For neither in quality nor quantity was there any proportion or like comparison, betweene the exceeding sumptuousnesse of the one, and of the other.

THE LIFE OF Alcibiades.

LCIBIAD ES by his fathers fide, was anciently descended of Eury- Alcibiales faces that was the fonne of Aiax, and by his mothers fide of Alemaon: Hocke for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias having armed & fet forth a galley at his owne proper costs & char- Themselvers ges, did win great honour in the battell by fea, that was fought along of famous men neuer the coast of ARTEMISIVM, and he was slain afterward in another battell fought at Coronea, against the Borotians. His sonne Alcibiades what they tutors, were Pericles and Ariphron, Xantippus sonnes: who were also Alabiades his neere kinsmen. They say, and truly, that Socrates good will and beauty.

friendship did greatly further Alesbiades honor. For itappeareth not, neither was it euer written, al shades what were the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the names of the matheur of Arion of Double and the name of the nam what were the names of the mothers of Nicias, of Demosthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of nature. Thrasibulus, and of Theramenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the *Theequicontrary we find the nource of Alcibiades, that she was a LACED EMONIAN borne, and was the source called Amicla, and that this schoolemaster was called Zophryus: of the which, Antifhenes men-Greece tioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beauty, it made no matter if we spake Korath Kola not of it, yet I will alitle touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull faire, being a child, a boy, ibardio and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruellous amiable, and beloued of every man. he way the and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruellous amiable, and beloued of every man. For where Euripides faith, that of all the faire times of the yeare, the Autume or later feason is in fead the fairest: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proved true in Alcibiades, though in where fi few other: for he was passing faire euen to his later time, and of good temperature of body. They faire write of him also, that his tongue was somewhat fat, and it did not become him ill, bargaue a biomes, certaine naturall pleafant grace in his talke : which Ariflophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theo. 101 fine. m that did counterfeit a lisping grace with his tongue:

This Alcibiades, with his fat lisping tongue, Into mine cares, this trusty tale, and long full often sung : Looke wpon Theolis (quoth be) lo there he bowes, Behold his comely crow-bright face with fat and * flatling blowes. The sonne of Clinias, would lispe it thus somewhiles, And fure he lisped neuer a lye, but rightly hit his wiles. And Archippus another Poet also, mocking the sonne of Alcibiades, saith thus:

obserning of I fring a could, like sothe Lative and Frenchtra, flations, Likewife Theolis for Theores.

Because he would be like his father encry way, In his long trailing gowne he would go ictting day by day. And counterfeit his speech, his countenance and face: As though dame nature had him given therein a perfect grace: To life and looke afide, and hold his head awiy, Euen as his father lookt and lifpt, fo would be prate and pry.

For his manners they altered and changed very oft with time, which is not to be wondered at. feeing his maruellous great prosperity, as also aduersitie that followed him afterwards. But of all alebindes the great defires he had, and that by nature he was most inclined to, was ambition, seeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the best person as appeareth by certaine of his deeds, and notable fayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wreftling with a compa. nion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to have given him the fall, he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit fo hard, as he would have eaten it off. The other feeling him bite fo hard, let go his hold ftraight, and faid vnto him: what Alcibiades biteft thou like a woman! No mary do I not (quoth he) but like a lyon, Another time being but a litle boy, he played at skailes in the middest of the street with other of his copanions, & when his turne came about to throw, there came a cart lade by chance that way: Alcibiades prayed the carter to stay a while, vntill he had played out his game, because the skailes were set right in the high way wherethe cart should passe ouer. The carter was a stubburne knaue, and would not stay for any request the boy could make, but draue his horse on still, in so much as other boyes gaue backeto let him go on: but Alcabiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durst. The carter being affraid, plucked backe his horse to stay them: the neighbours frighted to fee the danger, ran to the boy in all hast crying out. Afterwards when he was put to schooleto learn, he was very obedient to all his masters that taught him any thing, sauing that he disdained Alcibiades to learne to play on the flute or recorder: saying, that it was no gentlemanly quality. For, said he, to play on the violl with a sticke, doth not alter mans fauour, nor disgrace any gentleman: but Avilething otherwise, to play on the flute, his countenance altereth and changeth so oft, that his familiar friends can scan: know him. Moreouer the harpe or violl doth not let him that playeth on them. from speaking, or singing as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth fo hard to it, that it taketh not onely his words from him, but his voyce. Therefore faid he let the children of the THEBANS play on the flute, that cannot tell how to speake: as for the ATHE-NIANS, we have (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectors & patrones of our countrey, the goddette Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in old time (as it is said). brake the flute, & the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that played vpona flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging these reasons, partly in sport, and partly in good earnest, did not only himself seaue to learnest play on the flute, but he turned his companions minds also quite from it. For these words of Alcibiades, ran from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reason to despise playing on the flute, & that he mocked all those that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fel out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the flute, was put out of the number of honest and liberall exercises, and the flute it selfe was thought a vile instrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accusations Antiphon wrote against Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boy, he fled out of his tutors house, into the house of Democrates one of his louers, and how Ariphron one of his tutors thought to have made a beadle cry him through the city: but Pericles wold not suffer him, saying that if he were dead, they should know it but one day sooner by crying of him: and if he werealiue, that it would be such a shame to him while he liued, that he had bin better he had neuer bin heard of againe. The same Antiphon accuseth him further, that he had killed a servant of his that attended on him, in the wrefiling place of Sybertius, with a blow of a staffe. But there is no reason to credit his writing, who confesseth he speaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did beare him. Now straight there were many great and rich men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad to gethis good will. But Socrates loue vnto him had another end and cause, which witneffed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceiuing that vertuedid appeare in him, and was joyned with the other beauty of his face, and body, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignity and authority, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chiefest of the city, as of strangers, seeking to intice him by flattery, & by many other pleasures he tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to suffer so goodly an ympe to lole

the hope of the good fruit of his youth. For fortune doth neuer fo intagle nor finere a man without, with that which they comonly call riches, as to let & hinder him fo, that phylosophy should nottake hold on him with her free, seuere, & quicke reasons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, affaied with all delights, & flut vp as it were in their company that feafted him with all pleafures only to turn him that he should not hearken to Socrates words, who sought to bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades not with standing having a good naturall wit, knew what Socrates was, and went to him, refusing the company of all his rich friends and their flatteries, and fell in a kind of familiar friendship with Socrates. Whom when he had heard speake, he noted his words very well, that they were no perswasions of a man seeking his dissionesty, but one that gaue him good counfell, and went about to reforme his faults and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and presumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe faith,

And did thinke with himfelf, that all Socrates love and following of yong men, was indeed a thing fent from the gods, and ordained about for them, whom they would have preserved, and put into the pathway of honour. Therefore he began to despise himselfe, and greatly to reuerence socrates, taking pleasure in his good vsing of him, and much imbraced his vertue : so as he had (he wift not how an image of loue grauen in his heart, or rather (as Plate faith) a mutuall loue, to wit. anholy and honest affection towards Socrates. Insomuch as all the world wondered at Alcibiades. to fee him commonly at Socrates board, to play, to wreftle, & to lodge in the wars with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other welwillers, who could not fo much as have a good looke at his hands, and befides became dangerous to fome, as it is faid he was vnto Anytus, the fon of Anthemion, being one of those that loved him well. Anytus making good cheere to certaine strangers his friends that were come to fee him, went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refused to go. For he went to make mery with certaine of his companions at his owne house, and after he had well taken in his cups, he went to Anytus house to counterfeit inselence the fooleamongst them; & staying at the hall doore, and seeing Anytus table & cubboord full of "mis Aug. place of filuer and gold, he commanded his feruants to take away halfe of it, and cary it home to his house. But when he had thus taken his pleasure, he would come no neerer into the house, but went his way home. Anytus friends and guests misliking this strange part of Alcibiades, said it was shamefully and boldly done to abuse Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, said Anytus: for hehath left vs fom, where he might haue taken all. All other also that made much of him, he feruedafter that fort, fauing a stranger that came to dwell in Arhens: who being but a poore man as the voice went, fold all that he had, wherof he made about a hudred staters which he brought vinto Alcibiades and prayed him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades began to be mery, and being very glad to vnderstand his good will towards him, took his honest offer, & prayed him to come to supper to him: so he welcomed him very heartily, and made him good cheere. When supper was done, he gaue him his mony againe, and commanded him not to faile the next morning to distribute was done, meete him where the farmes and lands of the city are wont to be let out to those that bid most, & fact. charged him he should outbid all. The poore man would faine have excused himselfe, saying the farmes were too great for him to hire: But Alcibiades threatned to whip him, if he would not do it. For besides the desire he had to pleasure him, he bare a private grudge against the ordinary farmers of the city. The next morning the stranger was ready in the market place, where they did cry out the letting of their farmes, & he raifed one to a talent more then all other did offer. The other farmers were as mad with him as could be, that they all did fet yoon him, crying out: Let him put in fecurity straight, supposing he could have found none. The stranger was maruellous blanke thereat, and began to shrinke backe. Then cried Aleibiades out aloud to the officers that fate there to take the best offers:I wil be his surety, faith he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him fay fo, were at their wirs end, and wift not what to do. For they being alwayes accustomed to pay their yearly rent as it went before, by the helpe of the rest of the yeares that followed after: perceiving now that they should not be able to pay the arrerages of the rent due to the common-wealth, and feeing no other remedy, they prayed him to take a peece of money, and to leave the bargaine. Then Aleibiades would in no wife he should take lesse then a talent, which they gave him willingly. So Meibiades suffered the stranger then to depart, and made him gaine by his deuice. Now Socrates love which he bare him, thought it had many mighty and great adversaries, yet it did stay much Alcibiades, sometime by gentle nature, sometime by his graue counsell & aduice: so as the reason thereof tooke so deepe roote in him, and did so pierce his heart, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekee Another time also being caried away with the enticement of flatterers, that held vp his humour with all pleasure and delights, he stole away from Socrates, and made him run after him to fetch ranne from him againe, as if he had bene a flaue that had runne away from his masters house: for Alcibiades stood in awe of no man but Socrates onely, and indeed he did reverence him, and did dishift all other. And therefore Cleantes was wont to fay, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gaue his other louers hold, which Socrates neuer fought for, for to fay truly Alcibiades was much given out to lust and pleasure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydidee meant of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of body, and diffolute of life. Those that marred Alcibiades quite, did still pricke forward his ambition and defire of honour, and did put him in the head to thrust himselfinto great matters betimes, making him beleeue that if he didbut once begin to shew himselfe to deale in matters of state, he would not only blemish and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Percles, in authority and power among the GRECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made foft, to be wrought in any forme, and by cold also is shut and hardened againe: euen so Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanity and opinion of himselfe, as of as Secrates tooke him in hand, was made fait and firme againe by his good perswasions, in so much that when he saw his owne fault and folly, and how far wide he had strayed from vertue. he became suddenly very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growne to mans state, he went into a grammer schoole, and asked the schoolemaster for one of Homers bookes. The schoolemaster answered him, He had none of them: Alcibiades vp with his fift and gaue him a good boxe on the earc, and went his way. Annother grammarian told him ona time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, Why, what meanest thou, to stand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach yong men not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, defirous to speake with him: answer was made him, He was not at ley sure now; for that he was busily occupied by himselfe, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, faid he, going his way it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no account at all. Moreover, being but a young boy, he was at the journey of Potid &A, where he lay still with socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battels and skirmishes he was in:among which there was one very hote and bloudy, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurt. But Socrates stepped before him, and did defend him so valiantly before them all, that he saued him and his weapon out of the enemies hand, So the honor of this fight out of doubt, inequity and reason, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue judged is on Alcibiades side, because he was of a noble house. But Socrates because he would increase his desire of honour, and would pricke him forward to honest and commendable things, was the very first that witnessed Alcibiades had described it: and therefore prayed the captaines to judge him the crowne and compleate armor. Afterwards, in the battel of DELION, the ATHENIAN'S having received the overthrow, Socrates retired with a few other on foot. Alcibiades being on horse back, and ouertaking him, would not go from him, but kept him company, and defended him against a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and slew many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gauca box on the care vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greatest men of power in the city, being a noble man borne, & of great possessions, which was done vpon a brauery & certain Infinefic, as having laid a wager with his companions he would do it, and for no malice or quarrell that he baretheman. This light part was straight ouer al the city, and every one that heard it, faid it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his house, and knocking at his gate was let in: so he stripping himselfe before him, deliuered him his body to be whipped, and punished at his pleasure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, and gaue him his daughter Hipparese afterwards in mariage. Howbeit some fay, it was not Hipponicus that gaucher to him, but Calleas sonne with tentalents of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of the first child he had by her, he asked ten talents more, faying: they were promifed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing left this was an occasion fought of him to lye in waite to kill him for his goods: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generall, if he died without heires speciall of his body. Alcibiades passed not for it, & made no further reckoning of the matter but only bade his wife, if the would, prefent her cause of diuorce before the Judge. So the went thither her Hipparete felf, to fue the divorce between them, according to the law but Alcibiades being there allo, tooke fuel to be divorced her by the hand, & caried her through the market place home to his house, & no man durst med-from Albe. dle between them, to take her from him. And fo she continued with him all the dayes of her life, bidden which was not long after: for the died, when Alcibiades was in his journy he made to Ephesvs. This force Alcibiades vied, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuil, because it seemeth that the law was grounded upon this cause: that the wise which would be disorced from her husband, shold go her felfe openly before the Judge to put up her complaint, to the end, that by this meanes, the husband might come to speake with his wife, and seeke to stay her if he could. A/cibiades had a maruellous faire great dog, that cost him threescore and ten minas, and he cut off his Alabiades taile that was his chiefe beauty. When his friends reproued him, and told him how enery man great dog. blamed him for it: he fell a laughing and told them he had that he fought. For faith he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they should say worse of me. Moreover, it is faid, the first time that Alcibrades spake openly in the common weale, and began to deale in matters, was vp6a gift of mony he gaue vnto the people, and not of any pretence or former purpose largeff. he had to do it. One day as he came through the market place, hearing the people very found, he asked what the matter was: they told him it was about mony certain men had given to the people. Then dicibiades went to them, and gaue them mony out of his owne purie. The people were logiad arther, as they fell to shouting & clapping of their hands, in token of thankfulnesse; and himsefe was so glad for company, that he forgat a quaite he had under his gown, which was so afeard of the noise, that she tooke her slight away. The people seeing the quaile, made a greater noise then before, and many rose out of their places to run after her. so that in the end, it was takenvp by a mafter of a ship called Antiochus, who brought him the quaile again, & for that cause Alcibiades did loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobility of his house, his goods, his worthines Alcibiades and the great number of his kinfmen and friends, made his way open to take vpon him gouern- coming into ment in the comonweale: yet the only way he defired to win the fauor of the comon people by, wealth. was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the comical poets dotestific it: & diebades besides the Demosthenes the prince of orators also doth say, in an oration he made against Medias, maruellous that Alcibiades about all other qualities he had, was most eloquent. And if we may beleeue au_{be} ophraftus, the greatest searcher of antiquities, and best historiographer aboue any other philosopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a wit to denile & confider what he would fay, Alcibiades as any manthat was in his time. His charge was great, & much fpoken of alfo, for keeeping of running hories argames:not only because they were the best and swiftest, but for the number of coaches he had belides. For neuer prinate person, no nor any Prince, did ener send seauen so well appointed coaches, in all furniture vnto the games Olympicall, as he did nor that at one courfe hath borne Acidiades away the first, the second, and the fourth prife, as Thuegdides faith or as Euripides reporteth, the away the first, the second, and the fourth prite, as a uneyaraes faithful as Europeas reported, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name, that ever strived for victorie of third stripes. therein. For Euripides pronounced his praise, in a fong he made of him, as followeth:

> O some of Clinias, I will resound thy praise: For thou art bold in martiall deeds, and ouercom'st alwayes. Thy victories therewith, do farre exceed the reft, That over were in Greece ygot, therefore I count them beft. For at th'Olympicke games, thou hast with chariots wonne The first prife, second, third and all, which there in race were runne. With praise and little paine, thy head hath twife bene crownd, With oline boughs for victory, and twife by trumpets found, The Heraulds have proclaimed thee victor by thy name: Aboue all those which ranne with thee, in hope to get the game.

Howbeit the good affect io divers cities did beare him, cotending which shold gratifie him best, did much increase his fame & honor. For the Ephesians did set vp a tent for him, very sump. tuously and richly furnished. Those of the city of CHTO, furnished him with prouender for his horse, & gaue him muttons besides, & other beasts to facrifice withal. They of LESEOS also sent him in wine & other prouision of victuals, to helpe him to defray the great charges he was at in keeping open house, & feeding such a number of mouths daily. Yet the spite they did beare him or rather his breach of promise which he often made, with this magnificence & state he shewed gaue the people more cause to speak of him then before. For they say, there was one Diomederate ATHENS a friend of Alcibiades, and no ill man, who defired once in his life to win a game at the playes olympical. This ma being enformed that the AR GIVE's had a coach excellently furnished. beloging to the comonweale, & knowing that Alcibiades could do very much in the city of AR-Go s, because he had many friends in the same the came to intreat Alcibiades to buy this coach for him. Alcibiades therupon bought it, but kept it to himself, not regarding Diomedes request he had made. Diomedes seeing that, fel starke mad for anger, and called the gods & men to witnesse, that Alcibiades did him open wrong: and it feemeth, that there fell out fute in law vpon the fame. For Horrates wrote an oration, and drew a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a child, touching a couple of horses: yet in this plea his adversary was called Tistus, & not Diomedes. Furthermore. Alcibiades being yet but a yong man, when he came to practife and pleade publickly, he putall other orators to filence, but only two that were euer against him the one was Pheax the son of Eralifratus, & the other Nicias the fon of Niceratus. Of these two, Nicias was a man growne and had won the name and reputation of a good captaine. And Pheax began also to come forward as he did, being of a good and honourable house: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence specially. For the could more properly talke & discourse among his friends privativ. the he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Eupolis faith Words enow, but no eloquence.

adurfaries in the comwhen hee pleade. Phene tacked els-

There is a certaine oration extant in writing against Alcibiades & Pheax: where among other accusatios is brought in, how Alcibiades was ordinarily served in his house, with gold & filuer plate that belongeth to the comonweale, and which were vied to be borne for state & magnificence, in solemne processions before them, and how he vsed them as boldly, as if they had bin his own Nowthere was one Hiperbolus in ATHENS at that time, borne in the village of PERITHOIDE: of whom Thurydides maketh mention, as of a naughty wicked man, serving as a bt subject and matter to all the taunts and mockes of the comical poets of that time: but he was so impudent a person, and cared so litle what men said of him, that he passed not though he were defamed, neither did any thing grieue him, what soeuer they reported of him: which some do call boldnes and courage, being no better indeed then plaine impudency, extreme madnesse, and desperate folly. He would neuer please any man: and if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magistrate, whom they would any way accuse, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their instrument to veter their spite. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being assembled, were ready to proceed to the banishmet of oftracismon by most voices. The maner and custome of this kinde of banishment was for a time to banish out of their city such a one, as seemed to influment by haue too great authority and credit in the city: and that was, rather to fatisfie their enuy, then for to remedy their feare. And because it was manifest it would fall out to one of them threeto be banished to wit Alcibiades, Nicias, or Pheax) Alcibiades found meanes to joyne all their three factions in one, becoming friends one to another: and having conferred with Nicial about it, he made Hyperbolus felfe to be banished, who was the chiefe instrument to prepare the way of their banishment, Howbeit others say, he spake not with Nicias about it, but with Phaax, and iovning his part with Phean, he caused Hyperbolus to be banished, who fearing nothing lesses forit was neuer seene before, that a man of meane countenance, and of small authority, fell into the hap of this banishment : as Plato the comicall poet testifieth, speaking of Hyperbolus:

Hyperbolus

Although for his defert, this paine to him is due, Or greater punishment prepar'd, the which might make him rue: Yet since he was by birth, a person meane and base, Such punishment therefore did (ceme (for him) too great of grace. Since Ostracismon was, not made at first to be, Nor yet denisd as punishment, for such meane folke as he.

But of this matter we have spoken more at large before: and now to returne again to Alcibiades.

Nicios had great reputation among firangers, and his enemies gricued at it no leffe then at the honour the citizens felues did vnto him. For his house was the common Inne for all LACED Æ-MONIAN s when they came to Athens, and they cuer lay with him: moreouer he had very well entertained the LACED AMON prisoners that were taken at the fort of PYLE. And afterwards when peace was concluded betweene Laced Emon and Athens, and their prisoners deligered home again by Nicias meanes only and procurement, they loued him more then euer they didbefore. This was blown abroad through GR BCB, that Pericles had kindled the wars among ft them, and Nicius had quenched it: fo some called this peace Nicium, as one would fay . Nicius Nicius worke. But Alcibiades fromaking this, and enuying Nicias glory, determined to breake the peace Page. whatfocuer came of it. Wherfore to copasse this matter, knowing first of all that the Ar Gives breaketh had no liking to the Laced Amonians, but were their mortall enemies, and that they did but the peace of feeke matter to fall out with them: he fecretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreover he did perfivade them to it both by letters and words of mouth, speaking with the magistrates, and such as had greatest authority and credit among the people; declaring vinto them, that they should not feare the Lage nd Emonians, nor yeeld to the at all, but to flicke to the ATHENIANS, who would foone repent them of the peace they had made, and break it with the. Afterwards when the LACED EMONIANS had made league with the BOEO-TIANS, and had redelivered the city of PANACTVM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and fooyled, contrary to the league: Alcibiades perceiving how the people were much offended thereat, made them more carnest against them, and there with all brought Nicim in disgrace with the people& charged him with many matters of great likelihood, as at that time when he was General: that he would never take any of the Lage bd Amonians, when they were shut yp within the He of Sphacter and much leffe diffresse them when he might: and moreover when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had found the meanes to deliver them, & send them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDEMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, he did not his duty to diffive de the people from making of league offenflue and defenflue with the Bosori-ANS and the CORINTHIANS and again also, if there were any people of GRECE that had a defire to become friends & allies with the ATHENIANS, that he did the best he could to let them. if the LACED AMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in diffrace with the people, for the causes abougfaid: in the middest of this stir, ambassadours came by chance from LACED EMON to ATHENS, who at their coming gaue very good words, faying they had full power & commission to compound all controuersies, vnder reasonable and equal conditions. The Senate heard them, and received them curteoufly, & the people the next day should affemble in counfell to give them audience: which Aleibiades fearing much, he went to labor the ambaifadors, & fpake with them apart in this fort. What meane you, my Lords of Spartaido Aleibiades yenot know that the Senate hath alwaies accustomed to be gracious and fauourable vnto those that fue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a proud nature, and defirous to imbrace all great matters? If therfore at the first fight, ye do give them to understand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all maner of causes: do you not thinke that they will make you firetch your authority, to grant them all that they will demand? Therefore, my Lords ambassadors, if you look for indifferency at the ATHENTAN'S hands, and that they shall not prease you too farre against your wils, to grant them any thing of aduantage: I would wish you a litle to couer your full commission, and in open maner to propound certain articles, and reasonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will assure you of my goodwill in fauour of the LACEDEMONIANS. When he had told them this tale, he gaue them his faithfull promife, and vowed as it were to performe his word. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the ambaifadors from the trust they reposed in Wicias, and wanne them on his side; in so much as they gaue credit to no man but to him, wondering much at his great wifdome and ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were affembled to give the ambaffadors audience. They were fent for, and brought into the market place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cause of their coming. They answered: that they were come to treate of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then began Alcibiades to be angry with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he any to them; calling them vnfaithful, vnconstant, and fickle men, that were come neither to do, nor fay any thing worth the hearing,

For to fay truly: his courtefies, his liberalities, and noble expenses to flew the people for great pleasure and passime as nothing could be more: the glorious memory of his auncestors, the grace of his eloquence, the beauty of his person, the strength and valiant nesse of his body joyned together with his wisdome and experience in martiall affaires; were the very causes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the ATHENIAN'S did patiently endure all his light parts, and did couer his faults, with the best words and termes they could, calling them vouthfull, & gentlemens sports. As when he kept Agarthareus the painter prisoner in his house by force, vntill he had painted all his wals within: and when he had done, did let him go, and re- different him and when he had done, did let him go, and rewarded him very honestly for his paines. Againe, when he gaue a box on the care to Taureas, and wanwho did pay the whole charges of a company of common players, in spite of him, to carie away the honour of the games. Also when he tooke away a yong woman of Malia by his authority that was taken among certaine prisoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a child, which he caufed to be brought vp: which they called a worke of charitic, albeit afterwards they burthened him, that he was the only cause of murdering of the poore MELIANS, fauing the litle children, because he had fauoured and perswaded that ynnaturall and wicked decree, which another had propounded. Likewife where one Ariflophon a painter, had painted a curtifan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and fitting in her lap, which all the people ranne to fee, and tooke great pleasure to behold it: the graue and ancient men were angry at these foolish parts, accounting them impudent things, and done against all civill modestie and temperancy. Wherefore it seemed Archestratus words was spoken to good pur-Archestrapose, when he said: that GRECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he em (aping came from the councell and assembly of the city, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by means therof had obtained the thing he defired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon furnamed Mifantropos (as who would fay, Loup-garon, or theman-hater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not paffe by him, nor gaue him way (as he was wontto do all other men) but went straight to him, and tooke him by the hand, and said: O, thou dost well my sonne, I can thee thanke, that thou goest on, and climest vp still: for if ever thou be in authority, wo be wnto those that follow thee, for they are veterly vindone. When they heard these words, those that flood by fell a laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after: fuch fundry opinions they had of him for the vnconstancy of his life, and waiwardnesse of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of Sicile, the Athe-NIANS did maruellously couet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not meddle withall, vntill after his death: and then they did it at the first vnder colour of friendship, as ayding those circles which were oppressed and spoiled by the Syracvsans. This was in manner a plaine bridge made, to passe afterwards a greater power and army thither. Howbeitthe only procurer of the ATHENIANS, and perswader of them, to send small companies thither no more, but to enter the author with a great army at once to conquer all the countrey together, was Alcibiades, who had fo al- of the wars lured the people with his pleafant tongue, that vpon his perswasso, they built castles in the aire, and thought to do greater wonders by winning onely of Sicilia. For where other did set their minds vponthe conquest of Sicile, being that they onely hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enterprises. And where Nicias commonly in all his perswafions, did turne the ATHENIANS from their purpose to make warres against the Syracus ans, as being too great a matter for them to take the city of Syracvsa: Alcibiades againe had a further reach in his head, to go conquer Lybia, and Carthage, and that being conquered, to palle from thence into ITALY, and so to PELOPONNESVS: so that SICILIA should serve but to furnish them with victuals, and to pay the fouldiers for their conquests which he had imagined. Thus the yong men were incontinently caried away with a maruellous hope and opinio of this iourny, and gaue good eare to old mens tales that told them wonders of the countries infomuch as there was no other pastime nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to fit round together, draw plats of Sicile, and describe the fitnation of Lybia & Car. THAGE. And yet they fay, that neither Socrates the Phylosopher, nor Meton the Astronomer did euer hope to see any good successe of this journy. For the one by the reuealing of his familiar spirit, who told him al things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it; and Meton, whe- crates and ther it was for feare of the successe of the iourney he had by reason, or that he knew by divi-the Poet Aristophanes doth plainely expresse it in these words: The people most desire, what most they hate to have: And what their minds abhorres even that they seeme to crave. And in another place he faid also, aggrauating the suspition they had of him; For state or common weale, much better (hould it be, at Nicias was fo assamed and amazed withall, that he could not tell what to say, to see so sudden a change, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and fubtell practife with the ambaffadors. So the ambaffadors of LAGED #MON were dispatched without any thing done, and Alcibiades chofen General: who presently brought the Argives, the Elians, & the Mantineans in league with the ATHENIANS. Thoughno man did commend this practife of his, in working it after this fortivea it was a maruellous thing of him to deuife to put all PELOPONNESVS in armes, and to procure fuch a number of fouldiers against the LACEDAMONIANS, as he did before the city of MANTINE A and to shift off the miseries of war and hazard of battel so farre from ArHENS. Which if the LACED EMONIANS did win, could not profite them much and if they loft it, they could hardly faue their city of Sparta. After this battell of Mantinea, the thousand men whom the city by an ancient order did keepe continually in pay, as well in peace as in war, within the city of Argos, thinking now oportunity served them very trimly: attempted to take the foueraigne authority from the common people, and to make themselues Lords of the city.

To keepe within the country, none fuch lyons lookes as he: But if they needs will keepe, a lyon to their cost, Then must they needs obey his will, for he will rule the rost.

ALCIBIADES.

The Senate also were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: where.

And to bring this to passe, the Laced Amonians coming in the meane time, did aide them in their purpose, and so did put downe the gouernment of the people : not with standing imme-diatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the stronger. Alcibiades coming thither euen at that time, did warrant them the victoric, and to fet vp againe the authority of the people.

Then he perswaded them to make their wals longer to joyne the city to the sea, to the end they might more eafily be aided by fea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them also from ATHENS, many carpenters, masons, stone-hewers, & other workmen; and to conclude, he shewed them by all the meanes and waies he could, that he did beare goodwill vnto them, and thereby wan himfelfe no leffe fauour particularly among them, then generally he did good vnto his country. He did perswade also his citizens of Patras to joyne their towne to the sea, by making long wals.

which they built out euen to the cliffes of the sea. And when one said vnto them, alas, poore peo.

ple of PATRAS, what do you meane? the ATHENIANS will cat you out: Alcibiades answered him.

it may welbe, but it shalbe by litle & litle, beginning first at the feet: but the LACED EMONIANS will denoure you all at once, & begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the city of

ATHENS strong by sea, yet he did not leave to perswade the ATHENIANS also to make them-felues ftrong by land. For he did put the young men oftentings in mind of the oath they were made to fweare in Agray Los, and did aduife them to accomplish it indeed. Which was, that

whereby they were taught to reckon all land theirs, that was manured and did bring forth fruit.

Yet with all these goodly deeds and faire words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quicknes of understanding he had many great faults & imperfections. For he was too dainty in his fare, want only given vnto light women, riotous in banquets, vaine & womanish in apparell:

he ware euer a long purple gown that fwept the market place as he walked up and down it had fuch a traine, and was too rich and coftly for him to weare. And following these vaine pleasures and delights, when he was in his galley, he caused the planks of the poopethereof to be cut and broken vp. that he might lie the fofter: for his bed was not laid vpon the ouerlop, but laid vpon girthes strained ouer the hole, cut out and fastened to the sides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded feutchion, wherein he had no cognizance, nor ordinary deuice of the Athenians, but only had the image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The noblemen, and best citizens of ATHENS perceiuing this, they hated his fashions and conditions, & were much offended at him, and were afraid withall of his rashnesseand insolency: he did so contemne the lawes and customes of their country, being manifest tokens of a man that aspired to be king, & would fubuert and turne all ouer-hand. And as for the goodwill of the common people towards him, nation of his art what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, & holding a burning torch in his hand, made as though he would have fet his house on fire. Other say, that he did not coun.

terfeit, but like a mad man indeed did fet his house on fire one night, & that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to pray the people, that in confideration of his great losse & his grieuous calamity fo late happened him, it would please them to discharge his son from going this voyage. So by this mad deuice, he obtained his request of the people for his fon, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen captaine, to take charge of men in these wars: who misliked this journey, as well for his companion and affociate in the charge of these wars as for other misfortunes he forefaw therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the war would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades rashnesse and hardinesse, but did joyne with him the wisdome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third can taine, who they fent thither, though he were waxen now fomewhat old, as one that had shewed himselfe no lesse venterous and hardy in some battels, then Alcibiades himselfe. Now when they came to refolue of the number of fouldiers, the furniture and order of these wars Nicias sough crookedly to thwart this journey, and to breake it off altogether but Alcibiades with flood him. and got the better hand of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who moved the people also that the captaines whom they had chosen for these wars, might have full power and authority to leavie men at their diferction, and to make such preparation as they thought good; wherunto the people condificended, and did authorife them. But when they were even ready to go their way, many fignes of ill fucceffe lighted in the necke one of another; and among fi the reft this was one. That they were commanded to take ship on the day of the celebration of the feast of Admis on the which the custome is, that women do fet up in diverse places of the city, in the midft of the freets, images like to dead corfes which they cary to burial, and they reprefent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with blubbering and beating themselves, in token of the forrow the goddesse Venus made, for the death of her friend Adonis, Moreover, the Hermes (which are the images of Mercury, and were wont to be fet vp in every lane and firecte) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled, specially in their fakewne and mangled ces: which put diverfe in great feare and trouble, yea even those that made no account of such toyes. Wherupon it was alleadged, that it might be the Conintuins that did it, or procured that leud act to be done, fauouring the Syrac vsans, who were their neere kinfemen, and had bin the first founders of them; imagining vpon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake off the enterprise, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hand. Neuertheleffe, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their words that faid, they should not reckon of any such fignes or tokens, & that they were but some light brained youths, that being tipled, had played this shamefull part in their brauery, or for sport. But for all these reasons, they took these signes very grienously, & were indeed not a litle afeard, as thinking vndoubtedly that no man durft have bene to bold to have done fuch an abhominable fact, but that there was fome confpiracy in the matter. Hereupon they looked vpon enery fulpition and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely focuer it were) and that very feuerely: and both Senate and people also met in councell upon it, very oft in few dayes. Now whilest they were bufily fearching out the matter, Androcles a common counseller, and Oratour in the commonwealth, brought before the councell certaine flaues and strangers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed, that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled Alcibiales other images after that fort, and in a mockery had counterfeited also in a banket that he made, the ceremonies of the holy mysteries: declaring these matters particularly: How one Theodorus counterfeited the herald, that was wont to make the proclamations: Polytion the torch-bearer, and Alcibiades the prieft, who sheweth the holy signes and mysteries; and that his other companions were the affiftants, as those that make suit to be received into their religion and order, and into the brotherhood of their holy mysteries, whom for this cause they call Mystes. These very words are written in the accusation Thessalus (Cimons son) made against Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddesses, Ceres and Proserpina. Whereat the people being maruelloufly moved and offended, and the Oratour Androcles his mortall enemy, aggrauating and stirring them vp the more against him: Alcibiades a little at the first beganne to be amazed at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners which were prepared for the voyage of Sicilia, and the fouldiers alfothat were gathered, did beare him great goodwill and fpe-

cially how the aide, that came fro Argos, and Mantinea (being a thousand footmen wellarmed and appointed) did fay openly, how it was for Alcibiades fake they did take vpon them fo long a voyage beyond sea, and that if they went about to do him any hurt or wrong, they would presently returne home againe fro whence they came: he began to be of a good courage again, and determined with this good fauourable oportunitie of time, to come before the councell, to answer to all such articles and accusations as should be laid against him. Thereupon his enemies were a litle cooled, fearing left the people in this judgement would have shewed him more fanour, because they stood in need of him. Wherefore to preuent this danger, they had fed other Therefore Orators, who fet a good face on the matter, as they had bene Alcibiades friends, and yet they wi- Alcibiades shed him no lesse eull, then the ranckest enemics he had. These fine fellowes rose vp in open asfembly and faid: it was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the Generals of so mighty and puissant an army (being ready to hoise faile, and the aide also of their a lies and friends) should be driven to stay now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilest they should goabout to choose Iudges, and appoint him his houres and time of answer. Therefore they faid, it was fit he should take his journey betimes, and when warres were done, that he should present himselfe to require iustice, and to purge himselfe of such matters as should be objected against him. But Alcibiades smelling straight their fetch, and perceiving the practise of his stay, stept, vp, and declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a Generall of so great an army, his mind being troubled with continuall feare of so grieuous curses, as he should leaue vpon him : and that he deserved death, if he could not purge and instifie himfelfe of all the vniust and surmized accusations against him. And if he had once cleared himself of all things, and had published his innocency, he should then have nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to go on lustily to fight with his enemies, and to cast behind him the danger of all his flanderous detractors. But all this could not perswade them. And so he was presently commanded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke and ship away his men. Thus Alcibiades hewas compelled to take the feas with his other companions, having in their nauie about a hun- iourny into dred and forty galleyes, all having three owers to a banck: and five thousand one hundred footmen, very well armed and appointed, and throwers with flings, archers, and other light armed men to the number of thirteene hundred, fufficiently furnished of all warlike and necessary munition. Now after they were ariued on the coast of ITALY, they landed in the city of RHEGIO: where, holding councel in what fort they should direct these wars, it was resolved in the end that they should straight go vnto Sicilia. This opinion was followed, although Nicias did contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his consent thereunto, and at his first coming, he was the occasion of winning the city of CATHANA. But he neuer after did any exploite, for he was called home immediatly by the Athenians, to come and answer certaine accusations laid to his charge. For as we told you before, there was at the beginning certaine light suspitions and accusations put vp against him, by some slaues and strangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burthened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken the images of Mercury; and had committed facriledge, in counterfeiting in icast & mockery the holy ceremonies of the mysteries: and blew into the eares of the people, that both the one and the other proceeded of one fet conspiracy, to change and alter the government of the state of thecity. Vponthese informations, the people tooke it in so ill part, that they comitted all to prison, that were in any fort accused or suspected thereof, and would neuer let them come to their answer:and moreover did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon so great complaints and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offence was in question before them, and the furie and hatred of the people was such towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their danger, they were the worle handled for his fake. Thucydides did not name his accusers, but some other do name Dioclides and Teucer: amongst whom Phrynicus the comicall poet is one, who discouereth it in his verses, by bringing Phrynicus in one that fpeaketh to the image of Mercury:

My good friend Mercury, I pray thee take good heed, That thou fall not and breake thy necke : for so thou mights me breed Both danger and distrust, and though I guiltlesse be, Some Diocles falfely might accuse and trouble me. Mercury answereth:

Take thou no thought for me, my felfe I shall well saue: And will foresee full well therewith, that Teucer (that false knaue) Shall not the money get, which he by law hath wonne. For his promoters bribing part and accusation.

And yet for all this, these tokens do show no certaintie of any thing. For one of them being asked, how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced these images? heanswered, that he knew them well enough by the brightnesse of the Moone. And hereby it appeareth plainely that he was periured, because that the same night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a conjunction of the Moon. This did a litle trouble and stay men of judgement: how beit the common fort of people this notwithstanding, did not leaue to be as sharpe set, to receive all accusations and informations that were brought in against him, as ever they were before. Now there was among the prisoners whose cause was hanging before them, the Orator Andecides (whom Hellanicus the historiographer describeth to descend of the race of Viisles Jwhom they tooketo be a man that hated the government of the common people, & bent altogether to fauor the small number of the nobility. But one of the chiefest occasions who he was suspected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his house there was a faire great image fet up in old time by the family or tribe of the Agides, and thatalone amongst all the rest of so many famous images, was left whole and vnbroken: wherupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is so called generally of enery body, albeit the inscription sheweth the contrary. Andocides being in prison, chanced to fall in acquaintance with one Timaus, with whom he was more familiar then with all the rest, who was also prisoner with him for the selfe cause. This Time w was a man not so well knowne as he, but besides, wise man, and very hardy. He perswaded him, and put into his head, that he should accuse himfelfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confessing it, he should receiue grace and pardon, according to the course and promise of the law: where contrarily if he should stand vpon the courteste of the Iudges sentence, he might easily endanger himselse: because iudgements in such cases are vncertaine to all people, and most to be doubted and sea red toward the rich. And therefore he told him, it were his best way, if he looked into the matter wisely, by lying to saue his life, rather then to suffer death with shame, and to be condemned vpon this false accusation. Also he said, if he would have regard to the commonwealth, thatit should in like case be wisely done of him, to put in danger a few of those (which stood doubt full whether in troth they were any of them or not) to saue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honest men, who indeed were innocent of this lewd fact. Timeus words and perfivations wrought fuch effect with Andocides, that they made him yeeld vnto them, and brought him to accuse himselfe, and certaine other with himsby meanes whereof Andocides ac. cording to the law had his pardon: but all fuch as he named and accused, were every man put to death, fauing fuch as faued themselues by running away. Furthermore, to shadow his accufation with some apparance of troth, Andocides among those that were accused, did accuse also certaine of his owne feruants. Now though the people had no more occasion to occupie their bufie heads about the breakers of these images, yet was not their malice thus appealed against Alcibiades, untill they fent the galley called Salaminiana, commanding those they sent by a fert for to speciall commission to seeke him out, in no case to attempt to take him by force, nor to lay hold on him by violence: but to vse him with all the good words and courteous maner that they posfibly could, and to will him only to appeare in person before the people, to answer to certain accusations put vpagainst him. If otherwise they should have vsed force, they feared much lest the army would have mutined on his behalf within the country of their enemies, and that there would have growne fome fedition amongst their fouldiers. This might Alcibiades have easily done, if he had bene disposed for the souldiers were very fory to see him depart, perceiuing that the warres should be drawne out now in length, and be much prolonged vinder Nicias, feeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only fourre that pricked Nicias forward to do any fernice: and that Lamachus alfo, though he were a valiant man of his hands, yet he lacked honour and authority in the army, because he was but a meane man borne, and poore besides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, disappointed the ATHENIANS of winning the city of MESSINA: for they having intelligence by certaine private persons within the city, that it would yeeld vpinto their hand, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them vnto those tily and superfluously, and gaue himselfto all mirth and pleasure. In THRASIA, he dranke euer, orwas alwaics on horiebacke. If he came to Tifaphernes, licutenant of the mighty king of PERsia, he farre exceeded the magnificence of Persia in pompe and sumptuousnesse. And these when he came to the citie of THVRIES, fo foone as he had landed, he went and hid himselfe incontinently in such fort, that such as sought for him, could not find him. Yetthere was one that knew him where he was, and faid: Why, how now Alcibiades, darest thou not trust the instice of thy country? Yes very well (quoth he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing vpon it, I would not trust mine owne mother, fearing lest negligently she should put in the blacke beane, where she should cast in the white: for by the first, condemnation of death was signified: and by the other, pardon of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: well, quoth he, they shall know I am yet aliue. Now the maner of his acculation and inditement framed against him, was found written in this fort: Thessalus the son Alcibiados of Cimon, of the village of LACIADES, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the son of Cli- accusation. Miss, of the village of Scambonides, to have offended against the goddesses, Ceres and Proferpina, counterfeiting in mockery their holy mysteries, and shewing them to his familiar friends in his house, himselfe apparelled and arrayed in a long vestment or cope, like vnto the vestment the priest weareth when he sheweth these holy sacred mysteries and naming himselfe the priest, Polytion the torch-bearer, and Theodorus of the village of PAYGEA the verger, and the other lookers on brethren, and fellow scorners with them, and all done in manifest contempt and derision of holy ceremonics and mysterics of the Eumolpides, the religious priests and ministers of the facred temple of the city of ELEVSIN. So Alcibiades for his contempt and not appearing, was Alcibiades condemned, and his goods confiscate. Besides this condemnation, they decreed also, that all the condemned religious priests and womes should have and accurate him. But herento answered one of the Nuns. religious priests and wome should ban and accurse him, But herunto answered one of the Nuns fem. called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of Agravia, faying that the was professed religious, to pray and to bleffe, norto curse and ban. After this most grieuous sentence and condemnation passed against him, Alcibiades departed out of the citie of THVRIES, and went into the countrey of PELOPONNESUS, where he continued a good season in the city of ARGOS. But in the end fearing his enemies, and having no hope to return againe to his owne countrey with any safety: he sent vnto Sparta to haue safe condust and licence of the Laced AMONI-ANS, that he might come & dwell in their country, promising them he would do to them more goodbeing now their friend, then he euer did them hurt, while he was their enemie. The LA- Altibiades CED#MONIANs granted his request, & received him very willingly into their city: where even freth to vpon his first coming, he did three things. The first was: that the LACED EMONIANS by his perswassion and procurement, did determine spedily to send aide to the Syracvsans whom they had long before delayed; and so they sent Gylippus their captaine to ouerthrow the ATHE-NIANS army, which they had fent thither. The fecond thing he did for them, was: that he made them of GRECE to begin war vpon the ATHENIANS. The third, and greatest matter of importance, was: that he did counsel them to fortifie the city of Decelea, which was within the territories of ATTICA felfe: which confumed, and brought the power of the ATHENIANS lower then any other thing what foeuer he could have done. And if he were welcome, and well efteemed in Sparta, for the seruice he did to the commonwealth: much more he wanthe loue and goodwils of private men, for that he lived after the Laconian maner. So as they that faw his skinscraped to the flesh, and saw him wash himselfe in cold water, and how he did eat browne bread, and sup of their blacke broth: would have doubted (or to say better, neuer have beleeved) that fuch a man had euer kept cooke in his house, nor that he euer had seene so much as a perfuming pan, or had touched cloth of tiffue made at MILETVM. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they fay was one whereby he most robbed mens harts:that he could frame altogether with their manners and fashions of life transforming himselfemore casily to all maner of shapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white colour : but Alcibiades could put vpon him any maners, customes or fathions, of what nation foeuer, and could follow, exercife, and counterfeit them when he would, as well the good as the had. For in Spanna he was your paintfull, and in continuity that the the the Ca. as well the good as the bad. For in Sparta, he was very painefull, and in continual exercise: milion. heliued sparingly with litle, and led a streight life. In Ion 1A, to the contrary, there he liued dain-

ther did his manners (to fay truly) receive all forts of changes. But because peraduenture, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, be might in diver s places where he came, have offended those whose company he kept; he did with such a vizard and cloke disguise himselfe, to fit their maners whom he companied with, by transforming himselfe into their naturall countenance, as he that had feene him when he was at Sparta, to hauclooked vponthe outward man, would haue faid as the common Prouerbe faith:

It is not the sonne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe.

ALCIBIADES.

Euen so, it is euen he whom Lyeurgus brought vp. But he that had inwardly seene his naturall doings, and good will indeed lye naked before him, would contrarily, have yed this common faying:

Alcibiades. got Timea king Agis

This woman is no changeling. For he entertained Queene Timaa, king Agis wife of Spakta, so well in his absence, he being abroad in the wars, that he got her with child, and she her selfe denyed it not. For she being brought to bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name:but when she was amongst her familiars and very friends, she called him softly Alcibiades, she was so farre in loue with him. And Alcibrades, iesting out the matter, said he had done it for no hurt, nor for any lust of flesh to satisfie his defire: but onely to leave of his race, to reigneamongst the Laced EMONIANS. This matter was brought by diverse vnto King Agis cares, who at the length beleeued it; but specially when he began to make a reckening of the time how long it was fince he lay with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ran out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: so that it was Lestyshides ten monetus after ere he lay againe with her. Whereupon her fon Leotychides being borne at the end of ten moneths, he faid he was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides did not fucceed afterwards in the Kingdome, because he was not of the bloud royall. After the vtterouerthrow of the Athenians in Sicilia, those of the Isles of Chicand Lesbos, with the CYZICENIANS, did send altogether their ambassadours to Sparta, to let the LACED EMO-NIANS vnderstand, they had good will to leaue the ATHENIANS, fo they would fend them aide to defend them. The BOEOTIANS fauoured those of Leseos: Pharnaba Zus, the King of PERSIAES Lieutenant, fauoured the CYZICENIANS. This notwithstanding the LACEDE-MONIANS Were better affected to helpe those of Chio first, by the perswasion of Alcibiades, who tooke their matter in hand; and he tooke sea himself and went into Asia, where he almost turned the countrey of Ionia against the Athenians: and keeping alwaies with the Generals of the Laced &Monias, he did much hurt the Athenians. Yet notwithstanding, king Agis did beare him ill will, partly for the injurie he did him in dishonouring and defiling his wife, and partly also, for that he enuted his glorie: because the rumour ranne all about, that the most part of the goodly exploits of those warres did happen well by Alcibiades meanes. Other also of the greatest authority among the Spartans, that were most ambitious among them, began in their minds to be angry with Alcibiades, for the enuie they bare him: who were offo great power, that they procured their Gouernours to write letters to their Captaines in the field to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, did no whit defift to do all that he could for thebenefite of the LACED EMONIANS: yet he had an eye behinde him, flying all occasions to falling to their hands . So in the end, for more furety of his person, he went vnto Tisaphernes one of the King of PERSIAES Licutenants, with whom he wan incontinently such credite, that he was the first and chiefest person he had about him. For this barbarous man being no simple person, but rather malicious, and subtill of nature, and that loued fine and craftie men. did wonder how he could so easily turne from one manner of living to another, and also at his quick wit and vaderstanding. Moreouer, his company and manner to passe the time away, was commonly maruellous full of mirth and pleasure, and he had such pleasant comely devices with him, that no man was of fo fullen a nature, but he would make him merie, nor fo churlish, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, & also they that enuied him, were yetgled to fee him, and it did them good to be in his company, and vie talke with him. Infomuch as this Tisaphernes (that otherwise was a churlish man, and naturally hated the GRECIANS) did giuehimselse so much vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so well, that he himselse did ftudie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make much of him. For he called Alcibiades his faire house of pleasure, and goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had many goodly gardens, sweet fprings, greene arbours, and pleafant meadowes, and those in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing veterly to find any safetie or friendship among the Spartans, and fearing on the other side King Agis also: he began to speake ill of them, and to disgrace all that they did. to Tisaphernes. By this practise he stayed Tisaphernes from aiding them so friendly as he might. and that he did not viterly defiroy the ATHENIANS: for he perswaded him that he should furnish the LACED EMONIANS but with litle money, to let them diminish and consume by litle and litle, to the end that after one had troubled and weakened the other, they both at the length should be the easier for the King to ouercome. This barbarous man did easily consent to this deuice. All the world then law he loued Alcibiades, and effected of him very much infomuch as The intend he was fought to, and regarded of all hands of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS flancie of foric, and repented them when they had received fo great loffe and hurt, for that they had decreed fo feuerely against Alcibiades, who in like maner was very forrowfull, to fee them brought to so hard termes, fearing, if the city of ATHENS came to destruction, that he him selfshould fall in the end into the hands of the LACEDEMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the Athenians was almost in the Ile of Samos, from whence with their army by fea, they fought to suppresse the rebels that were vp against them, and to keep all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily strong to relist the enemics, at the least by fea:butthey flood in feare of the power of Tisaphernes, & of the hundred and fifty gallies which were reported to be coming out of their country of PHOBNICIA to the aid of their enemies. which if they had come, the city of Arnens had bin vtterly spoiled, and for ever without hope of recouery. The which Alcibiades vnderstanding, sent secretly vnto the chiefest men that were in the army of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to give them hope he would make Tifaphernes their friend:howbeit not of any defire he had to gratifie the people, nor that he trusted to the comunalty of ATHENS, but onely to the honorable and honest citizens, and that conditionally, so as they had the heart and courage, to bridle a litle the ouer licenciousnes and insolency of the common people, and that they would take vpon them the authority to gouerne, and to redreffe their flate, and to preserve the city of ATHENS from final and vtter destruction. Vpon this advertisement, al the heads and chiefe men did giue very good eare vnto it: sauing only Phrynichus, one of the captains, & of the town of DIR ADE s: who mistrusting (that was true indeed) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward, nor who had the chiefgouernment of ATHENS, the nobility or the comunalty, & did but feek all the deuices & waies he could, to return againe if it might be possible, in any maner of fort, and that he did but curry fauour with the nobility, blaming and accusing the people:he stood altogether against the motion, wherupo Alcibiades deuice was not followed. And having now shewed himselfe open enemy to Alcibiades, he did secretly advertise Aftiochus then Admiral to the LACED EMONIANS, Of Alcibiades practife, & warned him to take heed of him, & to lay him vp fafe, as a double dealer, & one that had intelligece with both fides: but he vnderstood not how it was, one traitour to speake to another. For this Assiochus was a follower of Tisaphernes for his private commodity and perceiving Alcibiades in such credit with him, he did discouer to Alcibiades all that Phrynicus had advertised him. Alcibiades straight sent men of purpose to Samos, vnto the captains there, to accuse Phrynichus of the treason he had reucaled against the. Those of the councel there, receiving this intelligence, were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he seeing no better way to saue himself for making of this fault, went about to make amends with committing a worse fault. The rupon he sent againe to Astrochus complaining much he had disclosed him: and yet neuerthelesse he promised him, if he would keepe his counsel, that he would deliuer the whole fleet & army of the ATHENIANS into his hands. Howbeitthis treason of Phrynichus did the Athenians no hurt at all, by reaso of Astiochus counter. treason: for he did let Alcibiades againe understand what offer Phrynicus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this again the second time before the councell, by means of Alcibiades, did first aduertise the chiefe of the army of the Athenia no sthat their enemies would come and fet vpon them, and where, and how, & gaue them warning to keepe neere their ships, to make a strongwatch, and to fortific themselues with all speed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other letters from Alcibiades, by the which he did warne them againe to take heed of Phrynichus, because he had practised againe with their enemies, to deliuer the whole army of Athens into their hands. But they gaue no credit to his second letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparation and mines of the enemies, would ferue his owne turne with the false accusing of Phrynichus. Notwithstanding this, there was some fals. hood in felowship: for one Hermon, openly in the market place stabbed Phrynichus in with a das. ger & killed him. The fact being pleaded in law, and throughly confidered of the dead body by the sentence of the people was condemned for a traitour; and Hermon the murtherer and his fellowes, were crowned in recompence of their fact they had done to kill atraitor to the common wealth. Wherfore those that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the stronger and greatest men of the councel in the army of Samos: they fent one Pifander to Athens, to attempt to alter the gouernment, and to encourage the noble men to take vpon them the authority, and to pluck it from the people: affuring them that Tisaphernes would give them aide to do it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who wold make him their friend. This was the colour & cloke wher with they served their turnes, that did change the government of Athens, and that brought it into the hands of a small number of Nobilitie: for they were in all but four hundred, & yet they called them. felues five thousand. But so soone as they felt themselves strong, and that they had the whole au. thority of gouernement, without contradiction in their hands, they made then no more recks. ning of Alcibiades, and so they made wars more coldly and flackly then before. Partly because they mistrusted their civizens, who found the change of gouernment very strange: and partly also because they were of opinion that the LACED EMONIANS (who at all times did most fauor the gouernement of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common people that remained still in the city, stirred not, but were quiet against their wils, for feare of danger, because there were many of them flain, that boldly took voon them in open presence to refift these foure hundred. But those that were in the camp in the Ile of Samos, hearing these newes, were fo grieuously offended, that they resolued to returne incontinently againe, vnto the hauen of PIR AA. First of all, they sent for Alcibiades; whom they chose their captaine, then they commanded him straightly to lead them against these tyrants, who had vsurped the liberty of the people of ATHENS. But neuerthelesse he did not herein, as another would have done in this case, seeing himselse so sodainely crept againe in fauor with the common people: for he did northinke he should incontinently please and gratifiethem in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their ships; & so great an army, being before but a banished man, a vacabond, and a fugitive. But to the contrary, as it became a generall worthy of fuch a charge, he confidered with himself, that it was his part wisely to stay those, who would in a rage & furv carelessy cast themselves away, and not suffer them to do it. And truly Alcibiades was the cause of the preserving of the city of ATHENS at that time from vtter destruction. For if they had sodainely (according to their determination) departed from Samos to go to Athens: the enemies finding no man to let them, might cafily have won all the countrey of Ionia, of Helle-SPONT, and of all the other Iles without stroke striking, whilest the ATHENIANS were buse fighting one against another inciuil wars, and within the compasse of their own wals. This Alcibiades alone, & no other, did preuent, not only by perfivading the whole army, & declaring the inconvenience thereof, which would fall out vpon their fodain departure: but also by intreating fome particularly apart, & keeping a number back by very force. To bring this about, one Thra-Thrasbulus sibulus of the towne of STIRA, did helpe him much: who went through the army, and cried out a man of the vpon them that were bent to enterprise this journey: for he had the biggest and loudest voice as pice of all they say, of any man that was in all the city of ATHENS. This was a notable act, and a great piece of service done by Alcibiades: that he promised the 5 hundred saile of the Phoenicians (which the LACEDEMONIANS affordly looked for in their aid from the King of PERSIA) should not come at all, or els if they came, it should be in the fauor of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediatly, & went with great speed to Tisaphernes: whom he handled in such fort, that he brought nor the shippes that lay at rode before the city of Aspenda, and so he brake promise with the LACED EMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was maruelloufly blamed and accused, both of the one and the other fide, to have altred Tifaphernes mind, but chiefly the LACEDEMONIANS: who faid, that he had perfwaded this barbarous captaine, he should neither aid the one nor the other, but rather to fuffer themselues to denoure and destroy each other. For it had bin out of doubt, if this great fleet & nauy of the kings had come, to ioine their force with either party: that they had taken from the one of them, the legniory & domination of the sea. Shortly after, the 4. hundred noble men that had vsurped the authority & gouernment of ATHENS, were vtterly driven away and overthrowne, by meanes of the friendly aid and affiftance that Alcibiades friends gave those that tooke the peoples part. So the citizens were very well pleafed with Alcibiades, infomuch as they fent for him to returne when he thought good. But he effecting it no honour vnto him to The chie. return without some well descruing, and before he had done some greater exploit, as only vpon the peoples fauour and good will to the end that his returne might be glorious and triumphant; for sinhis he departed first from Samos with a small number of gallies, and went failing vp & downe the detirer. Iles of Cos & of GNIDOs. There he was aduertifed, that Mindarus, the Admiral of the LACE- turne. DEMONIANS, was gone with all his fleete vnto the straight of Hellespont, & that the captaines of the ATHENIANS gaue chase vnto him. Therupon he went also and sailed this her with fpeed, to aide the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with 18 gallies, euch at the very instant when they were both in the midst of their fight, with al their ships before the city of Ainstant when they were both in the midit of their ngitt, with air their improved the City of A-fee before a y pos. The battel was cruelly foughten between them from morning til night, both the one and the city of other having the better in one part of the battell, and the worst in another place. Now at the first discouery of Alcibiades coming, both parts had indeed contrary imaginations of him. For the trees the Enemies tooke heart vnto them: And the ATHENIAN'S began to be aftered. But Alcibiades fetting and Luce. vp a flag in the top of his admirall gally, to shew what he was, he presently set vpon the Pero PONNESIANS that had the better, and had certaine gallies of the ATHENIANS in chase whereupon the PELOPONNESIANS gave over their chafe, and fled. But Alcibiades followed them fo Alabades luftily, that he randiuer se of them aground, and brake their ships, & slue a great number of men that leapt into the fea, in hope to faue the felues by fwimming aland: notwith standing that Pharnabalus was come thither to aid the Laced Amonians, and did his best endenour to fauctheir 164. gallies by the feashore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end wan 20 gallies of their enemies, & faued all their own, and so did fet up certaine slags of triumph and victory. Alcibiades having now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs go shew himselfe in triumph vnto Tijaphernes. So having prepared to prefent him with goodly rich prefents, and appointed also a convenient train and number of faile meet for a General, he took his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for: for Tisaphernes standing in great hazard of displeasure, and feare of punishment at the Kings hands, having long time before bin defamed by the LACEDEMONI-Ans, who had complained of him, that he did not fulfill the Kings commandement, thought that Alcibiades was ariued in very happy houre: wherupo he kept him prisoner in the city of SAR DIS supposing the wrong he had done, would by this meanes casily discharge and purge him to the king. Yet at the end of 30 daies, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, and stealing from his keepers, Alcibiades fled voto the city of CLAZOMENES, & this did more increase the sulpition they had of Tisaphernes, ner as Sare because they thought that vnderhand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades took then sea again, da, syeth & went to feek out the army of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had found, & heard news that Form Tife. Mindarus & Pharnaba Zus were together in the city of Ctzycvm, he made an oration to his fouldiers, & declared vnto them how it was very requifite they shold fight with their enemies, both by sea and by land, and moreover that they should assault them within their forts and castles, because otherwise they could have no mony to defray their charges. His oration ended he made them immediatly hoise saile, & so to go lie at anker in the Ile of Proconness where he took order that they should keep all the pinnaces & brigantines among the ships of war, that the enemy might have no manner of intelligence of his coming. The great showres of rainealfo, with thunder and dark weather that fell out fodainly vponit, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterprife:infomuch as not only his enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knew nothing of his coming. So fome made their reckoning, that they could do litle or nothing all that day: yet he made them fodainely imbarke, and hoife faile. They were no fooner in the maine sea, but they described afarre off the gallies of their enemies, which lay at rode before the hauen of Cyzi cym. And fearing left the great number of his flect would make them fly, and take land before he could come to them: he commanded certaine captaines to stay behind, and to row foftly after him, and himfelfe with forty gallyes with him, wenttowards the enemies to prouoke them to fight. The enemies supposing there had bene no more ships then those that were in fight, did fet out presently to fight with them. They were no sooner joyned together, but Alcibiades ships that came behind, were also descried. The enemies were so afeard thereat. that they cast about and sed straight. Alcibiades leaving his sleete, followed the chase with Alcibiades twentie of the best gallies he had, and draue them aland. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued refor, at them fo couragiously at their heeles, that he flue a great number of them on the maineland. Green.

who thought by flying to have faued themselves. Moreover, Mindarus and Pharnabazus, being come out of the city to rescue their people, were ouerthrown both He slue Mindarus in the field. fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS ipoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour & riches, and took besides all their enemies ships. After they tooke the city of CIZYCVM, Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being flain, they had not only the possession of the whole countrey of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemies by force out of al parts of the fea. There were at that time certain letters intercepted, wherby a fecretary gaue aduertisement vnto the Ephoriat Sparta, of the ouerthrow in this fort: All is loft, Mindarus is flaine, our people die for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the fouldiers of ATHENS that had bene at this iourney and ouerthrow, grew to fuch pride and reputation of themselues, that they would not and disdained also to serue with other souldiers that had bene beaten many times, and went away with the worse: where they to the contrary had neuer bin ouercome as a litle before had: pened, that the captaine Thrasyllus had bene ouerthrowne by the city of Erhesvi: and for this ouerthrow, the EPHESIANS had fet vpa triumph, and token of braffe, to the vtter shame and ignominy of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades fouldiers did very much rebuke Thrafyl. lus men, and did exceedingly extoll their captaine and themselues, and would neither encampe with them, neither haue to do with them, nor yet keepe them company: vntill fuch time as Pharnabazus came with a great army against them, as well of footmen as horsemen, when they ranne a forraging vpon the ABYDENIANS: and then Alcibiades went to the refcue of them, and gaue Pharnaba Tus battell, and ouerthrew him once againe, and did together with Thrasyllus chase him even vntill dark night. Then both Alcibiades and Thrasfyllus souldiers did company together. one rejoycing with another: and fo returned all with greatioy into one campe. The nextmor. ning Alcibiades set up atriumph for the victory he had the day before, and then went to spoile and destroy Pharnaba Zus countrey where he was gouernour, and no man durst once come out to meet him. In this rode there were taken prisoners, certaine Priests and Nuns of the country. but Alcibiades freely deliuered them afterwards without ransome. And preparing to make wars against the Chalcedonians, who were revolted from the Athenians, and had received a garrison and gouernor of the LACEDEMONIANS into their city, he was aduertised that they had brought all their goods and cattels out of their fields, and had delivered them to the fafe custody of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbors & friends. Herupon he led his army into their borders, and fent a herauld to fummon the BYTHINIANS, to make amends for the wrong they had done the Athenians. The Bythinians fearing left Alcibiades would fet vpon them, did straight deliver him their goods they had before in the custody, and moreover made a league with the ATHENIAN'S besides. That done, he went and laid siege to the city of CHAL-CEDON, the which he enuironed all about from the one fide of the fea to the other. Pharnabazus Came thither, thinking to have raifed the flege. And Hippocrates a captain of the Lacedemo-NIANS, that was governor of the city, affebled al the force he was able to make within the fame, & made a fally out also vponthe ATHENIANS at the very fame time. Wherupon Alcibiades put. ting his men in order of battel, fo as they might give charge vpon the both at one instant, fought alcibiades fo valiantly, that he forced Pharnaba Zusto run his way with shame enough, & slew Hippocrates in victory at the field, with a great number of his men. Then took he the feas again, to go towards the courty of Hellespont, to get some money, were on the sodaine he did take the city of Selybrea! because he valiantly put himselfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certaine of his friends within, with whom he had fecret practife, had given him a token, that when time ferued, they would flow a burning torch in the aire at midnight: but they were compelled to flow this fire in the aire before they were ready, for fearelest one of their confederacy would be wray the matter, who fodainely repented him. Now this torch burning in the aire, was fet before Alcibiades was ready with his company. But he perceiving the figne fet tooke about thirty men with him in his company, and ranne with them to the wals of the city, having commanded the rest of his army to follow him with all speed possible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirty men: befides them there followed twenty other light armed men. Howbeit they were no fooner entred the city, but they heard the citizens arined come against them: so that there was no The present hope to scape, if they did tary their coming. Neuerthelesse, considering that vntill that present time, he was neuer ouercome in battel where he had take charge, it grieued him very much tofly wherefore wherfore it straight came in his head to make silence by found of trumpet, & after silence made, hecaused one of the that were about him to make proclamatio with a loud voice, that the Selr-BRIANIAN'S should not take armes against the Athenians. This cooled the a litle that would faine haue bene doing, because they supposed that all the army of the ATHENIANS had beene already in the citie: the other on the contrary fide, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further danger. And as they began to parle vpon composition, the rest of Alcibiades army was come on. Now he thinking in deed (which was true) that the Selybrianians fought nothing but peace, and fearing left the Thracians (which were many in number, and came with good will to ferue him in that iourney) would facke and fpoile the city, he made them all to go out againe; and so concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt vpontheir humble submission, but made them pay him a sum of mony, & so leaving a garrison of the ATHENIANS within the city, he departed thence. Whilst Alcibiades was in treaty with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that lay at the fiege of CHALCEpon, made an agreement with Pharnaba Zus, that he should give them a sum of mony, and give The Chai. vpthe towne into the Athenians hands, to enjoy it as they did before. And with expresse ecdonians condition also, that the ATHENIAN'S should make no rodes into Pharnaba Zin dominions, to recisation hurt or spoile any of his:and he likewise should be bound to give good safe conduct virto the amballadours of the ATHENIANS, to go and come fafe from time to time, to the King of Persia. The other Captaines being fworne to this peace, Pharnabaz us conditioned also that Alcibiades at his returne should likewise be sworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades said he would not be fworne at all, vnlesse Pharnaba Tus were first sworne for his part. Thus when oathes were taken of either fide, Alcibiades went also against those of BYZANTIVM, who in like tase had rebelled against the Athenians. At his first coming thither, he enuironed the city round about with a wall. Afterwards he practifed with two fecret friends of his, Anaxilaus and Lycurgus, and certaine other within the city, who promifed him to deliuer it into his hands, fo they might be affured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practife, he gaue it out that he altiblades must needs leave the siege, and depart with speed, for certain news that were come out of Ion IA: Arrangement and the run of the single state of the and the rupo he imbarked prefently, and went out of the hauen at noone daies with all his ships, tiam. howbeit he returned againe the same night. And going aland with the choisest and best armed men he had, he approched the wals of the city, without any manner of noise, and having left order with them that remained in the ships, that in the meane scason they should row with al force into the hauen, with as great cries & shouts as might be, to seare and trouble the enemies: partly to feare the BYZANTINE's the more with their fodgine coming among them, and, partly that his confederates within the city, might with better oportunity receive him and his company, into the towne with the more affured fafety, whilst enery man ranne to the hauen, to relift them that were vpon the gallies. Neuerthelesse they went not away vnfought with. For those that lay in garrison within the city, some of them Peloponnesians, other Boeotians, & other ME-GARIANS, did so valiantly repulse them that came out of their gallies, that they draue them to retireaboord again. Afterwards hearing how the Athenians were entred the city on the other side, they put theselues in battell ray, & went to meet the. The battell was terrible of both parts: but Alcibiades in the end obtained victory, leading the right wing of his battel, & Theramenes the left. The victory being gotten, he took 300 of his enemies prisoners, who had escaped the fury of winneth the battel. But after the battel, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither banished, nor Byzanium his goods conficated because it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his cosederats, that neither he nor his, should hurt any of the BYZANTINES, either in person or goods, nor any way should riste them. And Anaxilaus being afterwards accused of treaton in Laced Mmon for this practise, he answered & instified himself in such fort, that they could not find he had comitted the fault laid Vnto his charge. For he faid that he was no LACED EMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE : and that he law not Laced Emon in danger, but By zantivm, which the enemies had compassed about with a wall they had built, that it was vnpossible to bring any thing into the city. Moreouer he alkdged, that they having very finall store of corne within the city (as was true indeed) the PELO-FORMESIANS and BOEOTIANS that lay there in garrifon, did eat it vp, while the poore Byzan-TIME s themselues, their wives and children, died for very hunger. Therfore it could not be said of him, that he had betraied his courry, but rather that he had deliuered it fro the miseries & caamities the wars brought vpon it:wherin he had followed the example of the honestest men of

LACED EMON, who did acknowledge nothing honest and just, but that which was necessary and profitable for their country. The LACE DEMONIANS hearing his reasons alleadged for his purgation, were ashamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him go. Now Alcibiades desirous in the end to fee his natiue countrey againe (to speake more truly, that his country men should fee him) after he had fo many times ouerthrowne their enemies in battell: he hoifed faile and directed his course towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallies of the ATHENIANS richly furnished and decked all about with skutchines and targets, and other armour and weapon gotten amongst the spoiles of his enemies. Moreouer, he brought with him many other shippes which he had won and broken in the warres, befides many enfignes and other ornaments: all which being counted together one with the other, made vp the number of two hundred ships, Furthermore, where Duris Samian writeth (who challengeth that he came of his house) that at his returne one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the flute (that had won certaine of the Py. thian games) did play fuch an note, that at the found thereof the gally-flaues would keepe froke with their owers, and that Callippides another excellent player of Tragedies, playing the part of a comedy, did ftirre them to row, being in fuch players garments as every mafter of fuch science vseth commonly to weare, presenting himself in Theater or stage before the people to shew his art; and that the admirall galley wherein himselfe was, entred the hauen with a purple saile, asif fome maske had come into a mans house after some great banquet made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at all. Furthermore, methinks it should not be true, that he (returning from exile after folong a banishment, and having passed ouer such for rowes and calamities as he had fuftained) would fo proudly and prefumptuoufly flew himfelfe vnto the Athenians. But meerely contrary, it is most certaine, that he returned in great search & doubt. For when he was arrived in the hauen of PIRÆA, he would not set foot a land, before he first faw his nephew Euryptolemus, and divers other of his friends, from the hatches of his ship, standing vpon the sands in the hauens mouth: who were comethither to receive and welcome him, and told him that he might be bold to land, without feare of any thing. He was no fooner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to fee him, with fo great loue and affection, that they tooke no heed of the other captaines that came with him, but clustred all to him onely, and cried out for ioy to fee him. Those that could come neere him, did welcome and imbrace him: but all the people wholly followed him. And some that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head; and those that could not come necre him, saw him afar off and the old folkes did point him out to the yonger fort. But this common ioy was mingled not with standing with teares and forrow, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes and calamities, & to compare them with their prefent prosperity: waying with themselnes also how they had nor lost Sicilia, nor their hope in all things else had failed them, if they had delivered themsclues & the charge of their army into Alcibiades hands, when they sent for him to appear in person before them. Considering also how he found the city of ATHENS in maner put from the fegniorie and commandement of the fea; and on the other fide how their force by land was brought into fuch extremity, that ATHEN'S feantly could defend her fuburbs, the city felfe being so divided and turmoiled with civill diffention : yet he gathered together those few, and fmall forcethat remained, and had not only reftored ATHENS to her former power and fourraigntie on the sea, but had made her also conquerer by land. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, past before by the people, at the instant request of Callins, the sonne of Callaschru, who did preferre it : as he himselse did testifie in his Elegics, putting Alcibiades in remembrance of the good turne he had done him, faying:

ALCIBIADES.

I was the first that moved in open conference, The peoples voice to call thee home, when thou wert banisht hence, Sowas I eke the first which thereto gaue confent, And therefore may I boldly fay, by truth of fuch intent: I was the onely meane, to call thee home againe, By such request so rightly made, to move the peoples vaine. And this may serue for pledge, what friendship I thee beare : Fall sealed with a faithfull tongue, as plainely shall appeare.

But notwithstanding, the people being assembled in councell, Alcibiades came before then and made an oration:wherein he first lamented all his mishaps, and found himself grieued alid with the wrongs they had offered him, yet he imputed all in the end to his curfed fortune, and some spitefull god that enuied his glory and prosperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope Alcibiades their enemies had to have advantage of them: and therewithall perswaded the people to be of erationto good courage, and afeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned the people. him with crownes of gold, and chose him Generall againe of ATHENS, with sourraigne power and authoritie both by land and by sea. And at that very instant it was decreed by the people, choise gethat he should be restored against o his goods, and that the Priests Eumolpides should absolute nerall with him of all their curses, and that the heralds should with open proclamation revokethe execrati- four aigns ons and curfings they had thundered out against him before, by commandement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, fauing Theodorus the Bishop, who said: I did neither excommunicate him, nor curse him, if he hath done no hurt to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades flourished in his chiefest prosperitie, yet were there some notwithstanding that misliking very much the time of his landing laying, it was very valuckie and vnfortunate. For the very day of his returne and arrivall, fell out by chance on the feast which they call Plynteria, Plynteria, as you would fay, the washing day, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which day, the Priests that they call Praxiergides, to make certaine secret and hidden sacrifices and ceremonies, being the flue and twentieth day of the moneth of September, and do take from the image of this goddesse all her rayment and iewels, and keepe the image close couered ouer. Hereupon the Athenians do ascribe that day for a most vnfortunate day, and are very circumspectto do any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly scanned abroade of euery body, that it seemed the goddesse was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that she did hide her selfe, because she would not see him, nor have him comencere her. Notwithstanding all these toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found enery thing fell out well at his return, and as he would have wished it: he armed a hundred galleyes presently, to returne again to the warres: Howbeit he wisely regarded the time and solemnitie of celebration of these mysteries, and considerately stayed untill they had sinished all. And it fell out, that after the La-CED EMONIANS had taken and fortified the citie of DECELIA, within the teritorie of ATTIca, and that the enemies being the stronger in the field, did keepe the way going from ATHENS to ÉLEVSIN, so as by no possible meanes they could make their solemne procession by land, with fuch honor & deudtion as they were before accustomed to do: and therby all the facrifices, daunces, and many other holy deuout ceremonies they were wont to do by the way, in finging the holy fong of lacebus, came of very necessitie to be left off and cleane laide aside. Then Alci- Aleibiadus biades thought he should do a meritorious deed to the gods, and an acceptable to men, to bring the old coremonies up agains upon the field food, and the gods and an acceptable to men, to bring old coremonia upon the field food, and the gods and the gods are specified to the gods. the old ceremonies vp againe vpon the faid feast: and thereupon purposed to accompany the procession, and defend it by power against all inuasion and disturbance of the enemies: as one that foresaw one of these two things would come to passe: either that agis king of the LACE-DEMONIANS would not stirre at all, and that he by this meanes should so much imbaseand diminish his reputation and glorie: or if he did come out into the fiel 1, that hee would make the battell very gratefull to the gods, confidering it should be in defence of their most holy feast and worship, and in the fight of his countrey, wherethe people should see and witnesse both his valianmesse, and also his courage. Alcibiades being fully resoluted vpon this procession, went and made the priests Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their ministers and officers of these mysteries, privile to his determination. Then he sent out skoutes to watch on the fide of the hilles thereabouts, and to view the way of their preambulation, The next morning very early he fent out light horsemen also to scowre the countrey. Then he made the priests, the professed, and all the ministers of religion, go in procession, together with those that followed the same : and he himselfe compassed them about with his armie on every side, marching in battell ray, and very good order, and with great filence. This was an honourable and demont leading of an army, and such as if his greatest enemies would confesse a troth, they could not but fay, Alcibiades had as much shewed the office of a high bishop, as of a noble souldier and good captaine. So he ended this procession, returning to ATHENS in all safe order a. gaine, and not an enemy that durst once looke out into the field to set vpon them. Now this did more increase the greatnesse of his mind, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his sufficiencie, and wise conduction of an army; insomuch as they thought him vnuincible, having the soueraigne power and authority of a Generall. Furthermore, he spake so faire to the poore people, and meaner fort, that they chiefly wished and defired he would take vpon him like a King. yea, and many went to him to perswade him in it, as though he should thereby with stand all enuie, and drive away the lawes and customes of trying of matters by the voyces of the people, and all fuch fond deuices as did destroy the state of the common-weale. And furthermore, they said it was very needfull that he alone should take vpon him the whole rule and gouernement of the citie, that he might dispose all things according to his will, and not stand in feare of slanderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades euer had any mind to vsurpe the kingdome, the matter is somewhat doubtfull. But this is certain, the greatest men of the city searing lest indeed he meant some such thing, did hasten his departure as soone as they could possible, doing all other things according to his mind: and did affigne him fuch affociates in his charge of Generall. as he himfelfe best liked. So in the end he departed with a seet of a hundred galleyes, and first of all he fell with the Ile of Andros, where he ouercame by fight the inhabitants of the faid Ifle, and certaine LACED & MONIANS that were amongst them: but he tooke not the citie. which was one of the first matters his enemies did accuse him for. For if euer man was ouerthrowne and enuicd for the estimation they had of his valour and sufficiencie, truly Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and fundry feruices he had done, wonne him fuch estimation of wildome and valiantnesse, that where he flacked in any service whatsoeuer, he was presently fust exted, judging the ill successe not in that he could not, but for that he would not; and that where he vindertooke any enterprise, nothing could withstand or lye in his way. Hercupon the people perfivading themiclues that immediatly after his departure, they shold heare that the lle of Chio was taken, with all the country of Ionia, they were angry they could have no newes Lack of mo. fo siddenly from him as they looked for Moreover, they did not consider the lacke of mony he nes, there- had, and specially making war with such enemies, as were euer relieued with the great King of PERSIAES aid, and that for necessities fake he was fundry times driven to leave his campe, to feeke mony where he could get it, to pay his fouldiers, and to maintain his army. Now for testimony hereof, the last accusation that was against him, was only for this matter. Ly sander being fent by the Laced Amontans for admiral and general of their army by sea, vsed such policy with Cyrue the king of PERSIAES brother, that he got into his hands a great fum of money by means wheref he gaue vnto his mariners foure oboles a day for their wages, where before they were wont to have but three, and yet Alcibiades had much ado to furnish his with three onely a day. For this cause, to get mony, Alcibiades failed into CHARIA. But in the meane time Antiochiu whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenant behind him, and had given him charge of all the ships in his absence, being a very skilfull sea-man, but otherwise a hasty harebraynd foole, and of small capacity: he being expressly commanded by Alcibiades not to fight in any case, though the enemies offered him battell, was so foolishrash, & made so lirle reckoning of his straight commandement, that he armed his own galley, wher of him felf was captaine, and other befides, and went to the city of LPHESVS, paffing all along his enemies galleys, reuiling and offering villany to those that frood vpon the hatches of their galleys. Lyfander being maruellously prouoked by these words, went and encountered him at the first with a few ships. The other captaines of the galiles of the Athenians, feeing Antiochus in danger, went to aid him, one after another. Then Lylander of his part alfo fet out all his whole fleete against him, and in the end ouercame them: An nother felfe was killed in the conflict, and many gallies and men were taken prisoners: whereof Lyfander fet vp shewes of triumph in token of victory. Alcibiades hearing this ill fauorednewes, returned prefently with all possible speede to Samos; and when he came thither, he went with all the rest of his sect to offer Lylander battell. But Lylander quietly contenting himsclfwith his first victory, went not out against him. Now this victory was no sooner wonne, but one Thrasqlinlusthe lon of Thrason Alcibiades enemy, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS to accuse Alcibiades to the people : whom he informed how all went to wracke, & that he had loft many ships, for that he regarded not his charge, carelessy putting me in trust, whom he gaue too great credit to because they were good sellowes, and would drinke drunke with him, and were full of mariners mockes and knauish leastes, such as they vie commonly amongst themselves. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleasure abroad, hereand there, scraping moncy together where he could come by it, keeping good cheare, and seasting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN curtifans, when the enemies army was so neare theirs as it was. Moreouer, they laid to his charge, that he did fortifie a castle in the courty of Thracia, neere vnto the city BISANTHE, for a place to retire himselfe vnto, either because he could not, or rather that he would not live any longer in his owne country. Vpon those accusations, the ATHENIANS giving credit to the report, did immediatly chuse new Captaines, and thereby declared their misliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, & fearing lest they would do him some worse Alcibiades harme, did leaue straight the ATHENIANS campe, and gathering acertaine number of strangers together, went of himselfe to make warre vpon certaine free people of the Thracians, 170 Genewho were subject to no Prince nor state: where he got a maruellous masse of money together, rail. by meanes whereof he did affure the Grecians inhabiting those marches, from all inuafion offorraine enemies. Now Tydeus, and Menander, and Adimanthus the ATHENIAN'S captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the goats river, with all the galleys the citie of A-THEN'S had at that time vpon the coast:vsed enery morning commonly to go to the sea, to offer battell to Lyfander, who rode at anker before the citic of Lampfacus, with all the LACED E- Lifander MONIANS armie by fea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, fode at any in very ill order, without either watch or ward, as men that were carelesse of their enemies. Al- Lampfacus. sibiades being on the land not far off, and finding their great fault and negligence, took his horse, and went to them, and told them that they lay on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nortowne, and where they were driven to feeke their victuals, as farre as to the city of SESTOS, and that they suffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, and go aland when they lay at anker, ftragling vp and downe the countrey as they would themselues, without regard that there lay a great armie of their enemies before the, ready to be set out at the Generals commandement: and therefore he aduited them to remove thence, and to go to cast anker before the civie of S_B stos. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, The Ather Tydeus, one of the captaines, floutly commanded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to do with the matter, and that other had charge of the army. Whereupon Atcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, did depart presently from them. And as he went his way, he faid to some of his friends which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the Athenians had not bene so round with him, he would have forced the LACEDEMONIANS to have come to battell in despight of their beardes, or else he would have driven them to forfake their shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to have done it, because he could have brought from land a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horsemen, with whom he might have given a charge vpon the LACED ÆMONIANS, and done great mischiese vnto their campe. But now, how wisely Alcibiades did foreseethe faults he told the ATHBNIANS captaines of, their great misfortune and losse that followed incontinently, did too plainely witnesse it to the world. For Lysander came so fiercely vpon them on a sodaine, that of all the shippes that they had in their The Ather whole fleete, onely eight galleyes were faued, with whom Conon fled : and the other being not nians overmuchlesse then two hundred in number, were every one of them taken and caried away, with three thousand prisoners whom Lysander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the city self dibentaof ATHENS, and razed their long wals even to the ground. After this great and notable victorie, konby Ly-Alcibiades fearing forc the LACED EMONIANS, Whothen without let or interruption of any, were onely Lords and Princes by sea and by land:he went into the countrey of BYTHINIA, and caused great goods to be brought after him, and tooke a maruellous sum of mony with him, befides great riches he left also in the castles of Thracia, where he did remaine before. Howbeit the country of By. he lost much of his goods in Bythinia, which certain Thracians dwelling in that country, thinia. had robbed him of and taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king artaxerxes, hoping that when the king had once proued him, he shold find him a man of no lesse seruice, then he had found Themistocles before him : besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be much juster then his was: for he did not go thither to make war against the city of A-THENS and his country, as Themistocles did:but of a contrary intent, to make intercession to the king, that it would please him to aid them: Now Alcibiades thinking he could vie no better mean then PharnabaZus helpe only, to fee him safely conducted to the kings court : he tooke his journey to him into the country of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certain time to attend vpon him, & Lylander was honorably entertained and received of Pharnabazus. All this while the Athenians apositud found themselues desolate, and in miserable state to see their empire lost: but then much more, our the ciwhen Lyfander had taken away their liberties, & fet thirty gouernours ouer their city. Now too late, after all was lost (where they might hauerecouered againe, if they had bene wise) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miseries and wretched state, looking backe vpon all their wilfull faults and follies committed: among which, they did reckon their fecond time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greatest fault: for they banished him only of malice and difpleasure, not for any offence himselfe in person had committed against them, sauing that his lieutenant in his absence had shamefully lost a few of their shippes : and they themselves more fhamefully had driven out of their city, the noblest fouldier, and most skilfull captaine that they had. And yet they had some litle poore hope left, that they were not altogether cast away, so long as Alcibiades lived and had his health. For before, when he was a forfaken man, and led a banished life, yet he could not liue idlely, and do nothing: wherefore now much more, faid they to themselues, if there be any helpe at all, he will not suffer out of doubt the insolencie and pride of the LACED AMONIANS; nor yet abide the cruchties and outrages of these thirty tyrants. And furely the common people had some reason to have these thoughts in their heads, considering that the thirty gouernois themselues did what they could possibly to spie out Alcibiades doings, and what he went about. Infomuch as Critias at the last, declared to Lysander, that so long the LACED EMONIANS might reckon themselves Lords over all GRECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authority of the city of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithstanding the people of ATHENS could well away to line like subjects vnder the gouernement of a few : yet Alcibiades whilest he lived, would never suffer them so to be reigned over, but would attempt by all deuice he could, to bring a change and innovation among them. Yet Lysander would not credite these perswasions, before speciall commandement was sent to him from the Senate of LACED AMON, vpon his allegiance, that he should deuise to kill Ilesbiades by all meanes he could procure: either because in troth they feared the subtiltie of his wit, and the greatnesse of his courage, to enterprise matters of great weight and danger, or else that they demonians fought to gratific King Agis by it. Ly fander being thus straightly commanded, did send and practife incontinently with Pharnaba Zus to execute the fact: who gaue his brother Mugans, and his Alcibiades. vncle Susamithres commission to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certaine village of PHRYGIA, with a cocubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how she dandling him in her armes, had dressed his Alcibiades head, frizeled his haire, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other fay, that he thought Phrygiabs. Magaus strake off his head, and made his body to be burnt: and the voice goeth this vision was but a litle before his death. Those that were sent to kill him, durst not enter the house where he was, but set it on fire round about, Alcibiades spying the fire, got such apparell and hangings as he had, and threw it on the fire, thinking to have put it out: and fo casting his cloke about his lest arme, tooke his naked fword in his other hand, and ranne out of the house, himself not once tou. ched with fire, sauing his clothes were a litle singed. These murtherers so soone as they spied him drew backe, and flood afunder, and durst not one of them come neere him, to stand and fight with him:but a farre off, they bestowed so many arrowes and darts on him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and rooke his body, which she wrapped up in the best linnen she had, and buried him as honourably as she could possible, with such things as she had, and could get together. Some hold opinion that Lais, the only famous curtifan, which they say was of Corinth (though indeed she was borne in a litle towne of Sicilia, called HICCARA, where she was taken) was his daughter. Notwithstanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are some that agree to all the rest I have written, saving that they say, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lyfander, nor the LACED EMONIANS, which caused him to be flaine but that he keeping with a yong gentlewoman of a noble house, whom he had stolne away, and

HE house of the Martians at Rome was of the number of the Patrici- The familie ans, out of the which haue sprung many noble personages, whereof Ancus Martius was one, King Numaes daughters fonne, who was King of Rome after Tullus Holtilius. Of the same house were Publius and Quintus, who brought to Rome their best water they had by conduits. Martins, Censorinus also came of that family, that was so surnamed, because the people had chosen him Censor twise. Through whose perswasion they conduits to made a law, that no man from thence forth might require, or enioy Rome. the Cenforship twise. Caius Martins, whose life we intend now Conformus by his fasher works and the conformus to the conformu to write, being left an orphane by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widow, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many discomodities to a child, but doth not hinder him to become an honest man, and to excell in vertue about the common fort: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully do complaine, that it is the occasion of their casting away, for that no man intheir youth taketh any care of them to fee them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man also is a good proofe to confirme some mens opinions: That a rare and excellent wit vntaught, doth bring forth many good and cuill things together: as a fat foile that lyeth vnmanured bringeth foorth both hearbes and weeds. For this Martius naturall wit and great heart did maruelloufly stirre up his courage to do and attempt notable acts. But on the other fide for lacke of education, he was to cholericke and impatient, that he would yeeld to no lining creature: which made him churlish, vnciuill, and altogether vnsit for any mans conucrsation. Yet men maruelling much at his constancie, that he was neuer ouercome with pleasure nor mony, & how he wold endure easily all maner of paines & trauels: the rupon they well liked and commended his floutnesse and temperancy. But for all that they could not be acquainted with him, as one citizen vseth to be with another in the city; his behaulour was so vnpleasant to them by reason of a certaine insolent and stern maner he had, which because he was too Lordly, was difliked. And to fay truly, the greatest benefite that learning bringeth vnto men, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compasse and rule of reason, to be civill and courteous, and to like better the meane state, then the higher. Now in those daies, valiantnes was honored in Rome aboue all other vertues: which they call virtue, by the name of vertue it selfe, as including in that generall name, all other speciall vertues besides. So that virtus in the Latine, was as much as valiantnesse. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time, beganne from his childhood to giue himfelfe to handle weapons, and daily did exercise himselse therein: and he esteemed outward armour to no purpose, vnlesse one were naturally armed within. Moreouer hedid so exercise his body to hardnesse and all kinde of activitie, that he was very swift in running, strong in wrestling, and mightie in griping, fo that no man could euer cast him, Insomuch as those that would try masteries with him for ftrength and nimblenesse, would say when they were ouercom: that all was by reason of his naturall ftrength, and hardnesse of ward, that neuer yeelded to any paine or toyle he tooke vpon him. The first time he went to the wars, being but a stripling, was when Tarquine surnamed the proud(that had bene king of Rome, and was driven out for his pride, after many attemps made by fundry battels to come in againe, wherein he was ener ouercome) did come to Rome with all the aide of the LATINES, and many other people of ITALY: cuenas it were to fet up his whole rest vpon a battel by them, who with a great and mighty army had vndertaken to put him into his kingdome againe, not so much to pleasure him, as to ouerthrow the power of the Ro-MAINES, whose greatnesse they both feared and enuied. In this battell, wherein are many hote and sharpe encounters of either party, Martins valiantly fought in the fight of the Diffator: and a Romaine fouldier being throwne to the ground even hard by him, Marium straight bestird him, and flue the enemie with his owne hands that had before ouerthrowne the ROMAINE. Hereupon after the battell was won, the Dictator did not forget so noble anact, and therefore first of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oaken boughes. For whosoeuer faueth the life of a Romaine, it is a manner among them, to honour him with fuch a garkand. This was, either because the law did this honour to the oke, in fauour of the Arcadians, who by the oracle of Apollo were in old time called eaters of akornes: or els becaufe the fouldiers might eafily in euery place come by oken boughs: or lastly, because they thought it very necessary, to give him that had faued a citizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of cities, and thought amongst other wild trees to bring forth a profitable fruit, and of plants to be the strongest. Moreouer, men at the first beginning did vse akornes for their bread, & hony for their drink: and further, the oke did feed their beasts, and giue them birds, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made bird-lime to catch filly birds. They fay that Call or and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and that incontinently after the battell, men saw them in the market place at Rom B, all their horses being on a white soame and they were the first that brought newes of the victorie, cuen in the same place, where remaineth at this present a temple built in the honor of them, neere vnto the fountaine. And this is the cause, why the day of this victorie (which was the fifteenth of July) is cosecrated yet to this day vnto Castor and Pollux. Moreouer it is daily seene, that honour and reputation lighting on young men before their time, & before they have any great courage by nature, the defire to win more dyeth straight in them, which casily happenerh, the same having no deepe roote in them before, Where contrariwife, the first honour that valiant minds do come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, hasting them forward as with force of wind, to enterprise things of high deseruing praise. For they esteeme not to receive reward for service done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them do better in time to come: and be assamed also to cast their honour at their hecles, not seeking to increase it still by like desert of worthic valiant deeds. This defire being bred in Martins, he strained still to passe himselfe in manlinesseand being desirous to shew a daily increase of his valiantnesse, his noble service did still advance his fame, bringing in spoiles vpon spoyles from the enemies. Whereupon, the Captaines that came afterwards (for enuic of them that went before) did contend who should most honour him, and who should beare most honourable testimony of his valiant nesses. Insomuch as the ROMAINES having many warres and battels in those dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence he returned not with fome reward of honor. And as for other, the onely respect that made them valiant, was that they hoped to haue honour buttouching Maitius, the onely thing that made him to loue honour, was the loy he faw his mother did take of him. For hethought nothing made him so happy & honourable, as that his mother might heare euery body praise and commend him, that she might alwaies see him return with a crown vpon his head, and that she might still imbrace him with teares running downe her cheekes for ioy: Which desire they say Epaminondas did anow and confesse to have bene in him, as to think himfelfe a most happy & blessed man, that his father & mother in their life time had seen the victory he wan in the plaine of Levernes. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good hap, to have his nond a did father and mother living, to be partakers of his joy & prosperity but Martins thinking all due to their desire his mother, that had bin also due to his father if he had lived, did not only content himself to re- of bonur aiovee & honor her, but at her defire took a wife also, by whom he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers house therfore. Now he being grown to greateredit and authority in Rome ence of cofor his valiantnesse, it fortuned there grew sedition in the city, because the Senate did sanour the bit mother, rich against the people, who did complaine of the fore oppression of vsurers, of whom they borrowed mony. For those that had litle, were yet spoiled of that litle they had by their creditors, for lack of ability to pay the viury: who offered their goods to be fold to the that would give most. of viury And fuch as had nothing left, their bodies were laid hold on, and they were made their bondmen, notwithstanding all the wounds and cuts they shewed, which they had received in many by the peobattels, fighting for defence of their countrey and common wealth; of the which, the last warre ple. they made was against the SABYNES, wherein they fought vpon the promise the rich men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate the more gently, and also you the word of Marcus Valerius chiefe of the Senate, who by authority of the Counfell, and in the behalfe of counfellers therich, said they should performe that they had promised. But after that they had faithfully ser- promise ued in this last battel of al, where they ouercame their enemies, seeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would give no eare to them, but made as hope of inf though they had forgotten the former promife, and fuffered them to be made flaues and bond- performace, men to their creditours, and besides, to be turned out of all that ever they had: they fel then even to flat rebellion & mutiny, and to stirre vp dangerous tumults within the city. The Romaines femile vo enemies hearing of this rebellion, did straight enter the teritories of Rome with a maruellous rewarded, great power, spoiling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made o- resultion. pen proclamation by found of trumpet, that all those that were of lawfull age to cary weapon, should come and enter their names into the muster-masters book, to go to the wars; but no man obeyed their commandement. Wherupon their chiefe magistrates, and many of the Senate, beganto be of diuers opinions among the selues. For some thought it was reason, they shold somewhat yeeld to the poore peoples request, and that they should a litle qualifie the severity of the law. Other held hard against that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alledged, that the coriolanus creditours lofting their money they had lent, was not the worst thing that was herein; but that "sim" the the lenity that was fauoured, was a beginning of disobedience, and that the proud attempt of the communalty, wasto abolish law, and to bring all to confusion. Therefore he faid, if the Senate were wife, they should betimes preuent and quench this ill fauoured & worse meant beginning. The Senate mer many daies in confultation about it: but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore common people feeing no redreffe, gathered themselves one day together, and one The people encouraging another, they all for fook the city, & encamped themselves you a hil, called at that leave the day the holy hill, along the river of Tyber, offering no creature any hurt or violence, or making any shew of actuall rebellion, fauing that they cried as they went vp and down, that the rich men had driven them out of the city, and that throughout all ITALY they might find aire, water, and ground to bury them in. Moreover, they faid, to dwell at Rome was nothing els but to be flain, or hurt with continuall wars, and fighting for defence of the rich mens goods. The Senate beingafeard of their departure, did fend vnto them certaine of the pleasantest old men, and the mostacceptable to the people among them. Of those Menenius Agrippa was he, who was sent for chiefe man of the meffage from the Senate. He after many good perswasions and gentle requests made to the people, on the behalfe of the Senate, knit vp his oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner. That on a time all the members of mans body did rebell against the Answelbelly, complaining of it, that it only remained in the midst of the body, without doing any thing, lent take neither did beare any labour to the maintenance of the rest: wheras all other parts and members neither did beare any labour to the maintenance of the rest: wheras all other parts and members neither did beare any labour to the maintenance of the rest: wheras all other parts and members did labour painfully, & were very carefull to fatisfie the appetites and defires of the body. And grippa to fothe belly, all this not with standing, laughed at their folly, and said: It is true, I first receive all pacific the meates that nourish mans body: but afterwards I fend it agains to the nourishment of other parts of the same. Euen so (quoth he)O you, my masters, and citizens of Rome, the reason is alike be-

dier and a captaine to be, not only terrible and fierce to lay about him, but to make the enemy afeard with the found of his voice, & grimnesse of his countenance. The there slocked about him immediatly, a great number of Romaines; whereat the enemies were fo afeard, that they gave back prefenly. But Martius not flaving foodid chase & follow them to their own gates, that fled for life. And there perceining that the ROMAINES retired back, for the great number of darts & arrowes which flew; bout their cares from the wals of the city, and that there was not one min among fit the that durft venter himself to follow the flying enemies into their city, for that it was fall of men of warre, very well armed and appointed he did incourage his fellowes with words & deeds crying out to the that fortune had opened the gates of the city, more for the followers then the filers. But all this not with standing, few had the hearts to follow him . How beit Martins being in the throng among ft the enemies, thrust himself into the gates of the city, & entred the fame among them that fled, without that any one of them durft at the first turne their face you him, or offer to flay him. But he looking about him, and feeing he was entred the city with very few men to helpe him, and perceiving he was enuironed by his enemies that gathered roundabout to fet upon him, did things as it is written, wonderfull and incredible, as well for the force of his hand, as also for the egility of his body, and with a wonderfull courage and valiantnesse he made a lane through the midft of them, and ouerthrew also those he layed at: that some he made runne to the furthest part of the city, and other for feare he made yeeld themselves, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes Martin, that was gotten out, had some lei-The city of fire to bring the ROMAINE'S with more fafety into the city. The city being taken in this fort, the most part of the fouldiers began incontinently to spoile, to cary away, and to looke up the bootie they had wonne. But Martins was maruellous angry with them, and cryed out on them, that it was no time now to looke after spoile, and to runne stragling here and there to enrich themselves, whilest the other Consull and their fellow citizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and how that leauing the spoile, they should sceke to winde Wherfore taking those that willingly offered themselves to follow modity that cometh vnto enery one of you. These perswasions pacified the people conditional him, he went out of the city, and tooke his way toward that part, where he vnderstood the rest ly, that the Senate would grant there shold be yearely chosen fine Magistrates, which they now of the army was, exhorting and intreating them by the way that followed him, not to be faintcall Tribuni plebe, whose office should be to defend the poore people from violence & oppress. hearted; & oft holding vp his hands to heaven, he befought the gods to be gracious and fauouon. So Junius Brutus, and Sictnius Velutus, were the first tribunes of the people that were chosen rable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, & in a good houre to hazard his life in defence of his county-men. Now the ROMAINES when they were put in battell ray, and ready againe to good quiet and vnity, the people immediatly went to the wars, flewing that they had totake their targets on their armes, and to gird them vpon their arming coates, had a custome to make their willes at that very instant, without any maner of writing, naming him onely whom souldiers they would command, concerning the wars. Martius also though it liked him nothing to feethe they would make their heire in the presence of three or foure witnesses. Martius came iust to that sesamens, greatnesse of the people thus increased, considering it was to the prejudice and imbasing of the reckoning, whilst the fouldiers were doing after that fort, & that the enemies were approached Nobility, and also faw that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as himselfe: he did per. so neere, as one stood in view of the other. When they faw him at his first coming all bloudy, fwade the Patricians, to show themselves no lesse forward and willing to fight for their country and in a five ate, and but with a few men following him: somether eupon beganne to be a feard. then the common people were: & to let them know by their deeds and acts, that they did not fe But foone after, when they faw him runne with a lively cheere to the Confull, and to take him much passe the people in power and riches, as they did exceed them in true nobility and valiant. by the hand, declaring how he had taken the city of Coriols, and that they faw the Confull neffe in the country of the Volsces against whom the Romaines made warre at that time Commissional fo kiffe and imbrace him, then there was not a man but took heart again to him, and there was a principal city and of most same, that was called Corior as, before the which the beganne to be of good courage, some hearing him report from point to point, the happy suc-Conful Committee did Lay fiege. Wherfore all the other Volse Es fearing left that city should be ceffe of this exploit, and other also coniccturing it by seeing their gestures afarre off. Then they taken by effault, they came from all parts of the countrey to faucit, intending to give the Ro. all began to call vpon the Consult to march forward, and to delay no longer, but to give charge voon the enemie. Martius asked him how the order of their enemies battell was, and on Commins understanding this denided his army also into two parts, and taking the one part with which fide they had placed their best fighting men. The Consull made him answer, that he himfelf, he marched cowards them that were drawing to the city out of the country; and then thought the bands which were in the vaward of their battell, were those of the ANTIATES, ther part of his army he left in the campe with Titus Latius (one of the valiantest men the Ro. whom they esteemed to be the warlikest men, and which for valiant courage would giueno place, to any of the hoast of their enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be set directly against them. By coriolathe Corior and making final account of the that lay in campe before the city, made a fally our The Confull granted him, greatly praifing his courage. Then Martius, when both armies mus meanes, VPON them, in the which at the first the Cortolans had the better, and draue the ROMAINE came almost to ioyne, aduanced himselfe a good space before his company, and went so sierce- the rolls back againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, running our ly to give charge on the vaward that came right against him, that they could stand no longer in come in batof the camp with a few men with him, he flue the first enemies he met withall, and made the rest his hands: he made fuch a lane through them, and opened a passage into the battell of the eneof them stay upon the fodain, crying out to the ROMAINE s that had turned their backs, and cal mies. But the two wings of either fide turned one to the other, to compaffe him in betweene ling the again to fight with a loud voice. For he was even fuch another, as Cato would have a foul them: which the Consull Cominius perceiuing, he sent thither straight of the best souldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruellous bloudie about Martius, and in a very short space many were flaine in the place. But in the end the Romaine's were fo ftrong, that they diffresfedtheenemies, and brake their arraye: and fcattering them, made them flyc. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, because they saw he was able to do no more, he was already so wearied with the great paine he had taken, and so faint with the great woundes he had vpon him. But Martius answered them, that it was not for conquerous to yeeld, nor tobe faint hearted: and thereupon began afresh to chase those that sledde, vntill such time as thearmie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowne, and numbers of them flaine and taken prifoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Confull, and the other Romaines withhim. There the Confull Cominius going vp to his chayre of state, in the presence of the wholearmie, gaue thanks to the gods for fogreat, glorious, and prosperous a victorie: then he spake to Marius, whose valiantnesse he commended beyond the Moone, both for that he himselfe faw him do with his eyes, as also for that Martins had reported vnto him. So in the The tenth end he willed Martius, that he should choose out of all the horses they had taken of their e- part of the nemies, and of all their goods they had wonne (whereof there was great store) tenne of enemies goods offer euery sort which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Besides this red Martigreat honourable offer he had made him, he gaue him in testimonie that he had wonne that "for reday the prife of proweffe about all other, a goodly horse with a capparison, and all furniture femice, by to him which the whole army beholding, did maruelloufly praise and commend. But Mar- cominion thus stepping forth, told the Consull, he most thankfully accepted the gift of his horse, and the consult. was a glad man befides, that his feruice had deferued his Generals commendation; and as for rewarded his other offer, which was rather a mercenarie reward, then a honourable recompence, he with home would have none of it, but was contented to have his equall part with the other fouldiers. inthe field Onely, this grace (faid he) I craue and befeech you to grant me: Among the Volces noble anthere is an old friend and hoast of mine, an honest wealthy man, and now a prisoner, who see and liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrey, liueth now a poore prisoner, in the hands of his enemies: & yet notwithstanding all this his misfery & misfortune, it would do me great pleafure if I could faue him from this one danger, to keepe him from being fold as a flaue. The foul. diers hearing Martius words, made a maruellous great shout among them, and there were more that wondred at his great contentation and abstinence, when they faw so litle couetousnesse in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valiantnesse. For even they themselves that did somewhat malice and enuy his glory, to see him thus honoured and passingly praised did thinkehim so much the more worthy of an honorable recompence for his valiant service as the more carclefly he refused the great offer made vnto him for his profit: and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse such rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as vnto a worthy person. For it is farre more commendable, to vse riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to defire them then to vie them well. After this shout and noise of the assembly was somewhat appealed, the Consult Cominius began to speake in this sorr: We cannot compell Martius to take the segifts we offer him if he will not receiue them, but we will giue him fuch a reward for the noble feruice he hath done, as he cannot refuse. Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, vnlesse his valiant acts have wonne him that name before our nomination. And so ever since, he still barethe third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the Romaines have, as Catus, was as our Christian name now. The second as Martins, was the name of the house and family they came of. The third was some addition given, either for some act or notable service, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their body, or else for some special vertue they had. Euen fo did the Grecians in old time give additions to Princes, by reason of some notable act worthy memory. As when they have called some, Soter and Callinicos, as much to say as fauiour & conqueror. Or els of some notable apparant mark on ones face, or on his body, they have called him Pifcon and Grypos: as ye would fay, gorebelly, and hooke nofed, or elfe for fome vertue, as Euergetes, and Philadelphes, to wit, a benefactor, and louer of his brethren. Or otherwise for ones great felicity, as Eudemon: as much to say, as fortunate. For so was the second of *These were the * Battes surnamed. And some Kings have had surnames of iest and mockery. As one of the Antigones that was called Doson, to fay, the Giver: who was ever promising, and never giving. And one of Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to fay conceitiue. The ROMAINES vie more then any other nation, to give names of mockery in this fort. As there was one Metellus furnamed Diadematus, the banded, because he caried a band about his head of long time, by reason of a sore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne family was called celer, the quicke flic, because a few dayes after the death of his father, he shewed the people the cruell fight of fencers at vnrebated fwords, which they found wonderful for the shortnesse of time. Other had their surnames deriued of some accident at their birth. As to this day they call him Proculetus, that is born, his father being in some farre voyage: and him Posthumius, that is borne after the death of his father. And when of two brethren twins, the one doth die, and the other furuineth they call the furuiner, Vi pifeus. Sometime also they give surnames derived of some marke or missortune of the body: 25 Sylla, to fay crooke noted: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Cacus blind: Claudus, lame. They did wifely in this thing to accustome men to thinke, that neither the losse of their sight, nor other such mil fortunes as may chance to men, are any shame or disgrace vnto them, but the manner was to an fwer boldly to fuch names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters wold be better amplified in other frories then this. Now when this war was ended the flatterers of the people began tostirre vp sedition again, without any new occasion, or inst matter offered of complaint. For they did ground this fecond infurrection against the Nobility and Patricians, vpon the peoples milery & misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former dif cord & feditio between the & the nobility. Because the most part of the arable land within the territory of Rome, was become heathy & barre for lack of plowing, for that they had notime nor mean to cause corne to be brought the out of other countries to sow, by reaso of their wars which made the extreme dearth they had among the. Now those busic pratiers that sought the peoples good wil by fuch flattering words, perceiuing great scarsity of corne to be within the ci ty, & though there had bin plenty enough, yet the common people had no mony to buy it: they fpread abroadfalse tales & rumors against the Nobility, that they in reuenge of the people, had practised & procured the extreme dearth among the Furthermore, in the midst of this stir, there came Ambassadours to Rome from the city of Velitres, that offered up their city to the Ro-MAINES, and prayed them they would fend new inhabitants to replenish the same: because the plague had bene so extreme among them, and had killed such a number of them, as there was not lest aliue the tenth person of the people that had bin there before. So the wise men of Rome began to thinke, that the necessity of the Velitrians fell out in a most happy houre, and how by this occasion it was very meet in so great a scarsity of victuals, to disburden Rome of a great number of citizens: and by this means as well to take away this new sedition, & vtterly to ridit out of the city, as also to cleare the same of many mutinous & seditious persons, being the super-Auous ill humours that grieuoufly fed this discase. Hereupon the Consuls prickt out all those by Pelitres a bill, whom they intended to send to VELITRES, to go dwell there as in forme of a colonie: made aco and they leavied out all the rest that remained in the city of Rome sagreat number to go against Rome. the Volsces, hoping by the mean of forraine warre, to pacific their sedition at home. Moreo-Two practiuer they imagined, when the poore with the rich, and the meane fort with the Nobility, should must be by this deuice be abroad in the warres, and in one campe, and in one service, and in one like dangerthat then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two seditious Tribunes, spake against either of these deuices, and cried out vpon the noble mea, that vnder Britis Trithe gentle name of a Colonie, they would cloake and colour the most cruell and vnnaturall fact bunes of as might besbecause they sent their poore citizens into a sore infected city & pestilent ayre, soll the propie, again their poore citizens into a sore infected city & pestilent ayre, soll again their of dead bodies vnburied, and there also to dwell vnder the tuition of a strange god, that had so those denicruelly perfecuted his people. This were (faid they) euen as much, as if the Senate should headlong cast downe the people into a most bottomlesse pit. And are not yet contented to have samilhed some of the poore citizens heretofore to Jeath, & to put other of them even to the mercie of the plague: but afresh they have procured a voluntary warre, to the end they would leave behind no kind of misery and ill, wherewith the poore filly people should not be plagued, and onely because they are weary to serue the rich. The common people being set on a broile and brauery with these words, would not appeare when the Consuls called their names by a bill, to pressethem for the warres, neither would they be sent out to this new colonie: in somuch as the Senateknew not well what to fay or to do in the matter. Martins then, who was now growne to great credit, and a stout man besides, & of great reputation with the noblest men of Rome, sose vp, and openly spake against these flattering Tribunes. And for the replenishing of the citie of Corisland VELITRES, he did compell those that were chosen to go thither, and to depart the city, vpon offenderb great penalties to him that should disobey but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or constrained. So Martius taking his friends and followers with him, and such as he coriolanus could by faire words increat to go with him, did run certain for reyes into the dominion of the imadeth ANTIATES, where he met with great plenty of corne, and had a maruellous great spoile, aswel ses & brinof cattell as of men he had taken prisoners, whom he brought away with him, and reserved no- get with thing for himselfe. Afterwards having brought back againe all his men that went out with him, fafe and found to Rome, and enery man rich and loaden with spoile: then the home-tariers and house-doues that kept Rome stil, began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him, and so enuied both rhem that had sped so well in this journey, and also of malice to Martius, they spited to see his credit and estimation encrease still more and more, because they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortly after this, Martins stood for the Consulship and the common people fauoured his fuit, thinking it would be a shame to them to deny and refuse the chiefest noble man of bloud, and most worthy person of Rome, & specially him that had done fo great feruice and good to the common-wealth. For the custome of Rome was at that time, The marter that such as did sue for any office, should for certaine dayes before be in the market place, onely with a poore gowne on their backs, and without any coate vnderneathe, to pray the citizens Rome. to remember them at the day of election: which was thus denifed, either to moue the people whereupon themore, by requesting them in such meane apparell, or else because they might shew them this means their wounds they had gotten in the warres in the feruice of the common-wealth, as manifest offung markes and testimonies of their valiantnesse. Now it is not to be thought that the surer was so de thus loofe in a simple governe in the market place without part of the surer server that the surer server with the surer server server the surer server ser thus loofe in a simple gowne in the market place, without any coate vnder it, for feare, and suf. Officer gipition of the common people: for offices of dignity in the city were not then given by favour wentless by or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and selling fell out within famelection of officers, and that the voyces of the electours were bought for money. But after Hor or cor-corruption had once gotten way into the election of offices, it hath runne from man to man euen to the very sentence of judges, and also among captaines in the warres: so as in the end, that onely turned common wealths into Kingdomes, by making armes subject to mony. Therefore me thinkes he had reason that said:he that first made banquets, and gaue money to the common people, was the first that tooke away authority, and destroyed common wealth, But this pessilence crept in by litle and litle, & did secretly win ground still, continuing a long time in Roun. before it was openly knowne and discouered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the peoples voices for mony nor that corrupted the fentence of the Iudges. Howbeitz ATHENS some hold opinion, that Anytus, the sonne of Anthemion, was the first that fed the Iudgeswith mony, about the end of the warres of PELOFONNESVS, being accused of treason for yeelding up the fort of Pyle at that time, when the golden and unfoiled age remained ver whole in indigment at Rome. Now Martins following this custome, shewed many wounds and cuts vpon his body, which he had received in seventeene yeares service at the wars, and in many sundrie battels, being euer the foremost man that did set out feete to fight, So that there was not a man among the people, but was ashamed of himselfe, to refuse so valiant a man and one of them faid to another, we must needs chuse him Consul, there is no remedy. But when the day of electio was come, & that Martius came to the market place with great pomp, accompanied with all the Senate and the whole Nobility of the city about him, who fought to make him Confull, with the greatest instance & intreaty they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter:then the love and goodwill of the common people turned straight to an hate and envy toward him fearing to put this office of foueraigne authoritie into his hands, being a man somewhat partial towards the Nobility, and of great credit and authoritie among ft the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the liberty frothe people. Whereupon for these confiderations, they refused Martius in the end, and made two other that were suters, Consuls. The Senate being maruelloufly offended with the people, did account the shame of this refusall, mther to redound to themselves then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worse part then the Senate, and was out of all patience. For he was a man too ful of paffion and choler, & too much giuen ouer to selfe-wil, & opinion, as one of a high mind & great courage, that lacked the granitie and affability that is gotten with judgement of learning & reason, which only is to be looked for in a governour of State: and that remembred not how wilfullnes is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a common-wealth for pleafing should shun, being that which Plato called The froites folitarineise. As in the end, all menthat are wilfully given to a selfe opinion and obstinate mind, offelewill and who will never yeeld to others reason, but to their owne, remaine without company, and forfaken of all men. For a manthat will liue in the world, must needs have patience, which lustie blouds make but a mocke at. So Martius being a front man of nature, that never yeelded in any respect, as one thinking that to ouercome alwaies, and to have the vpper hand in all matters, wis a token of magnanimity, and of no base & faint courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and paissoned part of the heart, much like the matter of an impostume: went hometohis house, full traighted with spite and malice against the people, being accompanied with al thelufliest yong gentlemen, whose minds were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, & commonly viced for to follow and honor him. But then specially they flockt about him, and kepthim company to his much harme, for they did but kindle and inflame his choler more and more, be ing fory with him for the iniury the people offered him, because he was their captain and leader to the wars, that taught them all martiall discipline, and stirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valiantnesse, and yet without enuy, praising them that deserved best. In the means feason there came great plenty of corne to Rome, that had bene bought, part in ITALY, and part was fent out of Sicile, as given by Gelon the tyrant of Syracvs a: To that many stood ingreat hope, that the dearth of victuals being holpen, the ciuill diffention would also ceasse. The Senate fate in councell vpon it immediatly, the common people stood also about the palace wherethe counsell was kept, gaping what resolution would fall out:perswading themselves that the come they had bought should be fold good cheape, and that which was given should be deuided by the polic, without paying any pennic, and the rather, because certaine of the Senatours amongst thein did io wishand perswade the same. But Martins standing vpon his feet, did somewhat sharpely take vp those who went about to gratifie the people therein; and called them people pleafers, and traitours to the Nobility. Moreouer he said, they nourished against themselves, the naughtie naughtic feede and cockle of infolencic and fedition, which had bene fowed and feattered a- co broade amongst the people, which they should have cut off, if they had bene wife, in their growth: and not (to their owne destruction) have suffered the people, to establisha magistrate for themselues, of so great power and authority, as that man had, to whom they had granted it. Who was also to be feared, because he obtained what he would, and did nothing but what helisted, neither passed for any obedience to the Confuls, but lived in all liberty, acknowledging no superiour to command him, fauing the onely heads and authours of their faction, whom he called his magistrats. Therefore faid he, they that gaue counsell, and perswaded that the corne should be given out to the common people gratis, as they yied to do in the cities of co GRECE, where the people had more absolute power, did but onely nourish their disobedience, which would breake out in the end, to the vtter ruine and ouerthrow of the whole state. For they will not thinke it is done in recompence of their feruice past, sithence they know well enough they have so oftrefused to go to the warres, when they were commanded neither for their mutinies when they went with vs, whereby they have rebelled and for faken their councey: neither co fortheir accusations which their flatterers have preferred vncothem, and they have received,& " made good against the Senate: but they will rather judge, we give and grant them this, as abafing our selves, and standing in seare of them, and glad to statter them every way. By this means their disobedience will still grow worse and worse; and they will neuer leaue to practice new sedition and vprores. Therfore it were a great folly for vs, me thinks to do it: yea, shall I say more? ... we should if we were wise, take from them their Tribuneship, which most manifestly is the embasing of the Consulship, and the cause of the division of their city. The state whereof as it standeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but becometh difmembred in two factions, which maintaines alwaies ciuill diffention and difcord between vs, and will neuer suffer vs againe to be vnitedinto one body. Martius dilating the matter with many fuch like reasons, wonneall the yong men, & almost all the rich men to his opinion: infomuch as they rang it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the city, who flood our against the people, and neuer flattered them. There were only a few old men that spake against him, fearing lest some mischiefe might fall out vpon it, as indeed there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being prefent atthis consultation of the Senate, when they saw that the opinio of Martius was confirmed with the more voices, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would affemble to faue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ranne on head in tumulttogether, before whom the words that Martius spake in the Senate were openly reported: Rome for which the people fo stomacked, that euen in that furie they were ready to fly vpon the whole Coriolanus Senate. But the Tribunes laid all the fault and burthen wholly vpon Martius, and fent their forgeants foorthwith to arrest him, presently to appeare in person before the people, to answer the words he had spoken in the Senate. Martins stoutly withstood these officers that came to arrest him. Then the Tribunes in their owne persons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to setch him by force, and fo laid violent hands upon him. How beit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes give backe, and laid fore vpon the Addiles: fo for that time, thenight parted them, and the tumult appealed. The next morning betimes, the Confuls feeing the people in an vprore, running to the market place out of all parts of the city, they were afraid lestall the city would together by the cares: wherfore assembling the Senate in all hast, they declared how it flood them vpon, to appeale the fury of the people, with some gentle words, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreouer, like wife men they should consider, it was now no time to standat defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour against the communalty, they being fallen to fo great an extremity, and offering such imminent danger. Whereforethey were to confider temperately of things, and to deliner fome prefent and gentle pacification. The most part of the Senatours that were present at this councell, thought this opinion best, & gaue their consents vnto it. Wherupon the Consuls rising out of councel, went to speak vnto the people as gently as they could, and they did pacific their furie and anger, purging the Senate of all the vniust accusations laid vpon them, and vsed great modesty in perswading them, and also in reprouing the faults they had committed. And as for the rest, that touched the sale of corne, they promised there should be no disliking offered them in the price. So the most part of the people being pacified, and appearing fo plainely by the great filence that was among them, as yeelding to the Consuls, and liking wel of their words: the Tribunes then of the people

rose out of their seates, and said: Forasmuch as the Senate yeelded vnto reason, the people also for their part, as became them, did likewise giue place vnto them: but notwithstanding, they would that Marsius should come in person to answer to the articles they had deuised. First, who ther he had not follicited and procured the Senate to change the present state of the commonweale, and totake the soueraigne authoritie out of the peoples hands. Next, when he was sent for by authoritie of their officers, why he did contemptuously refist and disobey. Lastly, seeing he had driven and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the world: if in doing this, he had not done as much as in him lay to raise civill wars, and to set one citizen against another. All this was spoken to one of the setwo ends, either that Marsius against his nature should be costrained to humble himselfe, and to abase his haughtic and fierce mind: or els if he continued sill in his stoutnesse, he should incurre the peoples displeasure and ill will so far, that he should neuer possibly winthem againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out so, then otherwise: as indeed they gessed vnhappily, considering Martins nature & disposition. So Martins came and presented himselse to answer their accusations against him, & the people held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would fay. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly words come from him, he began not only to vie his wonted boldnesse of speaking (which ofit selfe was very rough and vnpleasant, and did more aggrauate his accusation, then purgehis innocencie) but also gaue himselse in his words to thunder, and looke therewithall sogrimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This stirred coales among the people, who werein wonderfull furie at it, & their hate and malice grew fo toward him, that they could hold no lon. ger, beare, nor indure his brauery and carcleffe boldneffe. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruelleft and stoutest of the Tribunes, after he had whispered a little with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as codemned by the Tribunes to die. Then prefent ly he commanded the Adiles to apprehend him, and cary him straight to the rocke Tarpeian. and to cast him headlong down the same. When the Ædiles came to lay hands vpon Martius to do that they were commanded, divers of the people themselves thought it too cruell and violenta deed. The noble menbeing much troubled to see so much force and rigour vsed, began to crie aloud; helpe Martius: so those that laid hands on him being repulsed, they compassed him in round among themselues, and some of them holding vp their hands to the people, befought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words not crying out could ought preuaile, the tumult and hurly burly was fo great, vntill fuch time as the Tribunes own friends and kinsemen weying with themselves the impossiblenesse to conucy Martius to execution, without great flaughter and murder of the nobilitie: did perswade and aduise not to proceed in so violent and extraordinary a fort, as to put such a man to death, without lawfull processe in law, but that they should referre the sentence of his death, to the free voice of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking himselfe a litle, did aske the Patricians, for what cause they tooke Martin out of the officers hands that went to do execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of themselues so cruelly and wickedly put to death, so noble and valiant a ROMAINE as Martius was, and that without law and iustice? Wellthen, said Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no quarrell or diffention against the people: for they do grant your demand, that his cause shall be heard according to the law. Therefore, said he to Martius, we do will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third day of our next fitting & affembly here, to make your purgation for fuch articles as shall be objected against you, that by free voice the people may give sentence vpon you as shall please them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were much pleased they had gotten Martius out of this danger. In the meane space, before the third day of their next fession came about, the same being kept enery ninth day continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latine, Nundina: there fell out war against the Antia-TES, which gaue some hope to the nobility, that this adiornment wold come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them fo long, as that the furie of the people against him would be well swaged, or vtterly forgotten, by reason of the trouble of the wars. But contrary to expectation, the peace was concluded presently with the ANTIATES, and the people returneds gaine to Rome. Then the Pairicians affembled often times together, to confult how they might stand to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occasion to cause the people to mutine againe, and rise against the Nobility. And there Appins Claudius (one that was taken euer as an heavie enemy to the people) did auow and protest, that they would vtterly abase the authoritie of the Senate

Senate, and destroy the common-weale, if they would suffer the common people to have authoritie by voyces to give judgement against the Nobilitie. On the other side againe, the most ancient Senatours, and fuch as were given to favour the common people, faid: that when the people should see they had authoritie of life and death in their hands, they would not be so cruell and fierce, but gende & civill. Morealfo, that it was not for contempt of Nobilitie or the Senate, that they fought to have the authoritic of inflice in their hands, as a preheminence and prerogative of honour: but because they seared, that themselves should be contemned and hated of the Nobilitie. So as they were perfivaded, that fo foone as they gave them authoritieto indge by voyces, they would leave all envie and malice to condemne any. Martius feeing the Senate in great doubt how to refolue, partly for the love and good will the Nobilitie did beare him, and partly for the feare they stood in of the people asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden them with? The Tribunes answered him, that they would shew corislanue how he did afpire to be King, and would proue that all his actions tended to viurpe tyrannicall his fought power ouer Rome. Martius with that, rifing vpon his feete, faid: that thereupon he did wil- sobe King. lingly offer himfelfe to the people, to be tryed vpon that accufation ; and that if it were proued by him, he had so much as once thought of any such matter, that he would then result no kind of punishment they would offer him : conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with nothing elfebefide, and that ye do not also abuse the Senate. They promised they would not. Vuder these conditions the judgement was agreed upon, and the people assembled. And first of all the Tribunes would in any case (whatsoeuer became of it) that the people should proceed to give their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needie people (and all such rabble as had nothing to lose, and had lesse regard of honesty before their eyes) came to be of greater force (because their voyces were numbred by the polle) then the noble honest citizens, whose persons and purse did dutifully serue the common-wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes saw they could not proue he went about to make himselse King, they beganne to broach afresh the former words that Martius had spoken in the Senate, in hindering the distribution of the corne at meane price vnto the common people, and perswading also to take the office of Tribuneship from them. And for the third, they charged him anew, that he had not made the common distribution of the spoile he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iourney. But this matter was most strange of all to Martius, looking least to have bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the fodaine, and having no ready excuse to make even at that instant : he began to fall a praifing of the fouldiers that had ferued with him in that iourney. But those that were not with him, being the greater number, cryed out so loude, and made such a noise that he banished could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were for ever. threevoyces odde, which condemned him to be banished for ener. After declaration of the fentence, the people made fuch ioy, as they never reioy ced more for any battell they had wonne vpontheir enemies, they were so braue and liuely, and went home so iocondly from the assembly, for triumph of this sentence. The Senate againe in contrarie manner were as sadde and heanie, repenting themselues beyond measure, that they had not rather determined to have done and fuffered any thing what locuer, before the common people should so arrogantly and outragiously have abused their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrant you, nor outward shewes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician for they were easily discerned by their lookes. For he that was on the peoples fide, looked chearefully on the matter: but he that was fad, and hung downe his head, he was fure of the Noble mens fide. Sauing Martius alone, Coriolanus who neither in his countenance nor in his gate, did ever shew himselfe abashed, or once let fall confant his great courage: but he onely of all other gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly shew no manner of passion, nor care at all of himselfe. Not that he did patiently beare and temper his cuill hap, in respect of any reason he had, or by his quiet condition: but because he was fo caried away with the vehemencie of anger, and defire of reuenge, that he had no sence nor feeling of the hard state he was in, which the common people indge nor to be forrow, although indeed it be the very fame. For when forow (as you wold fay) is let on fire, then it is conuerted into spite and malice, and driueth away for that time all faintesse of heart and naturall feare. And this is the cause why the cholericke man is so altered and mad in his actions, as a man for on fire with a burning ague: for when a mans heart is troubled within, his pulse will beate maruellous strongly. Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true soone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his house again, & had taken his leave of his mother and wife, finding them weeping and shriking out for sorrow, and had also comforted and perfwaded them to be content with his chance: he went immediatly to the gate of the citie accompanied with a great number of Patricians, that brought him thither, from whence he went on his way with three or foure of his friends onely, taking nothing with him, nor requesting any thing of any man. So he remained a few dayes in the country at his houses, turmoyled with fundry forts & kinds of thoughts, fuch as the fire of his choler did stirre vp. In the end seeinghe could resolue no way to take a profitable or honourable course, but onely was pricked forward ftill to be reuenged of the ROMAINES: he thought to raise vp some great warres against them. by their neerest neighbours. Whereupon he thought it his best way, first to stirre vp the Volses against them, knowing they were yet able enough in strength and riches to encounter them, notwithstanding their former losses they had received not long before, and that their power was not fo much impaired, as their malice and defire was increased to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the city of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Aufidins, who for his riches, as also for his nobilitie and valiantnesse was honoured among the Volsces as a King. Martius knew very well that Tullus did more malice and enny him then he did all the Romains besides: because that many times in battels where they met, they were ener at the encoun. ter one against another, like lusty couragious youths, striuing in all emulation of honor and had encountered many times together. Infomuch as befides the common quarrell betwene them. there was bred a maruellous private hate one against another. Yet not with standing, considering that Tullus Ausidius was a man of a great mind, and that he about all other of the Volsces most desired reuenge of the Romaines, for the injuries they had done unto them; he did anast that confirmed the words of an ancient Poet to be true, who faid:

It is a thing full hard, mans anger to with (land, If it be stiffely bent to take an enterprise in hand. For then most men will have the thing that they desire, Although it cost their lines therefore, such force hath wicked ire.

And so did he. For he disguised himselse in such array and attire, as he thought no man couldeuer haue knowne him for the person he was, seeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Hemer faid of Vliffes:

So didhe enter into the enemies towne.

It was even twi-light when he entred the city of Antiva, and many people met him in the streets, but no manknew him. So he went directly to Tulius Infidius house, and when he came thither, he got him vp straight to the chimney harth, and sate him downe, and spake nota word to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the house spying him, wondred whathe should be, and yet they durst not bid him rise. For il fauouredly mussled and disguised as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maiestic in his countenance, and in his silence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at supper, to tell him of the strange disguising of this man. Tullus role presently from the board, and coming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherfore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled himselfe, and after he had pawsed awhile, making no answer, he faid vnto him: If thou knowest me not yet, Tullus and seeing me, doest not perhappes beleeue me to be the man I am indeed, I must of necessitie bewray my selfe to be that I am. I am Caims Martius, who hath done to thy felfe particularly, and to all the Volses generally, great hurt and mischiese, which I cannot denie for my surname of Coriolanus that I beare. For I neuer had other benefite nor recompence of the true and painfull service I have done, and the extreme dangers I haue bene in, but this onely furname: a good memorie and witnesse of the malice and displeasure thou shouldest beare me. Indeed the name only remaineth with me: for the rest, the enuie & crueltie of the people of Rome haue taken from me, by the sufferance of the dastardly nobilitie and magistrates, who have for faken me, and let me be banished by the people. This » extremitie hath now driven me to come as a poore futer, to take thy chimney harth, not of any hope I have to faue my life thereby. For if I had feared death, I would not have come hither to haue put my selse in hazard: but prickt forward with desire to be reuenged of them that thus haue banished me, which now I do beginne, in putting my person into the hands of their enemies. Wherfore, if thou hast any heart to be wrecked of the iniuries thy enemies haue done thce, speed thee now, & let my misery serue thy turne, & so vse it, as my seruice may be a benefit ,, to the Volsces:promifing thee, that I will fight with better good will for all you, then I did , whe I was against you, knowing that they fight more valiatly, who know the force of the enemy then fuch as have neuer proued it. And if it be so that thou dare not, and that thou art wearie to >> proue fortune any more, then am I also wearie to line any longer. And it were no wisedome in thee, to saue the life of him, who hath bene heretofore thy mortall enemy, and whose service » now cannothing help nor pleasure thee. Tullus hearing what he said, was a marueslous glad man, and taking him by the hand, he faid vnto him: Stand vp, ô Martius, and be of good cheare, for in proferring thy selfe vnto vs, thou doest vs great honour and by this means thou maist hope also of greater things at all the Volsces hands. So he feasted him for that time, & entertained him in the honourablest manner he could, talking with him of no other matter at that present: but within few dayes after, they fell to confultation together in what fort they should beginne their wars. Now on the other fide, the city of Rome was in maruellous vproare & discord, the nobilitie against the communaltie, and chiefly for Martius condemnation and banishment. Moreouer the Priests, the Soothsayers, and private men also, came and declared to the Senate certaine Rome and declared to t fights and wonders in the aire, which they had feene, and were to be confidered of: amongst bankment. the which such a vision happened: There was a citizen of Rom E called Ticus Latinus, a man of meane quality and condition, but otherwise an honest sober man, given to a quiet life, without superstition, and much lesse to vanity or lying. This man had a vision in his dreame, in the which hethought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commanded him to fignifie to the Senate, that they had caused a very vilelewed dauncer to go before the procession: and said, the first time this vision had appeared vnto him, he made no reckoning of it: and comming againe another time in his mind, he made not much more account of the matter then before. In the end, he faw one of his fons die, who had the best nature and condition of all his brethren: and suddenly he himselfe was so taken in all his lims, that he became lame and impotent. Herupon he told the whole circumstance of this vision before the Senate, fitting vpon his litle couch or bed, whereon he was caried on mens armes: and he had no fooner reported this vision to the Senate, burne presently felt his body and lims restored agains to their former strength and vie. So raifing vphimself vpon his couch, he got vp on his feet at that instant, & walked home to his house, without helpe of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent enquirie to vnderstand the truth: and in the end they found there was such a thing: There was one that had deliuered a bondman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other flaues and bondmen, andhad commanded them to whip him vp and downethemarket place, and afterwards to kill him: and as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they did fo martyr the poore wretch, that for the cruell smart and paine he felt, he turned and writhed his body in strange and pitifull fort. The procession by chance came by euen at the same time, and many that followed it, were heartily moued & offended with the fight, saying: that this was no good fight to behold, nor meet to be met in procession time. But for all this, there was nothing done: saving they blamedand rebuked him that punished his slaue so cruelly. For the Romains at that time, did vse their bondmen very gently, because they themselves did labor with their owne hands, and lived with them and among them; and therfore they did vie them the more gently and familiarly. For the greatest punishment they gaue a slaue that had offended, was this. They made him carrie a The Relimmer on his shoulders that is fastened to the axeltree of a coach, and compelled him to govp mains mans and downe in that fort amongst all their neighbours. He that had once abidden this punishment, nerof punishment, nishing and was seene in that maner, was proclaimed and cried in enery market towne: so that no man their slaves. would euer trust him after, and they called him Furcifer, because the LATINES call the wood that runneth into the axeltree of the coach, Furca, as much to fay, as a forke. Now when Latinus Farifir Farifir had made report to the Senate of the vision that had happened to him, they were deuising who this unpleasant dauncer should be, that went before the procession. The rupon certaine that stood by, remembred the poore flaue that was fo cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwards put to death: and the thing that made him remember it, was the strange and rare manner of his punishment. The Priests hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduice: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the flaue. So they caufed the flaues mafter to be punished, and began againe a new procession, and all others shows and sights in honour of

Tupier. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa did wifely ordaineall other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the gods, and specially this custome which heestablished, to bring the people to religion. For when the magistrats, bishops, priests, or other religious ministers goa. bout any diuine seruice, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out a loud, Hoc age: as to fay, do this, or mind this. Hereby they are specially commaunded, wholly to ing religio. dispose themselves to serve God, leaving all other businesse and matters aside: knowing wellenough, that what socuer most men do, they do it as in a manner constrained vnto it. But the Ro-MAINES did euer vse to begin againe their facrifices, processions, playes, and such like shewes, done in honour of the gods, not onely vpon such an occasion, but vpon lighter causes then that, As when they went on precession through the citie; and did carrie the images of their gods, and fuch other like holy reliques vpon open hallowed coaches or chariots, called in Latine Thenla; one of the coach horses that drew them stood still, and would draw no more: and because also the coach-man tooke the raines of his bridle with the left hand, they ordained that the procession should be begunne againe anew. Of latetime also, they did renew and beginne a facrifice thirty times one after another, because they thought still there fell out one fault or other in the fame: fo holy and deuout were they to the gods. Now Tullus and Martins had fecret conference with the greatest personages of the citie of Antivm, declaring vnto them that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in diffention one with another. They answered them, the were assamed to breake the league, considering that they were fworneto keep peace for two yeares. Howbeit, shortly after, the Romains gaile them great occasion to make warre with them. For on a holy day common playes being keptin Following Rome, vpon fome suspition or falle report, they made proclamation by sound of trumper, that all the Volsces should avoid out of Rome before Sunne set. Some thinke this was a crast and deceit of Martius, who fent one to Rome to the Confuls, to accuse the Volsces fallely, aduertifing them how they had made a confpiracie to fet vpon them while they were bufie in feeing these games, and also to set their city on fire. This open proclamation made all the Voi-SCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then ever they were before : and Tullus aggravating the matter, did so inflame the Volsces against them, that in the end they sent their ambasfadours to Rome, to fummon them to deliuer their lands and townes againe, which they hadtaken from them in times past, or to looke for present warres. The Romain shearing this, were maruelloufly netled; and made no other answer but thus: If the Volsces be the first that begin warre, the Romaines will be the last that will end it. Incontinently upon returne of the VOLSCES ambaffadors, and deliuery of the ROMAINES answer, Tullus caused an assembly generall to be made of the Volsces, and concluded to make warre vpon the Romaines. This done, Tullus did counsell them to take Martius into their service, and not to mistrust him for the remembrance of any thing past, but boldly to trust him in any matter to come for he would do them more service in fighting for them, then ever he did them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lefte eloquent in tongue, then warlike in shew; and declared himself both expert with Tullus in wars, and wife with valiantneffe. Thus he was joyned in commission with Tullus as general of the Volsces, having absolute authoritic betweene them to follow and pursue the wars, But Martius fearing lest tract of time to bring this army together with all the munition and furniture of the Volsces, would robhim of the meane he had to execute his purpose and intent, left order with the rulers and chiefe of the citie, to affemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessary prouision for the campe. Then he with the lightest fouldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, stole away vpon the sodaine, and marched with all speed, and entred the teritories of Rome, before the Romaines heard any newes of his coming. Infomuch as the Volsces found fuch spoile in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, and were wearie to drive and carrie away that they had. Howbeit the gaine of the spoile and the hurtthey did to the ROMAINE's in this invalion, was the lest part of his intent: for his chiefest purpose was, to increase still the malice and dissention betweene the Nobilitie and the communaltie: and to draw that on, he was very carefull to keepe the Noble mens lands and goods fafe from harme and burning, but spoiled all the whole country besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurtany thing of the noble mens. This made greater stir & broile between the nobility & the people, then was before. For the noble men fell out with the people, because they had fo vniuftly banished a man of so great valour and power. The people on the other fide, accused the Nobility, how they had procured Martius to make these wars to be reueged of the: hearthurn because it pleased them to see their goods burnt & spoyled before their eies, whilst themselves the Nobiliwere well at case, and did behold the peoples losses and misfortunes, knowing their own goods tie and the fafe and out of danger: & how the war was not made against the noble men, that had the enemy people. abroad, to keep that they had in fafety. Now Martin having done his first exploit (which made the Volsces bolder, and leffe fearefull of the Romaines) brought home all the army again, without losse of any man. After their whole army (which was maruellous great, & very forward to seruice) was affembled in one campe, they agreed to leave part of it for garifo in the country about, & the other part should go on, and make the war vpon the Romaines. So Martius bad Tullus choose, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him answer, he knew by experience that Martius was no leffe valiant then himfelfe, and how he cuer had better fortune and good hap in all battels, then himselfe had. Therfore he thought it best for him to have the leading of those that would make the wars abroad, and himselfe would keep home, to prouide for the fafety of the cities of his countrey, and to furnish the campe also of all necessary promition abroad. So Martius being ftronger then before, went first of all vnto the city of CER-CEES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yeelded themselves, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entred the countrey of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there to defend the Latines, who were their confederates, and had many times fent vnto the Romaines for their aide. But on the one fide, the people of Rome were very ill willing to go: and on the other fide, the Confuls being vpon going out of their office, would not hazard themselves for so small a time; so that the ambassadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and did no good. Then Martins did befrege their cities, and having taken by force the towne of the Tolerinians, Vicanians, Pedanians, and the Bolanians, who made refistance, he facked all their goods, and took the prisoners. Such as did yeeld themselues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurt: and because they should receive no damage by his will, he removed his campe as farre from their confinesas he could. Afterwards, he took the city of Bol Es by affault, being about an hundred furlong from Rome, where he had a maruellous great spoile, and put every man to the sword that was able to carry weapon. The other Volses sthat were appointed to remaine in garison for defence of their countrey, hearing this good newes, would tarry no longer at home, but armed themselues, and ranne to Martius campe, saying they did acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through all Iral r, and enery one praised him for a valiant captaine, for that by change of one man for another, such and so strange euents fell out in the state. In this while, all went still to wracke at Rome. For to come into the field to fight with the enemy, they could not abide to heare of it, they were one so much against another, and full of seditious words, the Nobilitie against the people, and the people against the Nobility. Vntil they had Laninium intelligence at the length, that the enemies had laid frege to the city of Lavisiv M, in the which built by were all the temples & images of their gods their protectours, and from whence came first their ancient originall, for that AEnews at his first arrivall into ITALY did build that city. Then fell there out a maruellous fodaine change of mind among the people, and farre more strange and contrary in the Nobility. For the people thought it good to repeale the condemnation & exile of Martius. The Senate affembled upon it, would in no case yeeld to that: who either did it of a felfe will to be contrary to the peoples defire; or because Martius should not returne thorough the grace and fauour of the people. Or els, because they were throughly angry and offended with him, that he would fet vpon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doings would flew himfelfe an open enemy befides vnto his country: notwithftanding the most part of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruellous ill part, and as if the iniury had bene done unto themselues. Report being made of the Senates resolution, the people found theselues in a straight: for they could authorise and confirme nothing by their voices, vnlesse it had bene first propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martins hearing this stirre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before infomuch as he raifed his fiege incontinently before the city of LAVINIVM, and going towards ROME, lodged his campe within forty furlong of the city, at the ditches called Cluilia. His incamping so neere Rome, did put all the whole citie in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the present time it appealed the sedition and dissention betwixt the Nobility and the people, For there was no Confull, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrary the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martins. When they saw the women in a maruellous feare, running vp and downe the city: the temples of the gods full of old people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the gods: & finally, not a man either wife or hardy to prouide for their fafety: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reafon to call home Martins againe, to reconcile themselves to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in maruellous great fault to be angry and in choler with him, when it flood them vpon rather to haue gone out & intreated him. So they all agreed together to fend ambaffadors vnto him, to let him vnderstand how his countreymen did call him home againe, and restored him to all his goods, and befought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambatiadours that were sent, were Martius familiar friends & acquaintance, who looked at the least for a curtous welcome of him, as of their familiar friend & kinliman. Howbeit they found nothing lefferforat their coming they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was fet in his chaire of state, with a maruellous and an vnspeakable maiesty, having the chiefest men of the Vorses about him: so he commanded them to declare openly the cause of their coming. Which they delinered in the most humble and lowly words they possibly could deuise, and with all modest countenance and behauiour agreable to the same. When they had done their message: for the iniury they had done him, he answered them very hotly, and in great choler: but as Generall of the Volsces, he willed them to restore vnto the Volsces, all their lands and cities they had taken from them in former warres; and moreouer, that they should give them the like honour and freedome of Rome, as they had before given to the Latines. For otherwise they had no other meane to end this warre, if they did not grant these honest and iust conditions of peace, Thereupon he gaue them thirtie dayes respite to make him answer. So the ambassadours returned straight to Kome, and Martius forthwith departed with his armie out of the teritories of The fire or. the Romaines. This was the fire matter wherewith the Voisces (that most enuied Martius glorie and authoritie) did charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chiefe; who though he had received no private iniury or displeasure of Martius, yet the common fault and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieued him to fee his owne reputation blemished through Martin great fame and honour, and so himselfe to be lesse esteemed of the Volsces then he was before. This fell out the more, because every man honoured Martins, and thought he onely could do all, and that all other gouernours and captaines must be content with fuch credite and authoritie as he would please to countenance them with. From hence they derined all their first accusations and secret murmurings against Martins. For private captaines conspiring against him, were very angry with him: and gaue it out, that the remouing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor forts, nor of armes, but of time and occasion, which was a loffe of great importance, because it was that which in reason might both look and bind all; and prescrue the whole. Now Marrius having given the Romaines thirty dayes respite for their answer, and specially because the wars have not accustomed to make any great changes in lesse space of time then that, he thought it good yet, not to lie asseepe and idle all the while, but went & destroyed the Linds of the enemies allies, & tooke seuen great cities of theirs well inhabited, and the KOMAINES durst not once put themselves into the field, to come to their aide and helpe, they were fo faint-hearted, fo mistrustfull, and loth besides to make warrs. Infomuch as they properly resembled the bodies paralyticke and loosed of their limmes and members, as those which through the palsey have lost all their sence and feeling. Wherfore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the Romaines againe with all his armie, they fent another ambaffade vnto him, to pray peace, and the remoue of the Volsces out of their countrey: that afterwards they might with better leifure fall to such agreements together, as should be thought most meete and necessary. For the ROMAINES were no menthat would ever yeeld for feare. But if he thought the Volses had any ground to demand reasonable articles and conditions, all that they woulde reasonably aske should be granted vnto by the ROMAINES, who of themselves would willingly yeeld to reason, conditionally, that they did lay downe armes. Martius to that answered: that as Generall of the Volsces he would reply nothing vnto it: but yet as a Romaine citizen, he would counfell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should return againe within three dayes, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he had first deliucred them. Otherwise, that he would no more give them assurance or safe conduct to returne againe into his camp, with fuch vaine and friuolous messages. When the ambasfadors were returned to Rome, and had reported Martius answer to the Senate: their city being in extreme danger, and as it were in a terrible storme or tempest, they threw out (as the common prouerb faith) their holy anker. For then they appointed all the Bishops, Priests, Ministers The Priests of the gods, and keepers of holy things, & all the augures or foothfayers, which for effect things faver for the flying of hirds (which is an old arrival in 1.5). to come by observation of the flying of birds (which is an old ancient kind of prophecying so Coriolaand divination amongst the Romains) to goto Martin apparelled, as when they do their sacrifices: and first to intreate him to leave off warre, and then that he would speake to his country men, and conclude peace with the Volses. Martins suffered them to come into his camp, but yet he granted them nothing the more, neither did he entertaine them or speake more curteoully to them, then he did the first time that they came vnto him, sauing only that he willed the totake the one of the two:either to accept peace under the first conditions offered, or else to receine warre. When all this goodly rabble of superstitious priests were returned, it was determined in counsell that none should go out of the gates of the city, and that they should watch and ward vpon the walles to repulse their enemies if they came to affault them:referring themfelues and all their hope to time, and fortunes vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwise how to remedy the danger. Now all the city was full of tumult, feare, and maruellous doubt what would happen, vntill at the length there fell out fuch a like matter, as Homer oft times faid they would least hauethought of. For in great matters, that happen seldome, Homer saith, and crieth out in this fort:

CORIOLANVS.

The goddesse Pallas she, with her faire glistering eyes, Didput into his mind fuch thoughts, and made him fo denife.

And in another place.

But fire some god bath tane out of the peoples mind, Both wit and understanding cke, and have therewith assignd. Some other simple spirit, in stead thereof to bide, That so they might their doings all, for lacke of wit misguide.

And in another place:

The people of themselves did either it consider, or elfe some god instructed them, and so they loyn'd together.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters vnpossible, and fables of no likelihood or troth, vnto mans reason, freewill, or judgement, which indeed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of our owne free will and reason. For he oft speaketh these words: I have thought it in my noble heart.

And in another place:

Achilles angry was, and fory for to heare Him so to say, his heavy breast was fraught with pensive feare.

Andin another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not move with her faire tongue, So honest and so vertuous, he was the rest among.

But in wondrous and extraordinary things, which are done by fecret inspirations & motions, he doth not say that God taketh away from man his choice and freedome of will, but that he doth moue it:neither that he doth work defire in vs, but obiecteth to our minds certain imaginations whereby we are led to defire and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For either we must say, that the gods medle not with the causes and beginnings of our actions; or else what other meanes hauethey to helpe & further men? It is apparent that they handle not our bodies, nor moue not our fecte and hands, when there is occasion to vie them: but that part of our mind from which these motions proceed, is induced thereto, or caried away by such objects and reasons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the ROMAINE Ladies & gentlewomen did visite althetemples and gods of the same, to make their prayers vnto them: but the greatest Ladies (and more part of them) were continually about the altar of Iupiter Capitolin, among which troupe by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes own fifter. The selfe same Publicola, who did such notable service to the Romains, both in peace and wars, and was dead also certaine yeares before, as we haue declared in his life.

Volumnia, Martina mother. The words Virgilia.

Publiculars destly and wifely behaue her selfe, that she did not shame nor dishonour the house she came off. So she sodainely fell into such a fancy, as we have rehearsed before, and had (by some godas I think) taken hold of a noble deuice. Wherupon she rose and the other Ladies with her, and they all together went straight to the house of Volumnia, Martius mother: and coming in to her, found her, and Martius wife her daughter in law, fet together, and hauing her husband Martius yong children in her lap. Now al the traine of thefe Ladies, firting in a ring round about her, va. leria first began to speake in this fort vnto her. We ladies, are come to visite you ladies (my lady lumnia and Volumnia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commandement of other Magiftrate, but through the inspiration (as I take it) as some god about: who having taken compassion on and pitie of our prayers, hath moued vs to come vnto you, to intreate you in a matter, as well >> beneficial for vs, as also for the whole citizens in general, but to your selues in special(if it please you to credic me) and shall redound to your more fame and glory, then the daughters of the SA-BYNE's obtained in former age, when they procured louing peace, in stead of hatefull warre, beweene their fathers and their husbands. Come on good Ladies, and let vs go all together vnto 22 Martius, to intreat him to take pitie vpon vs, & also to report the troth vnto him, how much you are bound vnto the citizens: who not with standing they have sustained great hurt and losses by » him, yet they haue not hitherto fought reuenge vpon your perfons by any discourreous vsage, " neither euer conceiued any fuch thought or intent against you, but to deliuer you safe into his hands, though thereby they looke for no better grace or clemency from him. When Valeria had spoken this vnto them, all the other ladies, together with one voice confirmed that she had said Then Folumnia in this fort did answer her: My good Ladies, we are partakers with you of the common mifery and calamity of our country, and yet our griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reason of our particular missortune, to feele the lotse of my son Martius former valiancy & glo ry, and to see his person enuironed now with our enemies in armes, rather to see him forth comming & safe kept, then of any loue to defend his person. But yet the greatest griefe of our heaped mishaps is to see our poore country brought to such extremity, that all the hope of the safety and preservation therof, is now unfortunatly cast upon vs simple women; because we know not what account he will make of vs, since he hath cast from him all care of his naturall country and common-weale, which heretofore he hath holden more deare and precious, then either his mother, wife or children. Notwithstäding, if ye think we can do good, we wil willingly do what you will haue vs, bring vs to him I pray you. For if we canot prenaile, we may yet die at his feet, as huble futers for the fafety of our country. Her answer ended, she took her daughter in law, & Martins children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE Ladies, they wenting troupe together vnto the Volsces campe: whom when they faw, they of themselues did both pitie and reuerence her, and there was not a man among them that once durft fay a word vnto her. Now was Martius let then in his chaire of state, with all the honors of a Generall, and when he had spied the women coming afar off, he maruelled what the matter meant; but afterwards knowing his wife which came foremost, he determined at the first to perfist in his obstinate and inflexible rancor. But ouercome in the end with natural affection, and being altogether alteredto fee them, his heart would not ferue him to tarrie their coming to his chaire, but coming down in hast, he went to meet them, and first he kissed his mother, & embraced her a prety while, then his wife & litle children. And nature fo wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he could not keep himself from making much of them, but yeelded to the affection of his bloud The oration as if he had bene violently caried with the fury of a most swift running streame. After he had of Volumnia thus louingly received them, and perceiving that his mother Volumnia would begin to speaketo him, he called the chiefest of the counsel of the Volsces to heare what she wold say. Then she spake in this fort: If we held our peace (my sonne) and determined not to speake, the state of our , poore bodies, & present sight of our rayment, would easily bewray to thee what life we haveled at home, fince thy exile and abode abroad; but think now with thy felf, how much more vnfor-, tunate then all the women living, we are come hither, confidering that the fight which should , be most pleasant to all other to behold, spightfull fortune had made most fearefull to vs:making my felfe to fee my fonne, and my daughter here her husband, befieging the walls of his native countrey: so as that which is the onely comfort to all other in their aduersitie and miserie, to , pray vnto the gods, and to call to them for aide, is the onely thing which plungeth vs into most deepe perplexitie. For we cannot (alas) together pray, both for victory to our countrey, and for fafety of thy life also: but a world of grieuous curses, yea more then any mortall enemy can heape vpo vs, are forcibly wrapt vp in our prayers. For the bitter sop of most hard choise is offered thy wife and children, to forgo one of the two: either to lose the person of thy self, or the nurse of their natiue country. For my selfe (my sonne) I am determined not to tary, till fortune in mv life time do make an end of this warre. For if I cannot perswade thee, rather to do good vnto both parties then to ouerthrow and destroy the one, preferring loue and nature before the malice and calamity of wars, thou shalt see, my sonne, and trust vnto it, thou shalt no sooner march forward to affault thy courty, but thy foot shall treade voon thy mothers wombe, that brought thee first into this world. And I may not deferre to see the day, either that my son be led prisoner in triumph by his naturall countrymen, or that he himselfe do triumph of them, and of his naturall country. For if it were fo, that my request tended to sauethy country, in destroying the Volses, I must confesse, thou wouldest hardly and doubtfully resolution that. For as to defroy thy natural country, it is altogether vnmeete and vnlawfull, so were it not just, and lesse honourable, to betray those that put their trust in thee. But my onely demand consisteth, to make a gaile deliuery of all euils, which deliuereth equall benefite and fafety, both to the one and the other, but most honourable for the Volschs. For it shall appeare, that having victory in their hands, they have of speciall favour granted vs singular graces, peace, & amity, albeit themselves " haue no lesse part of both then we. Of which good, it so it came to passe, thy selfe is the onely author, and so hast thou the only honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrary, thy self alone deferuedly shalt carry the shameful reproch and burthen of either party. So, though the end of war bevncertain, yet this notwithstanding is most certain, that if it be thy chace to conquer, this benefite shalt thou reape of thy goodly conquest, to be chronicled the plague and destroyer of thy countrey. And if fortune ouerthrow thee, then the world will fay, that through defire to reuengethy private injuries, thou haft for ever vidonethy good friends, who did most louingly " & courteoufly receive thee. Martin gave good eare vnto his mothers words, without interrupting her speech at all, and after she had said what she would, he held his peace a prety while, and answered not a word. Herevpon she began againe to speake vnto him, and said: My sonne, why doest thou not answer me? doest thou think it good altogether to give place vntothy choler and ee defire of reuenge, and thinkest thou it not honesty for thee to grant thy mothers request, in so weighty a cause? dost thou take it honorable for a noble man, to remember the wrongs and iniuries done him, and dost not in like case think it an honest noble mans part, to be thankfull for the goodnes that parents do shew to their children, acknowledging the duty & reuerece they ought ... to beare vnto them? No man living is more bound to show himself thankfull in all parts & respectsthen thy felf:who fo vniuerfally shewest all ingratitude. Moreouer (my son) thou hast sore- cc ly taken of thy country, exacting grieuous payments vpon the, in renenge of the injuries offered 😘 thee, befides, thou hast not hitherto shewed thy poore mother any correspond therfore it is not onely honest, but due vnto me, that without compulsion I should obtaine my so instand rea- co fonable request of thee. But fince by reason I canot persivade three to it, to what purpose do I de- cc fermy last hope? And with these words, her self, his wite, & children fell down vpon their knees ... beforehim: Martius feeing that could refraine no longer, but went straight and life her vp crying coriolanus out Oh mother, what have you done to me And holding her hard by the right had, oh mother faid he, you have won a happy victory for your country, but mortall and vnhappy for your fon: for I see my self vanquished by you alone. These words being spoken openly, he spakealitleapare with his mother & wife, & then let them return again to Rome, for fothey did request him, and fo remaining in campe that night, the next morning he dislodged, and marched homeward into coistant the Volsces country againe, who were not all of one mind, nor all alike contented. For some withdraw milliked him and that he had done: other being well pleafed that peace shold be made, said: that neither the one northe other, deserved blame nor reproch. Other though they missiked that was done, did not thinke him an ill man for that he did, but faid, he was not to be blamed, though he yeelded to fuch a forcible exercinity. Howbeit no man cotraried his departure, but alobeied his commandement, more for respect of his worthinesse & valiancy then for feare of his authority. Now the citizens of Rome plainly shewed, in what feare & danger their city stood of this war, whethey were deliuered. For so soon as the watch vpo the wals of the city perceived the Volsers campeto remoue, there was not a reple in the city but was prefently let open, & ful of m &

wearing garlands of flowers vpontheir heads, facrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do vponthe newes of some great obtained victory. Andthis common by was yet in ore manifelt, ly shewed, by the honorable curtesies the whole Senate and people did bestow on their Ladies. For they were all throughly perswaded, and did certainly beleeue, that the Ladies only were cause of the saving of the city, and deliuering themselues from the instant danger of the warre, Wherupon the Senate ordained, that the Magistrates to gratiste and honor these Ladies, should graunt them all that they would require. And they only requested that they would build atem. ple of Fortune for the women, vnto the building whereof they offered themselucs to defray the whole charge of the facrifices, and other ceremonies belonging to the feruice of the gods. No uerthelesse, the Senate commending their goodwill and forwardnesse, ordained, that the temple and image should be made at the common charge of the city. Notwithstanding that, the Ladies gathered money among them, and made with the same a second image of Fortune; which the Romaine s fay did speake as they offered her vp in the temple, and did set her in her place and they affirme, that the spake these words: Ladics, ye have denoutly offered me vp. Moreover, that she spake that twise together, making vs to beleeue things that never were, and are not to beere dited: For to seeimages that seeme to sweate or weepe, or to put forth any humor red or blowdie, it is not a thing vnpossible. For wood and stone do commonly receive certaine moissing whereof are ingendred humours, which do yeeld of themselues, or do take of the aire, many forts and kinds of spots and colours: by which fignes and tokens it is not amisse, me thinke, that the gods fometimes do warne men of things to come. And it is possible also, that these images and statues do sometimes put forth sound; like vnto fighes or mourning, when in the middel or botome of the same, there is made some violent separation, or breaking as under of things. blowne or deuised therein: but that a body which hath neither life nor soule, should have any direct or exquisite words formed in it by expresse voice, that is altogether unpossible. Forthe foule, nor god himselfe can distinctly speake without a body , having necessary organs and in ftruments incet for the parts of the fame, to forme and viter diffinct words. But where ftoris many times do force vs to believe athing reported to be true, by many grave testimonies: there we must say, that it is some possion contrary to our flue naturals senses, which being begotten in the imaginative part or vnderstanding, draweth an opinion vnto it selfequen as we do in our fleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we do not heare, and we imagine we feethat we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously given to think on hea. nealy things, fo as they can no way be drawne from belowing that which is spoken of them, they have this reason to ground the foundation of their beleefe vpon; that is, the omnipotence of God, which is wonderfull, and hath no maner of resemblance or likenesse of proportion vno ours, but is altogether contrary, as touching our nature, our mouing, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing vnpoffible to vs, or do bring forthand denife things, about mans common reach and understanding, we must not therfore think it unpossible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrary to vs, much more in his works and secret operations, he far passethall the restable the most part of Gods doings, as Heraclitus faith, for lack of faith, are hidden and viknowne vnto vs. Now when Martins was returned againe into the city of Antiva from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his authority, fought diverse meanes to make him away, thinking if he let slipt that present time, he should neuer recouer the like and fit occasion againe. Wherfore Tulius having procured many otherof his confederacy, required Martine, might be deposed from his estate, to render vp account to the Volsces of his charge and gouernement. Martius fearing to become a private man against vnder Tullus being Generall (whose authority was greater otherwise, then any other among all the Volsces) answered: He was willing to give vp his charge, and would refigne it into the hands of the Lords of the Volsces, if they did al command him, as by al their commandment he received it. And moreover, that he would not refuse even at that present to give vp an account vnto the people, if they would tary the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counsell, in which assembly there were certaine oratours appointed, that stirred up the common people against him: and when they had told their tales, Martins rose vp to make them answer. Now, notwithstanding the mutinous people made a maruellous great noise, yet when they saw him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valiantnesse, they quieted themselues, and goue himan dience to alledge with leifure what he could for his purgation. Moreover, the honestest menof the ANTIATES, and who most reloyced in peace, shewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly. And judge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him speake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, because amongst other things he had an cloquent tongue; besides that the first good scruice he had done to the people of the Volsces, did winne him more fauour, then these last accusations could purchase him displeasure: and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a testimony of the goodwill they ought him; for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the city of Rome, if they had not bin very neare taking of it, by meanes of his approach and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterprise, neither to tary for the mutining and rifing of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracy, began to cry out that he was not to be heard, and that they would not fuffer a traitor to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the Volsces, who would not yeeld vp his state and authority. And in saying these words, they coriolanus all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to refcue mardered in the strice. him. Howbeit it is a cleare case, that this murder was not generally consented vnto, of the most of Antium, part of the Volsces: for men came out of all parts to honor his body, and did honourably bury him; fetting vp his tombe with great store of armour and spoiles, as the tombe of a worthy person and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderstanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, fauing that they granted the ladies their request they made: that they might mourne tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they vsed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethren, ot husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who stablifhed the fame, as we have enlarged more amply in the description of his life. Now Martius being mourning dead, the whole state of the Volses heartily wished him alive againe. For, first of all they fell appointed out with the Aloves who were their friends and confederates) touching preheminence and by Numa. place: and this quarrell grew on fo farre betweene them, that fraies and murders fell out vpon it one with another. After that the ROMAINES Ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was flain in the field and the flower of all their force was put to the fword: fo that they were com-fiding flain pelled to accept most shamefull conditions of peace, in yeelding themselues fubiect vnto the conquerers, and promifing to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF Alcibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

The als done by

OW that we have written all the decdes of worthy memory, done by either of them both, we may presently discerne, that in matters of war the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardy and valiant for their persons, as also wise and politicke in the warres: vnleffe they will fay, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battels with his enemies, both by fea and land, then euer Coriolanus had done, and liad alwayes the victory of his enemies. For otherwise, in this they were much alike: that where they were both prefent and had charge and power to command, all things prospered notably, and with good successe on the part they were of; and also when they tooke the contrary side, they made the first haue the worst enery way. Now for matters of gouernment, the Noble men and honest citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man most dissolute, and given to flattery: because he ever studied by all device he could, to curry fauour with the common people. So did the ROMAINES malice also Coriolanus gouernement, for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding he is lesse to be blamed that feeketh to pleafe and gratifie his common people, then he that despiseth and disdaineth them; and therefore offereth them wrong and injury, because he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an eurll thing to flatter the common people to winne credite: euen fo is it besides dishonesty, and iniustice also, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make himfelfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Marins was cuer counted an honest natured man, plaine, and simple, without art or cunning : but Alcebiades meerely contrary; for he was fine, subtill, and deceitfull. And the The maners greatest fault they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceit, wherewith he abused the Amballadors of the Laced Emonians, & that he was a let that peace was not concluded, as Thuesdides reporteth. Now, though by this act he suddenly brought the city of Athens into wars, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the MANTINEANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practife entred into league with the ATHENIANS. And Martins, as Dionyfius the historiographer writeth did by craft and deceit bring the ROMAINES into warres against the Volsces, causing the Volscss maliciously and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to Rome to see the games plaid. But the cause why he did it, made the fact so much more foule and wicked: for it was not done for any civill diffention, nor for any icalousie and contention in matters of government as Aletbiades did: but only following his cholericke mood, that would be pleased with nothing, as Dion said, he would needes trouble and turmoile the most part of ITALY, and so being angly

all. This is true also, that Alcibialis spite and malice did worke great mischiefe and misery to his country: but when he faw they repented them of the iniury they had done him, he came to himselfe, and did withdraw his army. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet suffer the captaines of the ATHENIANS to run into great errors, neither would he seethem cast away, by following ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forsake them in any danger they put themselves into. But he did the very same that Arisides had done in old time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet fo greatly praised. For he went vinto the captaines that had charge then of the army of the ATHENIANS, although they not his friends, and told them wherein they did amisse, and what they had further to do. Where Martius to the contrary, did first great hurt vnto the whole city of Rome, though all in Rome had not generally offended him: yea, and when the best and chiefest part of the city were grieued for his fake, and were very fory and angry for the iniury done him. Furthermore, the Ro-MAINES fought to appeale one only displeasure and despight they had done him, by many ambaffades, petitions and requefts they made; whereunto he neuer yeelded, vntill his mother, wife, and children came, his heart was fo hardened. And hereby it appearde he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would hearken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to destroy and spoile his country, and not as though he meant to recouer it, or to returne thither again. Here was indeed the difference betweene them: that spials being laid by the LACED EMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the malicethey did beare him, as also for that they were affraid of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to Athens. Where Martius contrariwise, having bene so honourably received & entertained by the Volses, he could not with honesty for sake them, considering that they had done him that honour, as to chuse him their Generall, and trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole army and power into his hands: and not as the other, whom the LACE-DEMONIANS rather abused then vsed him, suffering him to go vp and downe their city (and afterwards in the midst of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the end Alcibiadeswas compelled to put himselfe into the hands of Tisaphernes: vnlessethey will say that he went thither of purposeto him, with intent to saue the city of ATHENS from vtter destruction, forthedesire he had to returne home againe. Moreouer, we reade of Alcibiades, that he was a Alcibiades greattaker, and would be corrupted withmony: and when he had it, he would most licentiousy and diffioneffly spendit. Where Martius in contrary maner would not so much as accept gifts lanus manlawfully offered him by his captaines, to honor him for his valiantnesse. And the cause why the people did beare him such ill will, for the controuersie they had with the Nobility about clearing of debts, grew: for that they knew well inough it was not for any gaine or benefite he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the philosopher, doth not without cause commend the fingular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this especially: that he passed all other for winning mens good wils. Whereas Martius noble acts and vertues, wanting that affability, became hatefull, euen to those that received benefite by them, who could not abide his seucrity and selfe will: which causeth desolation, (as Plato faith) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forfaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainement, and a very good grace with him, and could fashion himselfe in all companies, it was no maruell if his well doing were glorioufly commended, and himfelf much honoured and beloued of the people, confidering that some faults he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sport, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the commonwealth, yet they did oft make him their Generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole city. Where Martius fuing for an office of honor, that was due to him, for the fundry good feruices he had done to the state, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus do we see, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honored his vertue, had no liking to loue his person. Martius also did neuer any great exploit, being General of his country men, but when he was General of their enemies against his natural country: wheras Alcibiases, being both a private person, and a General did notable service vnrothe Athenians. By reason whereof, Alcibiades and coriowherefoeuer he was prefent, had the vpper hand euer of his accufers, euen as he would himfelfe, land tone and their accusations tooke no place against him: vnlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius countrie. being present, was condemned by the Romaines: and in his person murdered and slaine by

HEN I first began to write these lines, my intent was to profite other: but fince cotinuing and going on, I have much profited my felf by looking into these histories, as if I looked into a glasse, to frame and fashion my life to the mould & patterne of these vertuous noble men. For running ouer their maners in this fort, & feeking alfo to describe their lives: methinks I am stil connersant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to perufe their histories, and to wey the vertues and qualities they have had, and what fingularitie each of them possessed and tochuse and cull out the chiefest sthing of note in them, and their best speeches and doings most worthy of memory: then I cric out:

O gods, can there be more passing pleasure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man civill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the Philosopher writeth, that we should pray we might ever see happie images and fignes in the aire, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to vs, then that is evill and vnfortunate: presupposing a false opinion and doctrine in Philosophie, which allureth men to infinite superstitions: That there are good and badde images flying in the ayre, which give a good or ill impression vnto men, and incline mento vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of ancient histories, and gathering these liues together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping alwaies in mind the acts of the most noble, vertuous, and best giuen men offormer age, & worthie memory: I do teach and prepare my selfe to shake off and banish from me all lewd and dishonest conditions, if by chance the company and conversation of them whose company I keepe, and must of necessitie haunt, do acquaint me with some vnhappie or vngracious touch. This is easie vnto me, that do dispose my mind, being quiet and not troubled with any passion, vnto the deepe cosideration of somany noble examples. As I do present vnto you now in this volume, the lives of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus Æmylius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good and an vpright mind with the, but were also fortunate & happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you shall hardly judge, when you have read over their lives, whether wisdom or good fortune the Volsces. But here I cannot say they have done well, nor inftly, albeit himselfe gaue them fome colour to do it, when he openly denied the Romaine ambassadours peace, which after he privately graunted, at the request of women. So by this deed of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was betweene both people: but leaving warre still betweene them, he made the Volsces (of whom he was Generall) to lose the opportunity of noble victory. Where indeed he should (if he had done as he ought) have withdrawne his army with their counsell and confent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their General; if he had made that account of them, as their goodwill towards him did in duty bind him. Or else, if he did not care for the Volsces in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it off when his anger was blowne ouer: yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to pardon his country, but rather he should in pardoning his country, haue spared his mother, because his mother and wife were members of the body of his countrey and city, which he did befiege. For in that he vncourteoufly rejected all the publike petitions. requests of Ambassadors, intreaties of the bishops and prices, to gratific only the request of his mother with his departure: that was no act fo much to honour his mother with, as to dishonour his country by, the which was preserved for the pity and intercession of a woman, and not for the loue of it self, as if it had not bene worthy of it. And so was this departure a grace (to say truly)very odious & cruell, and descrued no thanks of either party, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, not at the request of the Romaine's, against whom he made war: nor with their consent, at whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill hap, the austeritie of his nature, and his haughty obstinate mind, was the onely cause: the which of it selfe being hateful to the world, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce and intollerable. For menthat have that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, seeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other side, if the people should not give them honour and reverence, they would straight take it in scorne, and little care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides and Epaminondas, all vsed this maner:not to seekethe goodwill of the comon people by flattery and dissimulation: which was indeed, because they dispised that which the people could give ortake away. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and let at any fines, or that they banished them, or gaue them any other repulse; but they loued them as well as they didbefore, so sooneas they showed any token of repentance, and that they were fory for the wrong they had done them, and were easily made friends againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that disdaineth to make much of the people, and to have their fauour, should much more scorneto seeke to be reuenged when he is repulsed. For, to take a repulse and denyall of honour so inwardly to the heart, cometh of no other cause, but that hedid too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not dissemble at all, that he was not very gladto fee himselfe honored, and sory to be reiected and denyed any honour:but also he sought all the meanes he could to make himfelfe beloued of those amongst whom he loued. Whereas Martius stoutnesse and haughty stomacke, did stay him from making much of those that might advance and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnaw himselse for spite and anger, whenhe faw he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reproued in him: for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of bribes and mony, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest men of all GRECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was vindoubtedly alwaies potable ab too licentious and loosely given, and had too small regard

brought them to archieue to such honourable acts and exploits as they did. Many (and the most part of historiographers) do write, that the house and family of the AEmylians in Rome, was alwaies of the most ancient of the nobility, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme also that the first of that house that gave name to all the posterity after, was Marcus, the sonne of Prthagoras the wife, whom king Wuma for the sweetnesse and pleasant grace of his tongue, surnamed Marcus Amylius: and those specially affirme it, that say king Numa was Pythagoras scholler. Howfocuer it was, the most part of this family that obtained honour and estimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate also in all their doings, sauing Lucius Paulus onely, who died in the battell of Cannes. But his misfortune doth beare manifest testimony of his wisdom & valiancietogether. For he was forced to fight against his will, when he saw he could not bridlethe rashnesse of his fellow Consult that would needs joyne battell; and to do as he did, sauing that he fled notas the other, who being the first procurer of the battel; was the first that ran away: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to let him, and did sticke by it, and fought it valiantly vnto the last gaspe. This A Emplius lest a daughter behind him called AEmylia, which was maried vnto Scipiothe Great: and a sonne, Paulus AEmylius, being the same man whose life we presently treate of His youth fortunately fell out in a flourishing time of glo. rie and honour, through the fundry vertues of many great and noble persons liuing in those dayes, among whom he made his name famous also: and it was not by that ordinary art and course, which the best esteemed yong men of that age did take and follow. For he did not vse to pleade private mens causes in law, neither would ercepe into mens favour by fawning vponany of them: though he faw it a common practife, and policy of men, to feeke the peoples fauour and goodwils by such meanes. Moreouer, he resused not that common course which other tooke, for that it was contrary to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene so disposed: but he rather sought to winne reputation by his honesty, his valiantnesse, and vpright dealing, as choosing that the better way then either of the other two, insomuch as in maruellous short time he passed all those that were of his age. The first office of honor he sued for, was the office of Adylu, in which fuite he was preferred before twelue other that fued for the felf same office: who were men of no small quality, for they all came afterwards to be Confuls. After this, he was chosen to be one of the number of the priests, whom the ROMAINES call Augures: who have the charge of all the divinations and foothfayings, in telling of things to come by flying of birds, and fignes in the aire. He was fo carefull, and took fuch pains to vnderfrand how the Romarnes did vse the same, and with such diligence sought the observation of the ancient religion of Romains in all holy matters: that where that priesthood was before esteemed but a title of honor, and defired for the name only, he brought it to passe, that it was the most honorable science, and best reputed of in Rome: wherin he confirmed the philosopherso pinion, that religion is the knowledge how to ferue God. For when he did any thing belonging to his office of priefthood, he did it with great experience, iudgement, & diligence leauing all other thoughts, & without omitting any ancient ceremony, or adding to any new, contending of tentimes with his companions, in things which seemed light, and of small moment : declaring vnto them, that though we do prefume the gods are casic to be pacified, & that they readily pardonall faults and scapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for respect of common wealths fake, they shold not flightly nor carelesly disseble or passe ouer faults comitted in those matters: for no man (faith he) at the first that committeth any fault, doth alone trouble the state of the comon wealth but withal, we must thinke he leaueth the grounds of civil governmet, that is not as careful to keepe the inftitutions of final matters, as also of the great. So was healfo a seuere captaine & strict observer of all martial discipline, not seeking to win the souldiers love by flattery, when he was generall in the field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a second charge, by showing himself gentle and courteous in the first, vnto those that served vinder him; but himfelfe did orderly flew them the very rules and precepts of the discipline of wars, euen as a prieft that shold expresse the names & ceremonies of some holy sacrifice, wherin were danger to omit any part or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the law of armes vpon rebellious and disobedient fouldiers, he kept vp therby the state of the commonweale the better: iudging to ouercome the enemy by force, was but an accessarie as a man may terme it, in respect of well training and ordering his citizens by good discipline. While the ROMAINES were in warres against king Antioshus surnamed the Great, in the South parts, all the chiefest captaines captains of Rome being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West parts towards Spaine where they were vp in armes. Thither they sent Aimylius Prætor, Paulus A. not with fixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue : fo that vnder Prætor in the name of Prætor, he had the authoritie and dignity of a Confull. He twife ouercame the bar- to Spaine. barous people in maine battell, and flue thirty thousand of them, and got this victory through his great skill and wisedome, in chusing the advantage of place and time, to fight with his enemies, euen as they passed ouer a river: which easily gaue his fouldiers the victory. Moreover he took there two hundred & fifty cities, all which did open, and gladly receive him in. So, leaving fish. all that country quiet and in good peace, and having received their fealty by oath made between his hands, he returned againe to Rome, not inriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke little regard to his expences, he spent so frankly, neither was his purse his mafter, though his revenue was not great to beare it out, as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had was litle enough to fatisfie his wines joynter. His first wife was Papyria, the daughter of a noble Confull Papyrius Masso, and after they had liued a long time together, he was diuorced from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The inst cause of the dinorce between them, ap- scipio the peared not to vs in writing: but me thinkes the tale that is told concerning the separation of a found and certaine mariage istrue: That a certaine Romaine having for saken his wife, her friends fel out Maximus with him, and asked him, What fault dost thou find in here is she nothonest of her body; is she were the not faire: doth she not bring thee goodly children: But he putting forth his foot, she wed them for faire and the fair forth his foot, she wed them for fair forth his foot, she wed them for fair forth his foot, she wed them his shoot, and answered them: Is not this agoodly shoot it finely made? and is it not new: "15 paps" yetIdare fay there is neuer a one of you can tel where it wringeth me. For to fay truly, great & right fire open faults are commonly occasions to make husbands put away their wives:but yet oftetimes Apretitals houshold words runne so betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diversity of of a Ronatures, which strangers are not printy vnto) that in processe of time they do beget such a strange maine that alteration of loue and minds in them, as one house can no longer hold them. So Amylius, ha- wife, uing put away Papyria his first wife, he maried another that brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with himselfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, scipiothe second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption to two of the noblest and richest families of the city of Rome. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was fine times Conful, and the yonger unto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the greate Scipio the African did adopt, being his cofin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the fonne of Cato The vertus maried the one, and Alius Tubero the other, who was a maruellous honest man, and did me re of Alius nobly maintaine himselfe in his pouerty, then any other Romain E: for they were fixteene per- Tubero: his fons all of one name, and of the house of the Ælians, very necre akinne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the city, and a smal farme in the country, wherewith they entertainedthemselues, and lived all together in one house, with their wives, and many litle children. Amongst their wives, one of them was the daughter of Paulus Amylius, after he had beene twife Confull, and had triumphed twife, not being ashamed of her husbands pouerty, but wondring at his vertue that made him poore. Whereas brethren and kinsemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not far afunder, and in other countries, not one neare another, and that rivers Innaturapartition not, or walles deuide their lands, leaving great large wastes between them; they are lines. neuer quiet, but still in quarrel one with another. Goodly examples doth this story lay before the wife and well advised reiders to leave the red in a. wise, and well aduised readers, to learne thereby how to frame their life, and wisely to behaue mous. themselues. Now Emplius being chosen Consull, went to make warre with the Ligurians, demplian who dwelled in the ALPES, & which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valide confuit and warlike men, and were very good souldiers at that time, by reason of their continuall wars against the Romain s, whose neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foot ioyneth to the THYSCAN fea, & pointeth towards Africk, & are mingled wirly the GAVLES and SPANIAR DS, neighbours vnto the sea coast: who scowring al the Mediterranian sea at that time, vato the straight of Hercules pillers, did with their litle light pinnaces of pirates, let al the traffick and entercourse of merchadize. Æmylius being gone to seek the in their country, they taried his coming with an army of forty thousand men: neuerthelesse, though he hadbut eight thousand men in all, and that they were flue to one of his, yet he gaue the onset vpon them, and overthrew them, & drauethe into their cities. Then he sent to offer them peace, for the Romaines would not altogether destroy the Lievrian s, because their country was as a rampier or bulwarke gainst the inuation of the GAVLES, who lay lurking for oportunity and occasion to inuade ITA LY: wherupon these LIGVRIANS yeelded theselues vnto him, & put all their forts & ships into his hands. Amilia deliuered vnto them their holds again, without other hurt done vnto them. fauing that he razed the walles of their fortifications: how beit he took all their ships from them leaving them litle botes of three owers onely, and no greater, and fet all the prisoners at liberty they had taken, both by fea and by land, aswell Romaines as other, which were a maruellous number. These were all the notable acts he did worthy memory, in the first yeare of his Cossil ship. Afterwards he oftentimes shewed himselfe very desirous to be Consul againe, and did put forth himselfe to sue for it; but when he was denied it, he neuer after made sute for it againe, but gaue himselfe only to study divine things, and to see his children verteously brought vp, not on-Ty in the ROMAINE tongue which himselfe was taught, but also a litle more curiously in the GREEKE tongue. For he did not onely retaine Gramarians, Rhetoritians, and Logicians, but alik painters, grauers of images, riders of horses, and hunts of GRECE about his children: & he him. selfalso(if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with the in the schoole when they were attheir books, & also when they otherwise did exercise themselves. For he loued his children as much or more then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the state of the common wealth, the Romains were at wars with king Perfeus, and they much blamed the captains they had sent thither before, for that for lack of skil & courage, they had so cowardly behaued The cowardthemselues, as their enemies laughed them to scorne; and they received more hurt of them, then the Komains they did vnto the king. For not long before, they had driven king Antiochus beyond mount Taut rus, and made him for sake the rest of Asia, and had shut him vp within the borders of Syria, who was glad that he had bought that country with fifteene thousand talents, which he paid for a fine. A litle before also, they had ouercome Philip, king of MACEDON in THESSALY, and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreover, having ouercome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that cuer was in the world was comparable, either for his power or valianmefile) they thought this too great a dishonour to them, that this warre they had against king Perseus, should hold so long of even hand with them, as if he had bene an enemy equall with the people of Rom E: confidering alforhat they fought not against them, but with the refuse and scattered people of the ouerthrownearmy his father had lost be fore, and knew northat Philip had left his army stronger, and more expert by reason of his overthrow, then it was before: as I will briefly rehearle the flory from the beginning. Antigonus, who The succeswas of the greatest power of all the captaines and successours of Alexander the Great, having ob-Gen of An-King of. Macedon Poson King son, to fay, the giver: for he promised much and gave litle. After him raigned Philip, who in his of Macedon tained for himselfe and his posterity the title of a King, had a sonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the second, that was surnamed Gonatos, whose sone was also called Demetrius, that raigned no long time, but died, and left a yong fonne called Philip. By reason whereof, the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme should beleft without heire, they preferred one Antigonus, cosin to the last deceassed King, & made him marry the mother of Philip the leffe, giving him the name at the first of the Kings protectour only, and lieutenant generall of his maiesty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wise Prince, and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the absolute name of a king, & surnamed him Degreeney outh gaue more hope of himselfe, then any other of the Kings before: insomuch as they thought that one day he would restore MACEDON her ancient same and glory, and that hea lone would pluck downe the pride and power of the Romains, who rose against all the world But after that he had lost a great battell, and was ouerthrowne by Titus Quintus Flaminius neare vnto the city of Scorvs A, then he began to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercy of the ROMAINES; thinking he escaped good cheape, for any light ransome or tribute the Romaines should impose vpon him. Yet afterwards coming to vnderstand himselfe, he grew to disdained much, thinking that to raignethrough the fauour of the Romaines, was but to make himselfea flaue, to feek to liue in pleasure at his ease, and not for a valiant & noble prince borne. Wherup on he set all his mind, to study the discipline of wars, & made his preparation as wisely & close ly as possibly he could. For he left all his townes along the sea coast, and standing vpon any high waies, without any fortification at al & in maner desolate without people, to the end there might mour in his armory, to arme thirty thousand men, & eight million bushels of corne safely lockt Phillipsare vp in his forts and stronger places, and ready money, as much as would serue to entertaine ten mary. thousand strangers in pay, to defend his country for the space of ten yeares. But before he could bring that to patte he had purposed; he died for griefe and sorrow, after he knew he had vittely the death put Demetrius the best of his sonnes to death, vpon the salse accusation of the worst, that was Perpeting. Cus: who as he did inherite the kingdome of his father by succession, so did he also inherite his fathers malice against the Romaines. But he had no shoulders to beare so heavy a burden, & especially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many leud and naughty Perfement conditions he had, he was extreme couetous and miserable. They say also, that he was not legitimate, because Philips wife had taken him from Gnathainia (a tailors wife borne at Ar Gos) imme-diatly after he was borne, and did adopt the child to be hers. And some thinke that this was the chiefest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, searing lest this lawful son wold seeke occasion to proue him a bastard. Notwithstanding, simple though he was, & of vile and base na-

appeareno occasion of doubt or mistrust in him: and in the meane time, in the high countries of his Realme farre from great beaten waies, he leavied a great number of men of warre, and replenished his towns and strong holds that lay scatteringly abroad, with armour and weapon, mony, and men, prouiding for warre; which he kept as sccretly as he could. For he had prouision of ar-ture, he found the firength of his kingdome fo great, that he was contented to take vpon him to makewar against the Romains, which he maintained a long time, & fought against their Con- few makes fuls, that were their Generals, and repulfed great armies of theirs both by fea & land, and ouercame some. As Publius Licinius among other, the first that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrown maines, by him in a battel of horsme, where he slew at that time two thousand fine hundred good men of his,& took fix hundred prisoners. And their army by sea, riding at anker before the city of ORE. vu, he did fodainly set vpon, & took twenty great ships of burden, and all that was in them, and werthrown funke the rest, which were all loaden with corn: and took of all sorts besides, about 54. foysts & by Perfeus. galliots of fifty owers apeece. The second Conful and General he fought withall, was Hostilius, Hostilius, whom he repulsed, attenting by force to inuade Macedon by way of the city of ELVMIA. A. Consultrenother time again, when he entred in by flealth vpo the coaft of Thessally, he offered him bat- ruled out tel, but the other durst not abide it. And as though this war troubled him nothing at all, and that he had cared little for the ROMAINES, he went and fought a battell in the meane time with the

DARDANIANS, where he flue ten thousand of those barbarous people, and brought away a maruellous great spoile. Moreouer he procured the nation of the GAVIE's dwelling upon the river of Dannby, which they call Baftarne (men very warlike, and excellent good horfemen) & did pra- Baftarne disc with the ILLYRIANS also by meane of their king Gentius, to make them io yne with him in the Gaule this warre: fo that there ranne a rumor, that for mony he had gotten those GAVLES to come dwelling downe into ITALY, fro the high country of GAVLE all along the Adriatike sea. any more by grace and fauour vnto those that sued for them: but contrariwise, that they should call some noble man that were very skilful & a wife captain, & could discreetly gouerne & performethings of great charge as Paulus Amylius, aman wel stepped on in yeares, being threescore yeares old, & yet of good power, by reafo of the lufty yong men his fons, & fons in law, befides agreat nüber of his friends and kinsfolk. So al that bare great authority, did altogether with one confent counsell him to obey the people, which called him to the Consulship. At the beginning indeed he delayed the people much that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them : faying, he was no meete man neither to defire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. How beit in the end, seeing the people did vrge it vpon him, by knocking continually at his gates, & calling him aloud in the streets, willing him to come into the market place, and perceiving they were angry with him, because he refused it, he was content to be perswaded. And when he stood among the that fued for the Cosulship, the people thought straight that he stood not there so much for defire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of affured victory, & happy successe of this begun warre: fo great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they follows.

vpon king Perfew, all the people did honourably company him home vnto his house: where alltle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making much of her, asked her why she wept. The poore girle answered, colling him about the necke, and kiffing him: Alas father, wote you what?our Perfeus is dead. She meant it by a little whelp fo called, which was her play-fellow. In good houre my girle, faid he, I like the fignewel Thus did Cicero the orator report of it in his booke of divinations. The Romaines, had acufrome at that time, that fuch as were elected Confuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) make an oration of thankes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the custome) being gathered together to heare Amylina speak, he made this oration vike them: that the first time he sued to be Consul, was in respect of himselfe, standing at that time inneed of such honour: now he offered himselfe the second time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who stood in need of a Generall, wherefore he thought himselfe nothing bound nor beholding vnto them now. And if they did thinke also this warre might be better followed by any other then by himselfe, he would presently withall his hart refigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any truft or confidence in him, that they though him a man furficient to discharge it then that they would not speake nor meddle in any matter that concerned his dutie, and the office of a Generall, fauing onely, that they would be diligent (without any words) to do whatfoener he commanded, and should be necessary for the warre and service they took in hand. For if every man would be a commander, as they had bin heretofore, of those by whom they should be commanded then the world would more laughthem to fcorne in this feruice, then euer before had bin accustomed. These words made the Romains very obedient to him, and perceined good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refused those ambitious flatterers that fued for the charge, and had given it vinto a man, that durst boldly and frankly tell them the troth. Marke how the Romains by yeelding vnto reaso & vertue, came to command all other, & to make themselues the mightiest people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius setting forward to this warre, had wind at will, and faire passage to bring him to his journeys end, I impute it to good fortune, that fo quickly and fafely conueyed him to his campe. But for the rest of his exploits, he did in all his warre part of them being performed by his owne hardinesse, other by his wisdome and good counsell, other by the dill. gence of his friends in seruing him with good will, other by his owne resolute constancy and courage in extremest danger, & last, by his maruellous skil in determining at an instant what was to be done, I cannot attribute any notable act or worthy service vnto this his good fortunether talke of fo much, as they may do in other captains doings; vnleffe they wil fay peraduenture, that Perfeus couctor fnesse and misery was Amylius good fortune: for his miserable feare of spending mony, was the only cause & destruction of the whole realme of Macedon, which was in good state & hope of continuing in prosperity. For there came down into the country of Mace box at king Perfeus request, ten thousand Bastarnæ a horse-backe, & as many footmen to them, who alwairs joyned with them in battel; all mercenary fouldiers, depending upon pay and entertainment of wars, as men that could not plow, nor fow, nor trafficke marchandizes by fea, nor skill of grazing to gaine their living with and to be short, that had no other occupation or merchandize, but to ferue in the warres, and to ouergome those with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incamp and lodge in the Medica, neareto the Macedonians, who faw them so goodly greatmen, and so well trained and exercised in handling all kind of weapons, so braue and lufty in words and threats against their enemies: they began to pluck vp their hearts, and to look big imagining that the ROMAINS would neuer abide them, but would be afeardto look them in the face, & only to feetheir march, it was fo terrible & fearefull. But Perfeus after he had incouraged his men in this fort, & had put them in fuch a hope and iollity, when this barbarous supply came to ask him a thousand crownes in hand for every captain, he was so damped& troubled withall in his mind, casting up the fum it came to, that his only couetousnes and misery made him returne them back, and refule their feruice: not as one that meant to fight with the Ro-MAINES, but rather to spare histreasure, & to be a husband for the, as if he should have given vp a straight account vnto the of his charges in this war, against whom he made it. And not with standing also his enemies did teach him what he had to do confidering that besides all other their warlike furniture & munitio, they had no leffe then a hundred thou and fighting men lying in camp together, ready to execute the Confuls comandement; yet he taking vpo him to refift to puillant an army, & to maintaine the wars, which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in entertaining such multitudes of men, more then needed:hardly would depart with his gold and filuer. but kept it safe locked vp in his treasury, as if he had beneafraid to touch it, and had bin none of his. And he did not shew that he came of the noble race of the kings of Lydia, & Phoenicia who gloried to be rich: but shewed how by inheritance of bloud he chalenged some part of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both because they esteemed to buy victory with money. not money with victory, did many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common faying in old time, that it was not Philip, but his gold and filuer that won the cities of GRECE. And Alexander whe he went to conquer the Indies feeing the MACEDONI-Anscary with them all the wealth of Persia, which made his campe very heavy, and flow to march:he himself first of al set fire on his own cariage that conveyed al his necessaries, &perswadedother to do the like, that they might march more lightly, and easily on the journey. But Perfew contrarily would not spend any part of his goods, to saue himselfe, his children and realme, but rather yeelded to be led priloner in triumph with a great ransome, to shew the Romaines how good a husband he had bene for them. For he did not onely fend away the Gav L E s without giving them pay as he had promifed, but moreover having perfwaded Gentius king of ILLY- Genting MIATO take his part in these wars, for the sum of three hundred talents which he had promised King of the to furnishhim with he caused the money to be told, and put vp in bags by those whom Gentius aided Perfent to receive it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himfelfe fure of the money promifed, committed fem. afond and foule part; for he stayed the ambassadours the Romaines sent vnto him, and committed them to prison, This part being come to Perseus cares, he thought now he needed not hire him with mony to be an enemy to the Romains, confidering he had waded fo farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifest figne of his ill will towards them; and that it was too late to looke backe and repent him, now that his foule part had plunged him into certain warres, for an Perfeu vncertain hope. So did he abuse the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promised him. And worse then this, shortly after he suffered Lucius Ancius the king Gen-Romains Pretor, whom they fent against him with an army, to plucke King Gentius, his wife, time. and children out of his kingdome, and to cary them prisoners with him. Now when Æmylius was arrived in MACEDON, to make warre against such an enemy, he made no manner of reckoning of his person, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one camp he had soure Lucius A. thousand horsemen, & no lesse then forty thousand footmen, with the which army he had plantedhimselse along the sea side, by the foot of the mount olympus, in a place unpossible to be ap- Personal proached: and there he had so well fortified all the straights and passages vnto him with fortifications of wood, that he thought himself to lie safe out of all danger, and imagined to dally with Olympus, Amylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. Amylius in the meane feafon lay not with 4000 idle, but occupied his wits throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put something in and 40000 proofe. And perceiuing that his fouldiers by ouer much licentious liberty (wherin by fufferance footmin. they lined before) were angry with delaying and lying still, and that they did busily occupy themselues in the Generals office saying this, and such a thing would be done that is not done: hetookethem vp roundly, and commanded them they should meddle no more too curiously inmatters that pertained not to them, and that they should take care for nothing else, but to see admonition in infant. their armour and weapon ready to ferue valiantly, and to vse their swords after the Komains dier. fallion, when their Generall should appoint and command them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to look to themselves, he commanded those that watched, should have no speares Paulus Enor pikes, because they should be more wakefull, having no long weapon to refist the enemy, if mylius they were affaulted. The greatest trouble his army had, was lack of fresh water, because the watthe watch urthatrantothe sea, was very litle, & maruellous foule by the sea side. But Amylius cosidering they were at the foot of the mount olympus (which is of a maruellous height, and full of wood frages mer withal)coiectured, sceing the trees so fresh & green, that there shold be some little prety springs pike. among them, which ran vnder the ground. So he made them dig many holes & wels along the moutain, which were fraight filled with faire water, being pent within groud before for lack of The original with the original transfer of the original transfer or the original transfer of the ori breaking open the heads, which the randown in ftreames, & met together in fundry places. but that it ingendreth & rifeth at the same time and place where it runneth not, turning the substance into water, which is a moist vapour, thickned & made cold by the coldnesse of the earth and so becometh a streame and runneth downe. For (say they) as womens breasts are notal waies full of milk (as milk pans are, that continually keep milk) but do of themselves courteth nutriment women take into milke, and after cometh forthat their nipples: euen fo the fprings and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, haue no meetings of hid den waters, nor hollow places so capable readily to deliuer water from the, as one wold draw it out of a pumpe or cisterne, from so many brooks, and deep rivers: but by their natural coldnes and moisture, they waxe thick, and put forth the vapour and aire so strong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reaso why the places where they dig & open the earth, do put forth more abudance of water by opening the ground:like as womens breafts do giue more milk when they are most drawne and suckt, because in a sortthey do better feed the vapour within them, & conuert it thereby into a running humour. Where to the contrary, those parts of the earth that are not digged, nor haue no veni outward, are the more vnable, & leffe meete to ingender water ha uing not that prouocation and course to runne, that causeth the bringing forth of moisture, Ye fuch as maintain this opinion, do give them occasion that love argument, to contrary them thus Then we may fay by like reasonalso, that in the bodies of beasts there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendreth vpon a fodaine, when they are hurt, by transferring of fome spirit or flesh that readily changeth into some running liquor. And moreouer, they are confuted by the common experiece of these mine-men, that dig in the mines for mettal, or that vndermine calles win them: who when they dig any great depth, do many times meet in the bowels of the camb with running rivers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle & litle, as of necessity it should be, if it were true, that vpon the prefent opening of the ground, the humour should immediatly be created but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we see oftentimes that in cutting the rough a mountaine or rocke, fodainely there runneth out a great quantitie of water. And this much for this matter. Now to return to our history again. Amylius lay there a conuenient time, and stirred not; and it is faid there were neuer scentwo so great armies one so necre to the other, and to be so quiet. In the end, casting many things with himself, and deuising fundry practises, he was informed of another way to enter into MACEDON, through the country of PERRÆBIA, ouer against the temple called Pythion, and the rock vpo which it is built, where there lay nogarrison: which gaue him better hope to passe that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrownes and hardnes of the way vnto it. So, he brake the matter of his councel. Thereuno Scipio Na- Scipio called Nasica (the son adopted of that Great Scipio the African, who became afterwards a great man, and was prefident of the Senate or councell) was the first man that offered himself fisa & Fa-bius Maxito leade them, whom it would please him to send to take that passage, & to assault their enemiss behind. The fecond was Fabius Maximus, the eldest fon of Æmylius, who being but a very yong man, rose not with standing, and offered himselfe very willingly. A mylius was very glad of their offers, and gauethem not so many men as Polybius writeth, but so many as Nasica himselfdeda reth in a letter of his he wrot to a king, where he reporteth al the story of this journy. There were 3000. ITALIANS, leavied in ITALY, by the confederates of the ROMAINES, who were noted the ROMAINE legions, and in the left wing about 5000. Besides those, Nasica tooke also 120 men at armes, and about 200. CRETANS and THRACIANS mingled together, of those Harps lus had sent thither. With this number Nasica departed from the campe, and tooke his way to ward the sea side, and lodged by the temple of Hercules, as if he had determined to do this seat by sea, to enuiron the campe of the enemies behind. But when the fouldiers had supped, & that it was darke night, he made the captaines of enery band printy to his enterprise, and so marched all night a contrary way from the sea, vntil at the length they came vnder the temple of Pythin where he lodged to rest the souldiers that were sore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus is aboue ten furlongs high as appeared in a place ingrauen by him that measured it.

There Nafica refled all night. King Perfew perceiuing in the meane time that Amylius stirred not from the place where he lay, mistrusting nothing his practise, and the coming of Nasica, who was at hand vntill fuch time as a traytor of CRETE (stealing from Nasica) did reveale vnto him the pretended pradife as alfothe Romain Bs compassing of him about: he wondered much at these newes howbeit he removed not his campe from the place he lay in, but dispatched one of his captaines called Milon, with ten thousand strangers, and two thousand Maceponians: and straightly commanded him with all the possible speed he could to get the top of the hill before them. Polybins faith, that the ROMAINE'S came and gaue them an alarum, when they were fleeping: But Walled writeth, that there was a maruellous sharpe and terrible battell on the top of the mountaine: and faid plainely, that a THRAGIAN fouldier coming towards him, he threw his dart at him, and hitting him right in the breft, flew him starke deade; and having repulsed their enemies, Milor their captain shamefully running away in his coat without armor or weapon, he followed him without any danger, and so went downe to the valley, with the safety of all his company. the flatebra This conflict fortuning thus, Perfeus railed his campe in great haste from the place where he was, effucien & being disappointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits end, & not knowing how to determine. Yet was he conftrained either to ftay, & incampe before the city of Pydne, there to take the hazard of battel, or elfe to decide his army into his cities and firong holds, and to receive the wars within his own country, the which being once crept in could never be driuen out againe, without great murder and bloudshed. Hereupon his friends did counsell him, to chuse rather the fortune of battell; alleadging vnto him, that he was the stronger in men a great way, & that the MACEDONIANS wold fight luftily with all the courage they could, cofidering that they fought for the fafety of their wives & children, and also in the presence of their king. who should both see every mans doing, and fight himselfe in person also for them. The king moued by these perswassons, determined to venture the chance of battell. So he pitched his campe versus pieched his campe and viewed the fituation of the places all about, & deuided the copanies amongst his captaines, campe be purpofing to give a hot charge vpon the enemies when they should draw necre. The place and country was fuch, as being al chapion, there was a goodly valley to range a battel of footmen in and litle prety hils also one depending vpo another, which were very commodious for archers, naked men, & fuch as were lightly armed to retire themselves being diffressed, & also to enuiron their enemies behind. There were two finall rivers also, A fon and Leucus that ran through the fame, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the latter end of Sommer, yet of Hore to they would annoy the Romains notwithstanding. Now when Emylius was joyned with Na. Lucus. feet, he marched on straight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiving afar off their battel marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the same the wondred to behold it, and suddenly stayed his army, considering with himselfe what he had to do. Then the yong captains having charge under him, defirous to fight it out presently went unto him to pray him to give the onset, but Nasica specially above the rest, having good hope in the former good lucke he had at his first encounter. Amylius smiling, answered him: So would Ido, if I were Amylius as yong as thou. But the fundry victories I have wonne heretofore, having taught me by expe-antiories rience the faults the vanquished do commit, do forbid me to go so hotly to worke (before my fica, for gifouldiers have rested, which did returne but now) to assault an army set in such order of bat- wing thange tell. When he had answered him thus, he commanded the first bands that were now in view of the enemies, should embattell themselues, shewing a countenance to the enemie as though The Wiley they would fight: and that those in the rereward should lodge in the meane time, and fortifie foresign of the campe. So, bringing the foremost men to be hindmost, by changing from man to man, tains before the enemies were aware of it; he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noyfe, and the enemies neuer perceihing it. But when night came, and every man had supped, as they were going to sleepe and take their rest: the Moone which was at the full, and of a great height, began to darken and to change into many forts of colours, loofing her light, vntill such time as she vanished away and was eclipfed altogether. Then the Romaines began to make a noife with basons and pans. as their fashion is to do in such a chance, thinking by this found to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting vp many torches lighted and firebrands into the aire. For Amylius was not ignorant of thedi. uersities of the eclipses, and he had heard say the cause is, by reason that the Moone making her ordinarie course about the world (after certaine revolutions of time) doth come to enterinto the round shadow of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden, vntill such time as he. uing past the darke region of the shadow, she commeth afterwards to recouer her light which the taketh of the Sunne. Neuertheleffe, he being a godly deuout man, so soone as he perceiued the Moone had recouered her former brightnesse againe, he facrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning also by the breake of day, making facrifice to Hercules, he could never have any fignes or tokens that promifed him good luck, in facrificing twenty oxen one after another but at the one twentieth he had fignes that promifed him victory, so he defended himself. Where fore, after he had vowed a folemne facrifice of an hundred oxen to Hercules, and also games of prices at the weapons, he commanded his captaines to put their men in readinesse to fight; and fo fought to win time, tarying till the Sunne came about in the afternoone towards the West, to the end that the Romaines which were turned towards the East, should not have it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he reposed himselfe in his tent, which was all open behind towards the fide that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemies lay When it grew towards night, to make the enemies fet upon his men, some say he vsed thispolicy. He made a horse be driven towards them without a bridle, & certain Romains followed him, as they would have taken him againe: and this was the cause of procuring the skirmish. 0. ther fay, that the THRACIANS feruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, did fet vponcer taine for ragers of the Romains, that brought for rage into the campe: out of the which, fence hundred of the Ligyrians ranne suddenly to the rescue and reliefe coming still from both armies, at the last the maine battel followed after. Wherfore Emylius like a wise General forfeeing by the danger of this skirmish, and the stirring of both campes, what the fury of thebat tell would come to: came out of histent, and passing by the bands did encourage them, and prayed them to sticke to it like men. In the meane time, Nasica thrusting himselfe into the place where the skirmish was hottest, perceived the army of the enemies marching in battell ready loyne. The first that marched in the voward were the THRACIANS, who seemed terribleto look vpon, as he writeth himfelf:for they were mighty made men, & caried maruellous bright targets of steele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, & their thighes with tales their coates were black, and marched shaking heavy halberds vpon their shouldiers. Next vno these Thracians, there followed them all the other strangers and souldiers whom the king had hired, diuerfly armed and fet forth: for they were people of fundry nations gathered toge ther, among whom the PEONIANS were mingled. The third squadron was of MACEDONI ANS, and all of the chosen men, as well for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantnes of their persons: & they were all ingoodly gilt armours, & braue purple cassockes vponthe, spickean span new. And at their backes came after them, the old bands to shew themselves out of the campe with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to shine with the brightnes of their steel and copper. And all the hils and mountaines thereabouts did ring againe like an Echo, with the ery and noise of somany fighting men, one encouraging another. In this order they marchedia fiercely with so great heart-burning, and such swiftnesse: that the first which were slaine at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs from the camp of the Romains. The charge being given and the battel begunne, Amylius gallopping to the voward of the battel, perceived that the captains of the Macedonians which were in the first ranks, had already thrust their pikes into the Ro MAINES targets, fo as they could not come neere them with their fwords: and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behind them, had now plucked them before them, and did base their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the targets of the Ro MAINES. Which when he had confidered, and of what strength and force his wall and ranke

of targets was, one joyning so necreanother, and what a terrrour it was to see a front of a battell with so many armed pikes and steele heads; he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any fight he euer faw before, neuertheles he could wifely diffemble it at that time. And so paffing by the companies of his horsemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he shewed a noble cheereful countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrary fide, Perfeus the king of Perfeus MACE DON, as Polybins writeth, fo soone as the battell was begun, withdrew himselfe, and got the battell into the city of Prone, under pretence to go to do facrifice unto Hercules: who doth not accept mio Pydne. the faint sacrifice of cowards, neither doth receive their prayers, because they be vnreasonable. For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not should hit the white: nor that he should winne the victory, that bideth not the battell, neither that he should have any good, that doth nothing towards it : northata naughty man should be fortunate and prosper. The gods did fauour Amy-wondy lalius prayers, because he prayed for victory with his sword in his hand, and fighting did call to bour, me them for aide. Howbeit there is one Posidonius a writer, who saith he was in that time, and moreouer that he was at the battell: and he hath written an history containing many bookes of the acts of king Perseus, where he faith, that it was not for faint heart, nor vnder colour to sacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perfeus went from the battel, but because he had a stripe of an horse on the thigh the day before: who though he could not very well helpe himselfe, and that all his friends fought to perswade him not to go to the battell, yet he caused one of his horses to be brought to him notwithstanding (which he commonly vied to ride vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of darts were throwne at him fro both fides. And among those, he had a blow with a dart that hurt him somewhat, but it was ouerthwart, & not with the point, and did hit him on the left fide glancing wife, with fuch aforce, that it rent his coat, and rafed his skin vnderneath, so as it left a marke behind a long time after. And this is all that Posidonius writeth to defend and excuse Perseus. The Romains having their hands full, and being staied by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breach into them, there was a captaine of the Pelignians called Saline, who tooke the enfigne Saline of his band, and cast it among the prease of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians set vpon captains of them, with a maruellous force and fury in that place: for all ITALIANS thinke it too greate a flame and dishonour for souldiers to lose or for sake their ensigne. Thus was there maruellous the ensigned to be a supplied to the same and dishonour for sould be same as the same and dishonour for sould be same as the same and dishonour for sould be same as the same and dishonour for sould be same as the same and dishonour for sould be same as the force of both fides vied in that place: for the Pelignians proued to cutthe Macedonians and three pikes with their swords, or else to make them give backe with their great targets, or to make a the sheetenies. breach into the, and to take their pikes with their hands. But the Mac EDONIANS to the contrary, holding their pikes fast with both hands, ran the through that came neere vnto them, so that neither target not corflet could hold out the force and violence of the push of their pikes, in so much as they turned up the heeles of the Pelignians and Thracians, who like despetate beafts without reason, shutting in themselues among their enemies, ranne wilfully yoon their owne deaths, and their first ranke were slaine euery man of them. Thereupon those that were behinde, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backs, and only retired giving backe towards the mountaine olocrus. Emylius feeing that (as Posidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, because that some of his mengaue backe: other durst not from the battell of the Macedonians, which was fo strongly imbattelled on every side and so mured in with a wall of pikes, presenting their armed heads on every side a man could come, that it was impossible to breake into them, no not so much as come neere them onely. Yet notwithstanding, because the field was not altogether plaine and even, the battell that was large in the front, couldnot alwayes keepe that wall, continuing their targets close one to another, but they were driuen of necessity to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the fouldiers: that in one placethey thrust forward, and in another they gue backe, and leave a hole. Wherefore Amylius suddenly taking the vantage of this occasion, deuided his men into small companies, and commanded them they should quickly thrust in betweene their enemics, and occupy the places they faw voide in the front of their enemies, and that they should set on them in that fort, and not with one whole continual charge, but occupying them here and there with diverse companies in fundry places. AEmylius gave this tharge vnto the private captaines of every band and their lieuctenants, and the captaines also gaue the like charge vnto their fouldiers that could skilfully execute their commandement. For they went presently into those parts where they saw the places open, and being once

entred in among them, some gauecharge vpon the flanckes of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and vnarmed: other set vpon them behind, so that the strength of all the corpes of the battell (which confifteth in keeping close together) being opened in this fort, was straight ouerthrowne. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few against a few the MACE PONIANS with their litle short swords, came to strike upon the great shields of the Ro-MAINES, which were very strong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrary, were driven of necessity to receive the blowes of the strong heavy swords of the ROMAINES, vpontheir light weake targets, fo that what with their heauinesse, and vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corflet, but they paffed it through, and ran them in. By reason whereof they could make no long resistance, whereupon they turned their backs and ranne away. But when they came to the squadron of the old beaten fouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the crucllest fight and most desperate sentice, where they fay that Marcus Cato (fon of great Cato, and fon in law of Amylius) shewing all the valiantnes in his person that a noble mind could possibly personne, lost his sword which fell out of his hand. But he like a yong man of noble courage, that had bin valiantly brought vp in all diferpline, & knew how to follow the steps of his father (the noblest person that euer mansaw) was to Thew then his valure and worthines, and thought it more honor for him there to die, then living to fuffer his enemies to enjoy any spoile of his. So, by and by he ran into the Romaine army, to find out some of his friends, whom he told what had befallen him, and prayed them to help him to recouer his fword, whereto they agreed. And being a good company of lufty valiant fouldiers together, they rushed straight among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and so did set vpon them with such force and fury, that they made a lane through the middest of them, and with great flaughter and spilling of bloud, euen by plaine force, they cleared the way still before them. Now when the place was voided, they fought for the fword, and in the end found it with great ado, amongsta heape of other swords and dead bodies; whereat they reiovced maruelloufly. Then finging a fong of victory, they went again more fiercely then before to giue a charge voon their enemies, who were not yet broken afunder: vntill such time as at the length, the three thousand chosen MACEDONIAN's fighting valiantly even to the last man, and neuer forsaking their rankes, were all slaine in the place. After whose ouerthrow, there was a great flaughter of other also that fled, so that all the valley and foote of the mountaines therea. bours was couered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the ROMAINES did passe ouer the river Leucus, they found it running all bloudy. For it is said there were slaineat this field of Perseus men, aboue five and twenty thousand; and of the ROMAINES side, as Pofidonius faith, not aboue fixescore, or as Nasica writeth, but sourcescore only. And for so great an ouerthrow, it is reported it was wonderful quickly done, & executed. For they began to fight about three of the clocke in the afternoone, and had wonne the victory before foure, and all the rest of the day they followed their enemies in chase, an hundred and twenty furlongs from the place where the battell was fought, fo that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So fuch as returned, was received with maruellous greation of their pages that went out with linkes and torches lighted, to bring their masters into their tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes & garlands of laurell, fauing the Generals tent onely: who was very heavy, for that of his two fonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loued best of the twaine, because he saw he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethren. For euenthen, being new crept out of the shell as it were, he was maruellous valiant and hardie, and desired honour wonderfully. Now Amylius thought he had bene cast away, fearing lest for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the raffinesse of his youth, he had put himselfe too fare in fight amongst the prease of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard straight what sorow Amylius was in, and how gricuously he tooke it. The Romain's being set at supper, rose from their meat, and with torch-light fomeran to Amylius tent, other went our of the campe to feeke him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: so all the campe was ful of sorow & mourning, the valleys and hils all about did ring againe with the cries of those that called Scipio aloud. For even from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and fingular parts required in a captaine and wife gouernour of the common-weale Laboue all the young men of his time. At the last, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the chase of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new bloud (like a fwift running greyhound fleshed with the bloud of the hare) having pursued very farre for iov of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NVMANTIVM, who was the greatest man of war and valiantest captaine of the Romains in his time, and of the greatest authority & reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her spite, which she did beare to so noble an exploit suffered Amylius for that time, to take his full pleasure of that noble victory. And as for Perfeus, he fled first fro Perseus fled the city of Py DNE, vnto the city of Pella, with his horsemen, which were in manner all saued. Iron of the Wherupon the footmen that faued themselues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traytors, cowards, & villaines; and worse then that, they turned them off their horse backes, and fought it out lustily with them. Perfeus feeing that, and fearing lest this mutiny might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horse out of the high way, and pulled off his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe in his hand, fearing to be knowne thereby: and that he might the more easily speake with his friends by the way, he lighted on foot, & led his horse in his hand. But fuch as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latchet of his shoo, another seemed to water his horse, another as though he would drink; so that one dragging after another in this fort, they al left him at the last, & ran their way, not fearing the enemies fury so much, as their kings cruelty: who being grieued with his misfortune, sought to lay the fault of the ouerthrow vpon all other but himfelf. Now he being come into the city of Pella by night, Endus & Endens, two of his treasurers came vnto him, & speaking boldly (but out of time) prefumed to tell him the great fault he had committed, and to counfell him what he should do. Time and daty to be The king was fo moued with their prefumption, that with his own hands he stabbed his dagger observed in them both, & flew them outright. But after this fact, all his feruants & friends refused him, and prince, there only taried with him but Enander CRETAN, Archedamus ATOLIAN, & Neo Bosorian. Death, the And as for the meane fouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it indignation was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the loue of his gold and filuer, as Bees that Printe. keepe their hines for loue of the hony: for he caried with him a great treasure, & gaue the leave The cone to spoile certain plate & vessel of gold and filuer, to the value of fifty talents. But first of all when the was come into the city of Annual to & afterwards in the city of the city of Annual to & afterwards in the city of the city of the city o he was come into the city of AMPHIPOLIS, & afterwards into the city of ALEPSE, & that the fearewas well blowne ouer, he returned againe to his old humour which was borne and bred with him, and that was anarice and mifery: for he complained vnto those that were about him, that he had vnwares given to the fouldiers of CRETA, his plate and veffell of gold to be spoiled, whine for being those which in old time belonged vnto Alexander the great; and prayed them with teares in his eies that had the place, they wold be contented to change it for ready mony. Now fuch as knew his nature, found fraight this was but a fraud & a CRETAN lyc, to acceive the CRETANS with but those that trusted him, and did restore againe the plate they had, did lose it every iot, for hencuer payed the peny for it. So he got of his friends, the value of thirty talents, which his enemies soone after did take from him. And with that sum he went into the Ile of Samor HRAcra, where he took the fanctuary and priviledge of the temple of Caftor & Pollux. They fay, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance did naturally loue their kings: but then feeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hearts failed the, & broke withall. For they all came & fubmitted themselves to Amylius, and made him Lord of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two donians dayes; and this doth seeme to confirme their words, who impute all Amylius doings vnto his themselves good fortune. And furely, the maruellous fortune he happened on in y city Amphipolis, doth to Emplius. confirme it much, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the gods. For one day beginning to do facrifice, lightning fell from heaven, and fet all the wood on fire worders. vpon the altar, & fan Hiffed the facrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure daies after Perfeus had loft the battell, and that the city of PELLA was taken, as the broughts people of Rome were at the lifts or flew place, feeing horfes run for games: fuddenly there a. Romone rosea rumor at the entring into the lists where the games were, that Amylins had wome a in some great battell of King Perseus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife straight daying inchery mans mouth, and there followed vpon it a maruellous ioy and great cheere in every. Empline corner, with shouts & clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the city of Rome. there; and Afterwards they made diligent enquiry, how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine author no man could be knowne, and enery man faid they heard it spoken: so as in the end it came to nothing, knew how they came.

and passed away in that fort for a time. But shortly after, there came letters, and certaine newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it, which could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We do reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALY, neare vnto the river of SAGRA, whereof newes was brought the very same day vnto Peloponnesvs. And of another also in like maner that was fought in Asia against the Medes, before the city of Mycala: the newes whereof came the same day vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the city of PLATOES. And in that great iourny where the Romains ouerthrew the Tarquins, & the army of the Latins: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they faw two goodly yong men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victory to Rome, and they judged they were Callor & Pollax. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some, told them, that he wondered how they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, & tooke him softly by the beard with both their hands, and even in the market place his haire being black before, was prefently turned yellow. This miracle made them beloeue the report the man made, who ever after was called Ambarbus, as you would fay, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like matter that happened in our time makethall fuch newes credible: For when Antonius rebelled against the Emperour Domitian, the city of Rom B was in a maruellous perplexity, because they looked for great warrestowards GERMANIE, But in this feare, there grew a sudden rumor of victory, & it went currantly through Rome, that Antonius himselfe was flaine, and all his army ouerthrowne, and not a man left aliue. This rumour was so rife, that many of the chiefest men of Rome beleeved it, & did sa crifise thereupon vnto the gods, giving them thankes for the victory. But when the matter came to fifting, who was the first author of the rumour, no man could tell: for one put it ouer still to another, and it died so in the end amongst the people, as in a bottomlesse matter, for they could neuer boult out any certaine ground of it: but eue as it came flying into Rome, so went it flying away againe, no man could tell how. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his journy to make this warre, met with posts that brought him letters of the certaine victory; and remembring the rumor of the victory that ran before in Rome, he found it true, that it was on the very sameday the victory was gotten; and the distance between Rome and the place where the field was won, was aboue 2000 furlongs off. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But again toour history. cn.odanius, lieutenant of the army of Amylius by sea, came to anker vnder the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he wold not take Perfeus by force out of the fanctuary where he was, for the reverence he did beare unto the gods Caftor & Pollux: but he did besiege him in such fort, as he mant by fea. could not scape him, nor flie by sea out of the Hand. Yet he had secretly practised with one onandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prise with him for a sum of mony to conucy him away by night: But the CRETAN served him a right CRETAN'S tricke. For when he had taken aboard by night into his veffel, all the kings treasure of gold & filuer, he sent him word that he should not faile the next night following to come into the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and feruants, where indeed was no possibility to take shipping; but the next night following he hoifed faile, and got him away. It was a pitifull thing that Perfens was driven to do and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a litle straight winrable fate Perfeits Was dow vponthe wals, and not only himselfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knew before what flying and hardnesse meant. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter sigh, when one told him on the pecre, that he law Oroandes the CRETAN under faile in the maine scas. Then day be the craft & fubrelty of ginning to breake, & feeing himself void of all hope, heran with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the fanctuary againe, before the Romains that faw him could ouertake him. Andas for his children, he had given them himself into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruellously loued, & who did then traiterously betray him: for he deliuered his children vntothe ROMAINS. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will follow her litle ones being taken fro her) to yeeld himself into their hands that had his children. Now he had a speciall confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld himself:but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he began to lament his hard and miserable fortune every way. And in the end, confidering how necessity enforced him, he mustinatia, yeelded himselfe into the hands of Cneus Offauius, wherein he shewed plainly that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then auarice, that was a faint heart, and feare to die. But hereby he deprined himselfe of others pity and compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny & take from the afflicted, and specially from them that have a noble heart. For he made request they would bring him vnto the General Amylius who rose from his chaire when he saw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meete a great king, by fortune of warre and by the will of the gods, faller into that most lamentable state. But he to the contrary, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued himselfe. For he fell downe at his feet, and embraced his knees, and vetered fuch vecomely speech and vile requests, as Amylius selfe could not abide to heare them but knitting his browes against him, being hartilv offended, he spake thus vnto him: Alaspoore man, why dost thou discharge fortune of this oration ?? fault, where thou mightest iustly charge and accuse her of thy discharge, doing things, for the forer, which every one judgeth thou hast deserved thy present misery, and art vnworthy also of thy former honor. Why dost thou defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing the felf so base a man, as my honour is not great to ouercome so vnworthy an enemy? The Ro-MAINES haue cuer effeemed magnanimity, cuen in their greatest enemies: but dastardlinesse, though it be fortunate, yet it is hated of enery body. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hand, gaue him into the custody of Elius Tubero. Then Emylius went into his tent and caried his fons, and fons in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the vonger forts And being fet downe, he continued a great space very pensiue with himselfe, not speaking a word insomuch that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into discourse and talke of fortune, and the vnconstancy of these worldly things, and faid vnto the: Is there any man lining, my friends, who having fortune at will, should thereforeboalt & glory in the prosperity of his doings, for that he had conquered a country, city, or fortune and Realmeand not rather to feare the vnconstancy of fortune who laying before our eyes, and all flang, those that professe ar this present, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainely teach vs to thinke, that there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men may thinke themselues assured, considering that when they have ouercome others, then are they driven to mistrust fortune most, and to mingle feare and mistrust, with joy of victory: if they will wifely confider the common course of fatall destiny that altereth daily, fometime fauouring one, otherwile throwing downe another. You fee, that in an houres space " we have troden under our feet the house of Alexander the Great: who hath bin the mightiest and most redoubted prince of the world. You see a king, that not long since was followed & accompaned, with many thousand souldiers of horsemen & sootmen, brought at this present into such ", miscrable extremity, that he is inforced to receive his meate and drinke daily at the hands of his enemies. Should we have any better hope then, that fortune wil alwaies fauor our doings, more then she doth his now, at this present no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter wel, you yong men I say, be not too brag nor foolish proud, of this conquest and noble victory; but think whatmay happen hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuy of this our present prosperity. Such were Amylius words to these yong men, as it is reported, bridling by these and such like perswasions, the lusty brauery of this youth, even as with the bit and bridle of reason. Afterwards he put his army into garrifons to refresh them: and went himselfe in person in the meanetime to visite GRECE, making it an honorable progresse, and also a commendable. For as hepassed through the cities, he relieued the people, reformed the government of their state, and progression euergaue them some gift or present. Vnto some he gaue corne, which king Perseus hadgathered Gree. for the wars and vnto other he gaue oiles, meeting with fo great store of prouision, that he rather lacked people to give it vnto, to receive it at his hands, then wanting to give, there was so much. Ashepassed by the city of DELPHES, he saw therea great piller, toure square, of white stone, which they had fet vp, to put king Per few image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commanded them to fet vp his in that place, faying: It was reason the conquered should give place vnto the conquerors. And being in the city of OLYMPIA, visiting the temple of Jupiter Olympian, he spake this openly, which ever fince hath bene remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Inpiter, as Homer had describedhim. Afterwards when the ten ambassadors were arrived that were sent from Rome to establish with him the realm of Macedon, he redeliuered the Macedonians their Amplion tountry and townes againe, to line at liberty, according to their lawes, paying yearly to the Ro- found Ma-MAIN'S for tribute, a hundred talents: where beforethey were wont to pay vnto their kingsten times as much And he made plants where before they were wont to pay vnto their kingsten times as much And he made plants and the second state of the seco times as much. And he made playes and games of all forts, & did celebrate sumptuous sacrifices vntothe gods. He kept open court to all comers, and made noble feafts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treasure Perfeus had gathered together, sparing for no cost. But through his care and forefight, there was a speciall good order taken, every man so courteously receiued and welcomed, and fo orderly marshalled at the table according to their estate and calling that the GRE clans wondred to fee him fo carefull in matters of sport and pleasure and that he took as great paines in his own person, to see that smal matters should be ordered as they ought. as he tooke regard for discharge of more weightie causes. But this was a maruellous pleasurer him to fee that among such sumptuous fights prepared to shew pleasure to the persons inuited no fight nor flately shew did so delight the as to enjoy the fight and company of his person so he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence & care in these matters: that to order a season well, required as great judgement and discretion, as to set a battel: to make the one seareful to the enemics, and the other acceptable to his friends. But menesteemed his bounty & magnanimity for his best vertue and quality. For he did not only refuse to see the kings wonderfull treasure of gold and filter, but caused it to be told, and delivered to the custody of the treasures, to cary to the coffers of flore in Rome and onely inffered his fons that were learned, to take the books of the kings library. When he did reward the foldiers for their valiant feruice in this battel, he gaue his fon in law Alius Tubero a cup, weying fluctalents. It is the fame Tubero we told you of before, who lived with fixteene other of his kin al in one house, and of the only revenue they had of a litle farme in the country. Some fay, that that cup was the first peece of plate that cuer came into the house of the Alyansi & yet it came for honor and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither thefelues, nor their wines, would ener haue, or weare any gold or filuer. After he had we ry well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leaue of the GRECIANS, and com. felled the Macedonians to remember the liberty the Romains had given the, & that they should be carefull to keepe it, by their good government and concord together. Then he departed from the m, and took his iourny towards the country of Ep 1 Rv s, having received commiffion from the Senate of Rome, to fuffer his fouldiers who had done feruice in the battel, and ucribrow of king Perfeus, to spoile all the cities of that country. Wherfore that he might surprife them on a sudden, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the cities that they should fend him by a certain day, ten of the chiefeft men of euery city. Who when they were come, he commanded them to go and bring him by fuch a day, all the gold & filuer they had within their cities, as well in their private houses, as in their temples and churches, and gave vnto every one of them a captaine and garrifon with them, as if it had bene only to have received and fearched for the gold and filuer he demanded. But when the day appointed was come, the fouldiers in diuerle places (and all at one time) fer vpontheir enemies, and did rifle and spoile them of that they had, and made them also pay ransome enery man: So as by this policy, they were taken & made flaues in one day, a hundred and fifty thouland persons, and threescore & ten cities spoiled and facked enery one, And yet when they came to divide the spoile of this generall destruction of a whole Realine by the poll, it came not to every fouldiers part, about eleven filter Drachmesapeece. Which made enery one to wonder greatly and to feare also the terror of the wars to be the wealth and riches of to great a Realme, to mount to folittle for every mans share. When &mylim had done this fact against his own nature, which was very gentle and courteous, he went vnto the sea fide to the city of Orica, and there embarked with his army bound for ITALIE. Where when he was arrived, he went up the river of Tyber against the streame, in king Perfess chiefe galley, which had fixteene owers on a fide richly fet out with the armor of the prisoners, rich clothes of purple colour, and other fuch spoiles of the enemies: so that the Romains rumning out of Rome in multitudes of people to fee his galley, & going fide by fide by her as they rowed foftly, Amylius took as great pleafure in it, as in any open games or feafts, or triumphthat had bin shewed indeed, But when the fouldiers faw, that the gold and filter of king Perfeus treafure was not divided among ft them according vnto promife, & that they had a great deale leffe then they looked for they were maruelloufly offended, and inwardly grudged Amylius in their hearts. Neuertheleffe they durft not speake it openly, but did accuse him, that he had bene too ftraight vnto them in this war and therefore they did flew no great defire, nor forwardnesse, to the entry of procure him the honour of triumph. Which Servius Galba understanding, that had benean old enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men under him in this warreshe like an enuious viper told the people, that Amylins had not deferued the honor of triumph, and

Moreouer he craued a day of the Tribunes of the people, to have respirt obring forth such matter as they determined to object against him: saying the time then was far spent, the Sun being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leifure. The tribunes made himanswer, that he should speake then what he had to say against him, or otherwise they would not grant him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long oration in his dispraise, ful of railing words, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing oration. Afterwards when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the affembly, and the next morning the fouldiers being incouraged by contention Galbaes oration, and having confedered together, did flock about Galba, in the mount of the Ca- about A. pitoll, where the Tribunes had given warning they would keepe their affembly. Now being militaret broad day Amylius triumph was referred to the most number of voices of the people, & the first tribe flatly did deny his triumph. The Senate, & the refidue of the people hearing that, were very fory to fee they did Amylius fo open wrong and injury. The common people faid nothing to it but seemed to be very fory, howbeit they fought no redresse. The Lords of the Senate cried out vpon them, and said, it was too much shame; and exhorted one another to bridle the insolency and boldnesse of those souldiers, who wold grow in the end to such tumult & disorder, that they would commit all mischiese and wickednesse, if betimes they were not looked to and preuented, secing they did so openly stand against their Generall, seeking to deprive him of the honor of histriumph and victory. So they affembled a good company of them together, and went vpto the Capitol, and prayed the Tribunes they would stay to take the voices of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with fuch needfull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The Seculian o-Tribunes granted to it, & filence was made. Then Marcus Servilius, who had bene Confull, and ration for had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne person, & had alwaics staine trance of as many of his enemics as chalenged him man for man; rose vp, and spake in fauour of Amylius in Amylius in this matter: I know now (faid he) better then before, how noble and worthy a captaine Paulus Emylius is, who hath atcheiued fuch glory & honorable victory, with fo dishonorable & diso- " bedient fouldiers. And I can but wonder that the people not long fince reioyced and made great co account of the victories and triumphs won vpon the ILLYRIANS & other nations of Africk: 66 and that now they should for spite enuy his glory (doing what lyeth in them to hinder) to bring aMacedonian king aliue in a triumph, and to shew the glory and greatnesse of king Philip and Alexander the Great, subdued by the Romains force and power. What reason have ye, the not long fince, vpon affying rumour that Amylius had won the battell against Perfeus, you straight ce made facrifice to the gods with greatioy, praying them that you might be witneffes, of the truth co thereof: and now that the person himselse whom ye made Generall is returned home, and doth ... deliner you most assured victory, you do frustrate the gods most solemne thanks and honor due ... to them, and do depriue your selues also of your wonted glory in such a case: as if you were a- co feard to fee the great neffe of your prosperity, or that you meant to pardon a king, your slaue and prisoner. And yet of the two, you have more reason to hinder the triumph, as pitying the king, « then ennying your Captaine. But the malice of the wicked, through your patience is growne to such an infolent audacity, & boldnesse, that we see men present here before vs, which neuer went from the fmoke of the chimney, nor caried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at ... home like women and house-doues; and yet they are so impudent and shamelesse, as they dare ... presume vnreuerently to your faces to prate of the office and duty of a Generall of an army, and of the descrit of triumph, before you I say, who by experience of many a sore cut and wound vpon your bodies in the warres, haue learned to know a good and valiant captaine, from a vile and se cowardly person. And speaking these words, he cast open his gowne, and shewed before them all the infinite scars and cuts he had received vpon his brest; and then turning him behind, shewed all fuch places as were not fit to be seene openly, and so turned himself agains to Galba, and hid vnto him: Thou mockest me for that I shew thee: but I reioyce before my countrymen and citizens, that for seruing my country night and day on horse backe, I have these wounds vpon me which thou feest. Now get thee about thy businesse and receive their voices: & I will come after, noting them that are naughty & vnthankful citizens, who like to be soothed with flattery, " and not stoutly comanded, as behoued a General in the warre. These words so reined the hardheaded fouldiers with the curbe of reason, that all the other tribes agreed in one, & granted Æmylius triumphithe order and solemnitie whereof was performed in this sort. First, the people having fet vp fundry scaffolds, as well in the lists and field called circos by the LATINES, where the games and common running of horses & chariots are made, as also about the market place and in other streets of the citie, in the which the shew of the triumph should passe: they all prefented themselves in their best gownes to see the magnificence, and state therof. All the temples of the gods also were set wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within and there were ferthrough all the quarters of the citic, numbers of fergeants and other officers holding tipstaues in their hands to order the stragling people. & to keepe them vp in corners and lanes ends, that they should not petter the streets, & hinder the triumph. Furthermore the sight of this triumph was to continue three daies, wherof the first was scant sufficient to see the passing by of the images, tables, and pictures, and statues of wonderfull bignesse, all won and gotten of their enemies, & drawn in the shew vpon 250 chariots. The second day, there were caried vpon a number of carts, all the fairest and richest armour of the MACEDONIANS, as well of copper, as also of iron and seele, all glistring bright, being newly furbushed, and artificially laid in order (and yet in such fort, as if they had bin cast in heapes one vpon another, without taking any case otherwise for the ordering and laying of them) faire burganets vpon targets: habergions, or bri. gantines and corflets, youn graues; round targets of the CRETANS, and iauclins of the THRA. CIANS, and arrowes amongst the armed pikes: all this armour and cariage, being bound oneto another fo trimly (neither being too loofe, nor too straight) that one hitting against another, as they drew them you the carts through the city, they made such a found & noise, as is was fear. full to heare in for that the onely fight of these spoiles of the captiues being ouercome, made the fight fo much more terrible to behold after these carts loden with armour there followed 3000 men, which caried the ready mony in 750 veffels, which weighed about three talents apeece. enery one of them were carried by foure men: & there were other that carried great bolles of fil. ucr, cups and goblets fashioned like pitchers, & other pots to drink in goodly to behold, as well for their bignes, as for their great & fingular imboffed works about them. The third day early in the morning the trumpets began to found and fet forwards, founding no march nor fweet note. to beautifie the triumph withall: but they blew out the braue alarum the found at an affault, to give the fouldiers courage for to fight. After them followed fix score goodly fat oxen, having all their hornes gilt, and garlands of flowers & nofegaies about their heads, and there went by the certaine yong men, with aprons of needle-worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the facrifice, and yong boyes with them also, that caried goodly basons of gold & filuer, to cast and sprinkle the bloud of the sacrifices about. And after these, followed those that caried all comes of gold deuided by basons & vessels, and every one of them weying three talents, as they didbe fore, that carried the great holy cup, which Amylius had caused to be made of massie gold, set fill of precious stons, weying the weight of tentalents, to make an offering vnto the gods. Andnex vnto them went other that caried plate, made and wrought after antike fashion, & notable cups of the ancient kings of Macedon: as the cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and tobe short, al the whole cubboord of plate of gold and filter of king Perfeus. And next them came the chariot of his armour in the which was all king Perfess harneffe, and his royall band (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle space betweene them, followed next the kings children whom they led prisoners with the traine of their schoole-masters & other officers, & their ser uants, weeping and lamenting who held up their hands unto the people that looked upon them and taught the kings yong children to do the like, to aske mercy & grace at the peoples hands There were three prety litle children, two fonnes and a daughter amongst them, whose tender yeares and lacke of understanding, made them (poore soules) they could not feele their present misery, which made the people so much the more to pity them, when they saw the poore little infants, that knew not the change of their fortune: fo that for the compassion they had of them, they almost let the father passe without looking vpon him. Many peoples hearts did mel for very pity, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, so as this fight brought both pleasure and forow, together to the lookers on, vntill they were past and gone a good way out of fight. King Perfeus the father, followed after his children and their traine, and he was cloathed in a black King Pergown, wearing a paire of flippers on his feet after his country maner. He shewed by his counter nance his troubled mind, oppress with sorow of his most milerable state & fortune. He was sol lowed with his kinsfolkes, his familiar friends, his officers & houshold feruants, their faces disfi gured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and forrowfull eyes cast voon their vnfortunate mafter, how much they forowed and bewailed his most hard and cruell fortune, litle accounting of their owne mifery. The voyce goeth, that Perfeus sent vnto Emilius Emilius to intreat him, that he should not be led through the city in the shew & sight of the triumph, But Emplius mocking (as he deserved) his cowardly faint heart, answered: As for that, it was before, world. and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let him vnderstand thereby, that he might rather chuse to dye, then living to receive such open shame. Howbeit his heart would not serve him, he was so cowardly, & made so effeminate, by a certain vaine hope he knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his owne spoiles. After all this, there followed 400. princely ded comme crownes of gold, which the cities & towns of GRECE had purposely sent by their ambassadors of gold sent by the gold sent by t vnto Almylius, to honour his victory; and next vnto them, he came himself in his chariot triumphing, which was paffing sumptuously set forth and adorned. It was a noble fight to behold: and the site of yetthe person of himselfe only was worth the looking on, without all that great pomp & magnificence. For he was apparrelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, and caried in his right hand a laurell bough, as all his army did besides: the which being deuided by bands and companies, followed the triumphing chariot of their captaine, some of the souldiers singing songs of vistory, which the Romains of the in like triumphs, mingling them with merry pleasant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of the also did sing songs of triumph, in the honor and praise of Amylius noble conquest and victory. He was openly praised, blessed, and honoured of eury body, and neither hated nor enuied of honest ment fauing the ordinary vie of some god, whose property is alwayes to lessen or cut off some part of mans exceeding prosperity & felicitie, mingling with mans life the sence and feeling of good and cuill together: because that no liuing person should passe all his time of life, without some aduersity or missortune, but that such (as Homer faith) should only thinke themselves happy, to whom fortune hath equally forted the good with the cuill. And this I speak, because Amylins had four fons, two of the which he gaue AEmilios inadoption vnto the families of scipio and of Fabius, as we have faid before: & two other which adversise. hehad by his second wife, he brought vp with him in his owne house, and were both yet very yong of the which the one died, being fourteene yeares of age fine dayes before his fathers triumph: and the other died also three dayes after the pompe of triumph at twelue yeares of age. When this forrowfull chance had befallen him, energy one in Rome did pity him in their hearts: but fortunes spite & cruelty did more grieue and fearethe, to see her litle regard towards him, toput into a house of triumph (full of honour and glory, and of sacrifices and joy) such a pitifull mourning, and mingling of forowes and lamentations of death, amongst such songs of triumph and victory. Notwithstanding this, Æmylius taking things like a wise man, thought that he was not only to vse constancy and magnanimity, against the sword and pike of the enemy but alike fortisade alloagainst all aduersity and enmity of spiteful fortune. So, he wisely weyed and considered his inhit great present misfortune, with his former prosperitie and finding his misfortune counterpoised with felicity, and his private griefes cut off with common toy, he gave no place to his forowes & milthances, neither blemished any way the dignity of his triumph & victory. For when he had buriedthe eldest of his two last sons, he left not to make his triuphant entry, as you have heard before. And his fecond fon also being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to asset being deceased by the people to asset by the people the people to asset by the people to asset b &inface of the whole city he made an oration, not like a discomforted man, but like one rather appropries that did comfort his forowfull countrimen for his mischance. He told them, that concerning for the desphose his being being being the desphose his mens matters, neuer any thing did feare him: but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, mistrusting her change and inconstancy, and specially in the last war, doubting for so great prosperity as could be wished, to be payed home with an after intollerable aduersitie & sinister chace. For as I went (faid he) I passed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatick sea, from BRINDES vnto Corry in oneday; and from thence in fine dayes after, I arrived in the city of DELPHES, where I did " Serifice vnto Apollo. And within fluc other dayes, I arrived in my campe, where I found mine army in MACEDON. And after I had done the facrifice, and due ceremonies for purifying of the ame, I presently began to follow the purpose and cause of my coming: so as in fifteene dayes " after I made an honorable end of all those wars. But yet, mistrusting fortune alwaies, seeing the prosperous course of my affaires, & considering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers needed to feare. I feared forcly she would change at my return, when I should be vpon the sea, bringing home so goodly and victorious an army, with so many spoiles, and so many Princes 69 and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was fafely arrived in the hauen, & seeing all the city at my returne full of ioy, and of feast and facrifices: I still suspected fortune, knowing her maner well inough, that she vieth not to gratifie men so franckly, nor to grant the so great things clear. ly, without some certaine sparke of enuy waiting on them. Neither did my mind being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the common-wealth, shake off this feare behind me but that I saw, this home missiap and miserie lighted vpon me, enforcing me with mine owne hands in these holy dayes of my triumph, to bury my two yong sone after another, which I only brought vp with me, for the fuccession of my name and house. Wherefore me thinks now I may fay, I am out of all danger, at the least touching my chiefest and greatest missortune; and do begin to stablish my selfe with this assured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with vs euermore, without feare of other valucky or finister chance. For she hath sufficiet ly counteruailed the fauorable victory she gaue you, with the enuious mishap wher with she hath plagued both me and mine: shewing the conquerer and triumpher, as noble an example of mans mifery and weakeneffe, as the party conquered, that had bene led intrium ph: fauing that Perfeu yet conquered as he is, hath this comfort left him, to see his children liuing, & that the conque. rour, Amylius hath loft his. And this was the fumme of Amylius notable oration he made vnto the people of Rome, proceeding of a noble & honourable disposed mind. And though it pitied him in his heart to fee the strange chance of king Perseus fortune, and that he heartily defired to helpe him, and to do him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but onely tore moue him from the common prison (which the Romains call Carcer) into a more cleanly and fweeter house: where being straightly garded and looked vnto, he killed himselse by abstinence from meate, asthe most part of historiographers do write. Yet some writers tell a maruellous strange tale, and manner of his death. For they say the souldiers that garded him, kept him from sleepe, watching him straightly when sleepe tooke him, and would not suffer him to shut hiseye lids (only vpon malice they did beare him, because they could not otherwise hurt him) keeping him awake by force, not fuffering him to take rest: vntil such time as nature being forced to give ouer, he gauc vp the ghost. Two of his sons died also: but the third called Alexander, becamean excellent turner and joyner, and was learned, and could speake the Romain B tongue very wel, and did write it so trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magistrates of Rome, & did wifely & discreetly behaue himself in his office. Furthermore, they do adde to this goodly conquest of the realme of MACEDON, that Æmylius conquered another speciall good thing, that made him maruelloufly well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought so much gold and filuer vnto the treasury store of Rome, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yeare that Hircius and Pansa were Consuls, which was about the beginning of the first wars of Augustus and Antonius. And yet Amylius had one fingular good gift in him: that though the people did greatly loue & honor him, yet he euer tooke part with the Senate and nobility, and did neuer by word nor deed any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or please them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he did euer leanen the nobility & good men. And this did Appins afterwards cast in his sons teeth, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefest men of their time, and contending together for the office of Cenfor: Appius had about him to favor his fuite, all the Senate and Nobilitic, as of an cienttime the family of the Appians had ever held on their part, And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himselfe, yet he was at all times fauored and beloued of the common people. Wherupon when Appius saw him come into the market place, followed with men of small quality and base condition, that had bene slaues before, but otherwise could skillfully handle such practifes, bring the people together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voices (if need were) obtaine what they would in the assemblies of the citie: he spake out aloud and said: O Paulus Amylius, now hast thougood cause to sigh & mourn in thy grave where thou liest (if the dead do know what we do here on earth to see Amylins a common sergeant, and Licinius a pratting fellow, how they bring thy fon vnto the dignity of a Cenfor. And as for Scipio, he was alwayes beloued of the common people, because he did fauour them in all things. But Amylius also, although he tooke euer the noble mens part, he was not therefore lesse beloued of the common people, then those that alwaies flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to please them: which the common people did witnesse, as well by other honors and offices they offered him, as in the dignity of the Cesor which they gaue him. For it was the holiest office of alother at that time, and of greatest power and authority, specially for inquiry and reformation of every manslife and maners. For he that was Cenfor, had authority to put any Senator off the councel, The office and so disgrade him, if he did not worthily behave him; else according to his place and calling: and authoand might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and rive of the Great for the place again. Moreover they might by their authorize take from liverpious years. fittest for the place againe. Moreoner, they might by their authority, take from licentious yong men, their horse which was kept at the charge of the common-weale. Farthermore, they be the feffours of the people, and the mufter-maifters, keeping books of the number of persons at every mustering. So there appeared numbred in the register booke Amilias made then of them, three hundred seuen and thirty thousand, foure hundred and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Amylim Lepidus named president of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and did put off the councell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane & moderation he and his companion Martius Philippus kept, upon view and muster taken of the Romaine horfmen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his charge and office, he fell ficke of a disease that at the beginning seemed very dangerous, but in the end there was no other #miling danger, fauing that it was a lingring disease, and hard to care. So, following the counsell of phyfitions, who willed him to go to a city in ITALY called VELIA, he took fea and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleasant houses vponthe sea side, quietly and out of all fom Rome, noise. But during this time of his absence, the Romaine's wished for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to fee the playes and sports, they cried out diverse times for him: whereby they shewed that they had a great defire to see him againe. Time being come about when they vied to make a folemne yearly facrifice, and Æmilius ending himselfallo in very good perfect health:he returned agains to Rome, where he made sacrifice with the other priests, all the people of Rome gathered about him, reioycing much to feehim. The next day after, he made another particular facrifice, to give thankes vnto the gods for recouery of his health. After the facrifice was ended, he went home to his house, and sate him downe to dinner: he fuddenly fell into a raping (without any perfeuerance of ficknesse The death fpied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went from him, in such fort, that he died within three daies after lacking no necessity thing there are comblet and will be in Rome. that he died within three daies after, lacking no necessary thing that an earthly man could have, to make him happy in this world. For he was even honoured at his funerals, and his vertue was Amilios adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither of gold, filuer, nor inorie, nor with fine als. other such sumptuousnesse or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and goodwill of the people, all of them confessing his vertue and well doing and this did not only his naturall countrimen performe in memory of him, but his very enemies also. For all those that met in Rom B by chance at that time, that were either come out of Spaine, from Genva, or out of Macenon, all those that were young and strong, did willingly put themselues vnder the coffin where his body lay, to helpe to carry him: and the old men followed his body to accompany the same, calling Amilius the benefactor, sauiour, and father of their countrey. For he did not onely intreat them gently, and graciously, whom he had subdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleasure them; and to set forwards their causes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neare kinfmen. The inventory of all his goods after his death, did Amilian frant amount vnto the fumme of three hundred, threefcore, and ten thousand filuer Drachmas, which his two somes did inherit. But Science he wonger left all his right ware they came which his two sonnes did inherit. But Scipio being the yonger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, because he was adopted into a very rich house, which was the house of the Great Scipio Africanus,

THE LIFE OF Timoleon.

The flate of the Sy. racufans. before Timol:on: cŏ

EFORE Timoleon was sent into Sicile, thus stood the state of the Syracysans. After that Dion had driven out the tyrant Dionyling he himselfe after was slaine immediatly by treason and those that aided him to restore the Syracvsans to their liberty, fell out, and wereat diffention among themselues. By reason whereof, the city of Syracvsa changing continually new tyrants, was fo troubled and turmoiled with all forts of euils, that it was left in manner defolate, and with out inhabitants. The rest of Sicile in like case was vtterly destroyed, and no cities in manner left standing, by reason of the long warres; and those few that remained, were most inhabited of forreine souldiers and strangers, (a company of loose mengathered together that tooke pay of no Prince nor city all the dominions of the same being casily vsurped, and as easie to change their Lord. Insomuch, Dionysius the tyrant, ten years after Dion had driven him out of Sicile, having gathered a certaine number of fouldiers togetheragaine, and through their helpe driven out Nifeus, that reigned at that time in Syracvsa: he recourred the Realmeagaine, and made himselfe king. So, if he was strangely expulsed by a finall power out of the greatest kingdome that ever was in the world:likewise he more strangely recoucred it againe, being banished and very poore, making himselfe king ouer them, who before haddriuen him out. Thus were the inhabitants of the city compelled to ferue this tyrant: who befides that of his own nature was neither courteous nor civill, he was now growne to be fare more dogged and cruell, by reason of the extreme misery and misfortune he had endured. But the nobleff citizens repaired into Icetes, who at that time as Lord ruled the city of the LEONTI-MES, and they chose him for their Generall in these warres not for that he was any thing better then the open tyrants, but because they had no other to repaire vnto at that time: and they trusted him best, for that he was borne (as themselves) within the city of Syraevsa, and because allo he had men of war about him to make head against the tyrant. But in the meane time, the Can-THAGINIANS came downeinto Sicile with a greatermy, and inuaded the country. The Syracysans being affraid of them, determined to fend ambaffadours into Grece vinto the CORINTHIANS, to pray aid of them against the barbarous people, having better hope of them, then of any other of the Grecians. And that not altogether because they were lineally descended from them, and that they had received in times past many pleasures at their hands: but also for that they knew that Corinth was a city, that in all ages and times did euer love liberty and hate tyrants, and that had alwayes made their greatest warres, not for ambition of kingdomes, nor of couetous defires to conquer and rule, but onely to defend and maintaine the liberty of the GRECIANS. But Icetes in another contrary fort, tooke ypon him to be Generall, withamind to make himselfeking of Syracvsa. For he hadsecretly practifed with the Car-THAGINIAN S, and openly notwithflanding, in words he commended the counsel and determination of the Syracysans, and sent ambassadors from himself also with theirs, vnto Pelopon-NESYS: not that he was defirous any ayd should come from them to Syracysa, but because he hoped if the CORINTHIAN'S refused to send them aid (as it was very likely they would, for the wars and troubles that were in GRECE) that he might more cafily turn all ouer to the CARTHA-GINIANS, and viethem as his friends, to aid him against the Syracvsans, or the tyrant Dionyfins. And that this was his full purpose and intent, it appeared plainely soone after. Now when their ambassadors arrived at Coningen, and had delivered their message, the Coningen and sa who had ever bene carefull to defend such cities as had sought vnto them, and specially Syracvsawery willingly determined in councell to fend them aid, and the rather for that they were in good peace atthat time, having wars with none of the GRECIANS. So their only flay rested ypon chusing of a Generall to lead their army. Now as the magistrats and gouernors of the city werenaming fuch citizens, as willingly offered their feruice, defirous to aduance the selues, there ftept vpa meane commoner who named Timeleon, Timodemus fon, a manthat vntil that time was neuer called on for feruice, neither looked for any fuch preferment. And truly it is to be thought wite fiit was the fecret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane comoner to name moleon Timoleon whose election fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valiantnesse and vertues maruellous good fuccesse in al his doings afterwards. This Timoleon was born of noble parents both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was pareninge naturally inclined to loue his country and common-weale: and was alwayes gentle and courteousto all men, fauing that he mortally hated tyrants and wicked men. Furthermore nature had mer. framed his body apt for warres and for paines he was wife in his greenest youth, in all things he tooke in hand, and in his age he shewed himselfe very valiant. He had an elder brother called Ti. Timort anest mophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition; for he was a rash hare-braind man, and had trother, agreedy defire to reigne, being put into his head by a company of meane men, that bare him in what his hand they were his friends, and by certaine fouldiers gathered together, which he had alwayes about him. And because he was very hot and forward in wars, his citizens tooke him for a notable captaine, and a man of good service, and therefore oftentimes they gave him charge of men. And therein Timoleon did helpe him much to hide the faults he committed, or at the least made the seeme lesse, & lighter then they were, still increasing that finall good gift that nature brought forthin him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had against the ARGIVES and the CLEONEI-ANS, Timoleon served as a private souldier amongst the sootmen and Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horsmen, was in great danger to be cast away, if present help had not bin. For his herse being hurt, threw him on the ground in the midst of his encuies: wherupon part of those that were about him, were afraid and dispersed themselves here and there; and those that remained with him, being few in number, and having many enemies to fight withall, did hardly withftand their force & charge. But his brother Timoleon feeing him in fuch instat danger afar off, ran with all freed possible to believe him and their force & charge. But his brother Timoleon feeing him in fuch instat danger afar off, ran buthers with all speed possible to helpe him, and clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that use lay on the ground, receiuing many wounds on his body with fword and arrowes, with great difficulty he repulsed the enemies, & saued his own & his brothers life. Now the CORINTHIANS total enfearing the like matter to come that before had happened vnto the, which was, to lose their city through default of their friends help, they refolued in councel, to entertaine in pay continually 400 foldiers that were strangers, whom they affigned ouer to Timophanes charge: who, abandoning al honesty & regard of the trust reposed in him, did presently practise al the waies he could them to to make himselfe Lord of the city: and having put diverse of the chiefest citizens to death without order of law, in v end he openly proclaimed himself king. Timoleon being very fory for this and taking his brothers wickednes would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction, fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction, fought true with him with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction, fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction, fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction, fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high-way to his fall & destruction fought true with all the cood would be the very high with a little with all the cood would be the very high with a little with a little with a little with a little with a first to win him with all the good words and perswasions he could, to leave his ambitious defire to reigne, and to seeke to salue (as neare as might be) his hard dealing with the citizens. of the king-

Timophanes fet light by his brothers perswasions, and would give no eare vnto them. Therupon Timoleon then went vnto one, Afchilus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a fouthfayer (as Theopompus the historiographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him, or thagoras) with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three coming to him, instantly befought him to beleeue good counfell, and to leaue the kingdome. Timephanes at the first did but laugh them to scorne, and sported at their perswasions; but afterwards he waxed hot, and grew into great choler with them. Timoleon feeing that, went a litle afide, and couering his face fel a weeping: & in the meane leafon, the other two drawing out their fwords, flue Time. phanes in the place. This murther was ftraight blown abroad through the city, & the better fort did greatly commend the noble mind and hate Timoleon bare against the tyrant: considering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kin, did not with francing regard the benefit of his country, before the naturall affection of his brother, & preferred duty and justice, before nature and kinred. For before he had faued his brothers life, fighting for the defence of his country, & now in feeking to make himfelfe king and to rule the fame, he made him to be flaine. Such then as misliked popular government and liberty, and alwaies followed the nobility, they fet a good face on the matter, as though they had bin glad of the tyrants death; yet ftill reproning Timolean for the horrible murther he had committed against his brother, declaring how detestable it was both to the gods & men, they fo handled him, that it grieved him to the hart he had done it, But when it was told him that his mother tooke it maruellous ill, and that the pronounced horrible curfes against him, and gaue out terrible words of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort herhowbeir the could never abide to fee him, but alwaics flut her doore against him. The he being wounded to the hart with forow took a conceit fodainly to kil himfelf by abstaining from care but his friends would never for fake him in this despaire, and vrged him so far by intreaty & perfive fron, that they copelled him to eat. The rupon he refolued thenceforth to give him felfouer to a folitary life in the country, feeluding himfelf from all company and dealings: so as at the beginning, he did not only refuse to repaire vnto the city, and all accesse of company, but wandring vp and downe in most folicary places, consumed himselfe and his time with melancholy. And thus we fee, that counfels & judgments are lightly caried away (by praife or differalfe) if they be nor shored up with rule of reason & philosophy, & rest confounded in themselves. And therefore it is very requifite and necessary, that not only the act be good and honest of it selfe, but that the refolution therof be also constant, and not subject vnto change to the end we may do all thines conderatly left we be like vnto lickerous mouthed men, who as they defire meats with a greedy appetite, and after are foone weary, difliking the fame; even fo do we fodainly repent our actions grounded upon a weak imagination of the honesty that moued vs therunto. For repentance ma. keth the act naught which before was good. But determination, grounded upon certaine knowledge and truth of reason, doth neuer change, although the matter enterprised, have not always happy fuccesse. And therefore Phocion the ATHENIAN having refisted (as much as in him lay) certaine things which the Generall Leofthenes did, and which contrary to his mind tooke good effect: and perceiving the ATHENIANS did open facrifice vnto the gods, to give them thanks for the fame, and much rejoyce at the victory they had obtained: I would have rejoyced too (faid he) if I had done this; but so would I not for any thing, but I had given the counsell. And after that fort, but more sharply did Aristides Lock IAN (a very friend and companion of Platoes) answer Dionylius the elder tyrant of Syracy sa: who asked his goodwill to mary one of his daughters. I had rather fee my daughter dead (faid he) then maried vnto a tyrant. And within a certaine time after the tyrant put all his fonnes to death: and then he asked him in derifion to grieve him the more. If he were still of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very fory (faid he) with all my heart for that which thou hast done: but yet I do not repent me of that I have faid. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne a gaine vnto Timoleon. Whether that inward forow ftrucke him to the heart for the death of his brother Timophanes, or that shame did so abash him, as he durst not abide his mother, twenty yeares after he did neuer any notable or famous act. And therefore, when he was named to be Generall of the aidthat should be sent into Szerze, the people having willingly chosen and accepted of him: Televildes, who was chiefe gouernour at that time in the city of CORINTH, chosen Ge frankling upon his feet before the people, spake unto Timoleon, and didexhort him to behaue himselfe like an honest man, and valiant captaine in this charge. For said he, if that you handle vour selfe well, we will think you have killed a tyrant but if you order your self otherwise then wel. we will judge you haue killed your brother. Now Timoleon being buffe in leauying of men. and preparing himselfe, letters came to the Corinthians from Icetes, wherby plainly appeared that Icetes had caried two faces in one hood, & that he was become a traytor. For he had no fooner dispatched his ambassadors vnto them, but he straight took the Carthaginians part, of the Lesso. and dealt openly for them, intending to drive out Dionyfins, and to make himself king of Syra- time a CVSA. But fearing lest the CORINTHIANS would fend aid before he had wrought his feate, he wrote againe vnto the Corinthians, sending them word, that they should not need now to put themselves to any charge or danger for coming into Sicila, and specially, because the CARTHAGINIANS were very angry, and did also lye in waite in the way as they should come, with a great fleet of ships to meete with their army: and that for himselfe, because he saw they taried long, he had made league and amity with them, against the tyrant Dionysius. When they had read his letters, if any of the Corinthians were before but coldly affected to this journy, choler did then fo warm the against Icetes, that they frankly granted Timoleon what he wold ask, and did helpe to furnish him to set him out. When the ships were ready rigged, and that the souldiers were furnished of all things necessary for their departure, the Nuns of the goddesse Proferpina, faid they faw a vision in their dreame, and that the goddesses Ceres and Proferpina did appeare vnto them, apparelled like trancllers to take a journey; and told them, that they would go with Timoleon into Sicile. Vpon this speech only, the Corinthians rigged agalley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proferpina: and Timoleon himselfe before he would take the feas, went into v city of DELPHES, where he made facrifice vnto Apollo, And as he entred within the Sanctuarie where the answers of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull figure vnto him. For amongst the vowes and offerings that are hanged up upon the wals of the Sanctuary, pend to there fell a band directly vpon Timoleons head, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: Timoleon, so that it seemed Apollo sent him already crowned, before he had set out one foot towards the iourney. He tooke ship, and sailed with seuen galleyes of Corinth, two of Corphy E, and ten Timoleon the Leveadians did fet out. When he was launced out in the maine sea, having a franke gale tooke stop took stop to the launced out in the maine sea, having a franke gale of wind and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the same towards there came a maruellous great bright light ouer his ship, & it was much like to a torch burning, & burning when they shew the ceremonies of the holy mysteries. This torch did accompany and guide torch apthem all their voyage, and in the end it vanished away, and seemed to fal down vpon the coast of the element the start of ITALY, where the ship-maisters had determined to arrive. The wise mens opinions being asked 2010 Times what this might fignifie: they answered: That this wonderfull fight did betoken the dreame, lean. the Nunnes of the goddeffe Geres dreamed, and that the goddeffes fauouring his iourney, had shewed them the way, by sending of this light from heaven: because that the Ile of Sicile is confecrated vnto the goddeffe Proferpina; and specially for that they report her rauishment was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was affigned vnto her for her jointer, at the day of her mariage. Thus did this celestiall signe of the gods both incourage those that went this journy, and deliuer them also affured hope, who failed with all speed possible they could, vntill such time as having croffed the feas, they arrived upon the coast of ITALY. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderstood from Sicile put Timoleon in great perplexity, and did maruellously discourage the fouldiers he brought with him: for Icetes having overthrowne the battell of the tyrant Dionysius, and possessed the greatest part of the city of Syracusa, hedid besiege him within the castle, and within that part of the city which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and inclosed him in with walles round about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in Sicile, to the end that by preuenting that ayde, they might eafily divide Sicile between them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his request, sent twenty of their galleyes vnto Rhegio, amongst which Icetes Ambassadours were sent vnto Timoleon, with testimony of his doings: for they were faire stattering words to cloke his wicked intent he purposed. Forthey willed Timoleon that he should go himselfe alone (if he thought good) vnto leetes, to counfell him, and to accompany him in all his doings, which were now so farre onwards in good towardnesse, as he had almost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also bassadeurs perswade him, that he should send backe his ships and souldiers to Corinth, againe, considering that the should send backe his ships and souldiers to Corinth, againe, considering that the should be should b dering that the warre was now brought to good passe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS Would in no case that his men should passe into Sicilia, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the Corinthians at their arrival linto the city of RHEGIO, finding there these ambassadours, and seeing the sleete of the CARTHAGINIANS thips, which did ride at anker not farre off from them: it spited them on the one side, to see they were thus mocked and abused by Icetes. For every one of them were maruellous angry with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore Sicilians, whom too plainly they faw left a prey vnto Icetes for reward of his treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompense of the tyrannie which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other side they thought it impos fible to conquer the ships of the CARTHAGINIANS, which did lye in waite for them, and so neare vnto them, confidering they were twice as many in number as they and as hard for them to subdue the army also that was in the hands of Icetes in Sicile, considering that they were not come to him, but onely for the maintenance of the warres. Notwithstanding Timoleon spake very courteously vnto those Ambassadours, and Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS thips, letting them understand that he would do as much as they would have him: and to fav truly, if he would have done otherwise, he could have wonne nothing by it. Nevertheless. he defired for his discharge, they would say that openly, in the presence of the people of R_{HE}. GIO (being a city of GRECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had spokento him in fecret: and that done, he would depart incontinently, alledging that it flood him year much vpon for the fafety of his discharge, and that they themselves also should more faithfully keep that they had promifed vnto him touching the Syracysan's when they had agreed you it and promifed it before all the people of RHEGIO, who should be witnesse of it. Now all this was but a fetch and policy deliuered by him, to shadow his departure, which the captaines and governours of RHEGIO did fauour, and feeme to helpe him in: because they wished Signif should fall into the hands of the Corinthians, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cause they commanded a generall assembly of all the people, during which time, they caused the gates of the city to be shut: giving it out, that it was because the citizens should not go about any other matters in the meane time. The when all the people were affembled, they began to make long orations without concluding any matter; the one leauing alwayes to the other alike matter to talke of to the end they might win time, vntill thegalleys of the Corinthians were departed. And flaying the Carthagintans also inthis affembly, they mistrusted nothing, because they saw Timoleon present: who made a countenance, as though he would rife to fay fomething. But in the meane time, fome one did fecretly advertise Timoleon, that the other galleys were under faile and gone away, and that there was but one gally left which taried for him in the hauen. Therupon he suddenly stole away through the preaffe, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chaire where the orations were made and trudging quickly to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hoifed faile alfo. And landeth at When he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all fafe together to land at the city of TAVROME. NICH, which is in SICILE: there they were very well received by Andromachus, who long time before had fint for them, for he gouerned this city as if he had bin Lord therof. He was the che thefafather of Timeus the Historiographer, and honestest man of all those that did beare rule at that time in Sicile. For he did rule his citizens in all inflice and equity, and did alwayes flow himselfe an open enemic to tyrants. And following his affection therein, he lent his city at h: "eriograthat time vnto Timeleen, to gather people together, and perswaded his citizens to enter into league with the Corinthians, and to aide them, to deliver Sielle from bondage, andto refrore it against oliberty. But the captaines of the Carthaginians that were in Rhegio, when they knew that Timoleon was vnder faile and gone, after that the affembly of the council was broken vp, they were ready to cate their fingers for spite to see themselues thus finely mocked and deceived. The RHEGIANS on the other fide, were merry at the matter, to fee how the shreaten to PHOENICIANS stormedatit, that they had such a fine part played them. Howbeit in the end, defiror the city of Tau. they determined to fend an Ambassadour vnto TAVROMENION, in one of their galleys. This Ambassadour spake very boldly and barbarously vnto Andromachus, and in a choler: and last of all, he shewed him first the palme of his hand, then the backe of his hand, and did threaten him that his citie should be soturned over hand, if he did not quickly fend away the Corin-THIANS. Andromachus fell a laughing at him, and did turne his hand vp and downe as the Ambassadour had done, and commanded him that he should get him going, and that withall freed out of his city, if he would not fee the keele of his galley turned vpward. Icetes now vnderstanding of Timoleons coming, and being affraid, sent for a great number of galleyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS began to despaire veterly when they saw their hanen full of the CARTHAGINIANS galleys, the best part of their city kept by Icetes, and the castle by the tyrant Dionysius. And on the other side, that Timoleon was not yet come but to alittlecorner of Sicile, having no more but the litle citie of Tavromenion, with a finall power, and lesse hope: because there was not aboue a thousand footmen in all, to furnish these warres, neither prouision of victuals, nor so much money as would serue to entertaine and pay them. Besides also, that the other cities of Sicila did nothing trust him. But by reason of the violent extentions they had of late fuffered, they hated all captaines and leaders of men of warre to the death, and specially for the treachery of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACED EMONIAN. Both of them faid they came to fet SI-CILE at liberty, and to drive out the tyrants; and yet neuertheleffe, they had done so much hurt vnto the poore Sicilians, that the misery and calamity which they had suffered vnder the tyrants, seemed all to be gold vnto them, in respect of that which these captaines had made them to abide. And they did thinkethem more happy, that had willingly submitted themselves vnto the yoke of scruitude: then those which they saw restored and set at liberty. Thereforeperfivading themselves, that this Corinthian would be no better vnto them, then the other had bene before, but supposing they were the self same former crafts, and alluring baits of good hope & faire words, which they had tafted of before, to draw them to accept new tyrants: they did fore suspect it, and reject all the Corinthian's perswassons. Sauing the Adrant - The god rans only, whose litle city being consecrated to the god Adranus (and greatly honoured and renerenced through all Sicile) was then in diffention one against another: in so much as one part of them tooke part with Icetes, and the Carthaginians, and the other fent vnto Timoleon. So it fortuned that both the one and the other, making all the possible speed they could, who should come first, arrived both in maner at one selfe time. Icetes had about five thoufand fouldiers. Timoleon had not in all aboue twelve hundred men, with which he departed to go towards the city of Adranvs distant from Tavromenion, about three hundred and forty furlongs. For the first dayes iourny he went no great way, but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very hastily, and had maruellous ill way. When night was come, and daylight shut in, he had newes that Icetes did but newly arrive before Adranvs, where he encamped. When the private captaines understood this, they caused the voward to stay to eate and reposea little, that they might be the lustier, and the stronger to fight. But Timoleon did set still forwards, and prayed them not to stay, but to go on with all the speed they could possible, that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they should) being but newly ariued and troubled with making their cabbons, and preparing for supper. Therewith as he spakethese words, he tooke his target on his arme, and marched himselfethe formost man, as brauely and couragiously as if he had gone to a most assured victory. The fouldiers seeing him march with that life, they followed at his heels with like courage. So they had not passing thirty furlongs to Timber go, which when they had our come, they ftraight fet vpon their enemies, whom they found all fetter army out of order, and beganne to flie, so soone as they saw they were you their backes before they were aware. By this meanes there were not about three hundred men flaine, and twife as many bin fla more taken prisoners, and so their whole camp was possessed. Then the Adranitans opening dramm. their gates, yeelded vnto Timoleon, declaring vnto him with great feare, and no leffe wonder, The Adrahow at the very time when he gaue charge vpon the enemies, the doores of the temple of their mianiseld god opened of themselues, and that the Iauelin which the image of their god did hold in his lion. hand, did shakeat the very end where the iron head was, and how all his face was seen to sweat. This (in my opinion) did not onely fignifie the victory he had gotten at that time, but all the notable exploits he did afterwards, vnto the which, this first encountergauea happy beginning. For immediatly after, many cities fent vnto Timoleon, to ioyne in league with him. And Mameras the tyrant of CATANA, a fouldier, and very full of money, did also seeke his friendship. Furthermore, Diony fins the tyrant of Syracvs a, being weary to follow hope any longer, and fin- tyrant of ding himselfe in maner forced vnto it by long continuance of siege, made no more reckoning of letes, when he knew that he was so shamefully ouerthrown. And contrariwise, much esteeming Timoleons valiantnesse, he sent to advertise him, that he was contented to yeeld himselfe and the castle into the hands of the Corinthians. Timoleon being glad of this good hap vnlooked for, sent Euclides and Telemachus, two captaines of the Corinthians, to take possession of the castle, with source hundred men, not all at a time, nor openly (for it was unpossible, the ene mics lying in waite in the hauen) but by small companies, and by stealth, he conueyed them all into the castle, so the souldiers possessed the castle, and the tyrants pallace, with all the mourables and munition of warre within the same. There were a great number of horse of service. great flore of states and weapons offensive of all forts, and engines of battery to shoot farre of and fundry other weapons of defence, that had beneguthered together of long time, to arme threefcore and ten thousand men. Moreover, besides all this, there were two thousand souldiers. whom with all the other things rehearfed, Dionylius deliuered vp into the hands of Timoleon, and he himself, with his mony & a few of his friends, went his way by sea, Icetes not knowing it, and fo came to Timoleons campe. This was the first time that euer they faw Dionysius a private man. in base and meane estate. And yet within few dayes after, Timoleon sent him from thence vitto CORINTH in a ship, with little store of money: who was borne and brought vp in the greatest fem to co. and most famous tyranny and kingdome, conquered by force, that ever was in the world: and which himselfe had kept by the space of ten yeares after the death of his father. Since Dim draue him out, he had bene maruellously turmoiled in warres, by the space of twelve yearss: in which time, although he had done much mischiefe, yet he had suffered a great deale more. For he faw the death of his fonnes when they were men growne, and able to ferue and cary arries and ca-lamities of mour. He faw his daughters rauished by force, and defloured of their virginity. He saw his owne fifter (who was also his wife) first of all shamed, and cruelly handled in her person, with the greatest villanies and most vile parts done vnto her, that his enemies could deuise: and after wards horribly murthered with her children, and their bodies in the end throwne into these as we have more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionyfius was arrived in the city of CORINTH, enery GRECIAN was wonderfull defirous to go fee him, and to talke with him. And some went thither very glad of his ouerthrow, as if they had troden him downe with their feete, whom Fortune had ouerthrowne, fobitterly did they hate him. Other pitying him in their hearts to fee fo great a change, did behold him as it were with a certaine compassion, confidering what great power, fecret and diuine causes have over mens weaknesse and frailiv and those things that daily passe our our heads. For the world then, did never bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand fo wonderfull, as was this of Fortune: who made the world fee a man, that before was in maner Lord and King of all Sicil E, fit then commonly in the city of Corint halking with a victualler or fitting a whole day in a perfumers shop, or commonly drinking in some cellar or tauerne, or to brawle and scold in the middest of the streetes, with common whores in the face of the world, or elfe to teach common minstrels in enery lane and alley, and to dispute with them with the best reason he had, about the harmony and musickess the fongs they fang in Theaters. Now fome fay he did this, because he knew not else how he thould drive the time away, for that indeed he was of a bale mind, and an effeminate person, given over to all dishonest lusts and desires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the lesse regarded, for feare left the CORINTHIAN'S should have him in icaloussie and suspirion, imagining that he did take the change and state of his life in grieuous part, and that he should yet looke backe, hoping for a time to recouer his state againe: and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose fained many things against his nature, & seeming to be a stark idiot, to see him dothose things he did. Some not with standing have gathered together certaine of his answers, which do testifie that he did not all these things of a base brutish mind, but to fit himselfe onely to his present misery and misfortune. For when he came to Leveades, an ancient city built by the CORINTHIANS, as was also the city of Syracvs a, he told the inhabitants of the same, thathe was like to yong boyes that had done a fault: for as they flie from their fathers being ashamedto come to their fight, and are gladder to be with their brethren: even so is it with me, said he: for it would please me better to dwell here with you, then to go to Corinth our head city. Ano. ther time, being at Corinth, aftranger was very bufie with him (knowing how familiar Di enyfius was with learned men and Philosophers, while he reigned in Syracvsa) and asked him in the end in derifion; what benefit he got by Platees wildome and knowledge: he answered him againe: How thinkest thou, hath it done me no good, when thou seest me beare so patiently this change of fortune: Arifloxenus a musician, and other, asking him what offence Plate had done unto him he answered. That tyrants state is ever unfortunate, and subject to many evils: but yet The benefit no euill in their state was comparable to this that none of all those they take to be their most familiars, dare once tell them truly any thing; and that through their fault, he left Plates company. Another time there cometh a pleasant fellow to him, and thinking to mocke him finely, as he faterafor entred into his chamber, he shooke his gowne, as the manner is when they come toty rants, to This agreethew that they have no weapons under their gownes. But Dionysius encountred him as pleafantly faying to him: Do that when thou goest hence, to see if thou hast stolne nothing. And againe, wirds to Philip king of MACEDON, at his table one day descending into talke of songs, verse, and trage. Solen, who dies, which Dionysius his father had made, making as though he wondred at them, how possibly he could have leisure to do them: he answered him very trimly, and to good purpose: He did princes, to them euen at fuch times (quoth he) as you & I, & other great Lords whom they reckon happy, please them, are disposed to be drunk, & play the fooles. Now for Plato he neuer faw Dionysius at Cor in the never stem. But Diogenes Sinopian, the first time that euer he met with Dionysius, said vnto him: O, how vnworthy artthou of this state! Dionysius stated suddenly & replyed: Truly I thank thee (Diogenes) that thou hast compassion of my misery. Why, said Diogenes againe: dost thou think I pity thee? Alion. nay it spiteth me rather, to see such a slaue as thou (worthy to die in the wicked state of a tyrant Diogenes like thy father; to liue in fuch security and idle life, as thou leadest amongst vs. When I came to Dionses comparethese words of Diogenes, with Philistus words the historiographer, bewailing the hard the tyrans. fortune of v daughters of the Leptines, faying that they were brought fro the top of all worldly felicity, honor and goods (wherof tyrannicall state aboundeth) vnto a base, private & humble life: me thinks they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that for roweth for the loffe of her boxes of painting colours, or for her purple gowns, or for other fuch prety fine trims of gold, as women vieto weare. So, me thinks thefe things I have intermingled concerning Dionysius, are not impertinent to the description of our lives, neither are they troublesome or vnprofitable to the hearers, vnlesse they have other hasty businesse to let or trouble them. But now if the tyrant Dionylius wretched flate seeme strange, Timoleons prosperity then was no lesse wonderfull. For Timoleons within fifty daies after he had fet foot in Sicile, he had the castle of Syracus a in his possession profession. on and fent Diony sus as an exile to Corinth. This did fetthe Corinthians in such a iolitic, that they sent him a supply of 2000 footemen, and 200 horsemen, which were appointed to landin ITALY, in the country of the THURIANS. And perceiving that they could not possibly gofrom thence into Sicile, because the Carthaginians kept the seas with a great nauy of flips, and that thereby they were compelled to stay for better opportunity: in the meane time they bestowed their leisure in doing a notable good act. For the Thur in s being in wars at that time with the Brytians, they did put their city into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had bin their own natiue country. Iceses all this while did befrege the castle of Syracvsa, preuenting all he could possible, that there should come no corne by sea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the castle: and he had hired two strange souldiers, which letter birth he sent vnto the city of Adranvs, to kill Timoleon by treason, who kept no guard about his perfon, and continued amongst the Adrantians, mistrusting nothing in the world, for the trust Timoleon at and confidence he had in the fafegard of the god of the Adranians. These souldiers being fentto do this murder, were by chance informed that Timoleon should one day do facrifice vnto this god. So vponthis, they came into the temple, having daggers under their gownes, and by litle and litle thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the altar. But at the present time as one incouraged another to dispatch the matter, a third person they thought not The treasen of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his fword, that he fell to the ground. The discovered man that had hurt him thus, fled straight vponit, with his sword, drawne in his hand, and to Timoleon recouered the top of a high rocke. The other fouldier that came with him, and that was not the fouldi. hurt, got hold of a corner of the altar, and befought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would me discouer the treason pro dised against him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him . Then he told him how his companion that was flaine, and himfelfe, were both hired, and fent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him also that had taken the rocke, who cried out aloud, He had done no more then he should do: for he had killed him that had slaine his owne father before, in the city of LEONTINES. And to instificthis to be true, certaine that stood by did affirme, The wonit was so indeed. Whereat they wondred greatly to consider the maruellous working of derfull Fortune, how shedoth bring one thing to passe by meanes of another, and gathereth all things Fortune, together, how far afunder soeuer they be, and linketh them together, though they seeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no maner of likenesse or conjunction betweene them, ma king the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The Corinthians examining this matter throughly, gaue him that flue the fouldier with his fword, a crowne of the value of ten minas, because that by means of his iust anger, he had done good service to the god that had preserved Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hap did not only serve the present turne, but was to good purpose euer after. For those that saw it, were put in better hope, & had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons person, because he was a holy man, one that loued the gods, and that was purposely sent to deliuer SICILE from captivity. But Icetes having missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daily drawne to Timoleons deuotion, he was mad with himselfe, that having fo great an army of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commandement, he took but a few of them to ferue his turn, as if he had bene assumed of his fact, and had vsed their friendshin by stealth. So he sent hereupon for Magotheir Generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his request brought an huge army to fee to, of a hundred and fifty faile, which occupied and couered all the hauen:and afterwards landed threefcore thousand men, whom he lodged euery man within the city of Syracvsa. Then every man imagined the time was now come, which old menhad threatned Sicile with many years before, and that continually: that one day it should be conque red, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the wars the CARTHAGINIANS ener had before in the country of Sicile, they could never come to take the city of Syracvs Aland then through lettes treafon, who had received them, they were feene encamped there. On the other fide, the Corint Hinns that were within the castle, found themselves in great distresse, be. cause their victuals waxed scant, and the hauen was so straidly kept. Moreouer, they were driven to be armed continually to defend the wals, which the enemies battered, and affaulted in fundry places, with all kinds of engines of battery, and fundry forts of deuised instruments and inuentions to take cities: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to divide themselves into many companies. Neuertheleffe, Timoleon without, gaue them all the ayd he could possible: fen. ding them corne from CATANA, in little fisher-boats and small crayers, which got into the cassle many times, but specially in stormy and foule weather, passing by the galleys of the barbarous people, that lay feattering one from another, dispersed abroad by tempest, and great billows of the fea. But Mago and Icetes finding this, determined to go take the city of CATANA, from whence those of the castle of STRACVSA were victualed and taking with them the best souldiers of all their army, they departed from Syracusa, and failed towards Catana. Now in the meane space, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all those that were within the castle, perceiving the enemies within the city, kept but flender ward, made a sudden sallie out vpon them, and tawithin the king them ynwares, flue a great number at the first charge, and draue away the other. So by this occasion he wan a quarter of the city, which they call Acradina, and was the best part of the city, that had received leaft hurt. For the city of Syracvs a feemeth to be built of many townes iouned together. So having found there great plenty of corn, gold, & filuer, he wold not forfake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the castle: but fortifying with all diligence the copaire and precinct of the fame, & joyning it vnto the castle with certaine fortifications hebuilt vp in haft, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Icetes very neare vnto Catana, when a post ouertooke them, purposely sent from Syracvsa vnto them, who brought them newes, that the Acradina was taken. Whereat they both wondred, & returned back againe with all fpeed poffible (having failed of their purpose they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their hands. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it vnto wisdome and valiancy or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now in my opinion, is altogether to be afcribed vnto fortune. And this it is: The two thousand footmen and two hundred horsemen of the Corinthians, that remained in the city of the THURIANS, partly for feare of the galleyes of the Carthaginians, that lay in wait for them as they should passe, Hanno being their Admirall: and partly also for that the sea was very rough and high many dayes together, and was alwayes in ftorme and tempest: in the end, they ventured to go through the countrey of the BRYTIANS, and partly with their goodwill (but rather by force) they got through, and recourred the city of RHEGIO, the fea being maruellous high and rough. Hanne the Admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their passage, thought with himselse that he had deuised a maruellous fine policy, to deceive the enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumph vpon their The Braisheads, and the rewith all also made them dresse vp, and fet forth his gallies, with targets, corflets, Hanno the and brigantines after the Grecians fashion. So in this branery he returned backe againe, fai- Admiral of ling towards Syracvsa, and came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the castles side of Sy-RACVEA, with great laughing and clapping of hands, crying out aloud to them that were in the caffle, that he had ouerthrowne their aid which came from Corinth, as they thought to paffe by the coast of ITALY into Sicile; flattering himselfe, that this did much discourage those that were befreged. But whilest he sported thus with this fond deuice, the two thousand Corin-THIANS being arrived through the countrey of the BRVTIANS in thecity of RHEGIO, perccining the coast cleare, and that the passage by sea was not kept, and that the raging seas were by miracle(as it were) made of purpose calme for them: they tooke sea foorthwith in such fisherboates and paffengers as they found ready, in the which they went into Sicile, in fuch good fifety, as they drew their horse (holding them by the raines) alongst their boats with them. When they were all passed ouer, Timoleon having received them, went immediatly to take Messina, & marching thence in battell ray, tooke his way towards Syracvsa, trufting better tohis good fortune, then to his force he had: for his whole number in all were not about foure thouland fighting men. Notwithstanding Mago hearing of his coming, quaked for feare, and doubted the moreypon this occasion: About Syracvs a are certain marishes, that receive great quantity of fiveet fresh water, as well of fountaines and springs, as also of litle runnings, brooks, likes, and rivers, which runne that wayes towards the fea: and therefore there are great store of eeles in that place, and the fifthing is great there at all times, but specially for such as delight to take celes. Whereupon the GRECIANS that tooke pay on both fides, when they had leifure, and that all was quiet betweene them, they intended fifting. Now, they being all countrymen, and of one language, had no private quarrell one with another: but when time was to fight, they didtheir duties, and in time of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with another, and specially when they were busic fishing for celes: faying, that they maruelled at the fituation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they flood fo pleasantly and commodious vpon the sea fide. So one of the fouldiers that served vnder the Corinthians chanedto say vnto them: Is it possible that you that be GRECIANS borne, and have so goodly a diy of your owne, and full of formany goodly commodities: that ye will give it vp vnto thefe barbarous people, the Carthaginians, and most cruell murderers of the world? where you hould rather wishthat there were many Sicile's betwixt them and Grece. Haueye so litle confideration or judgement to thinke, that they have affembled an army out of all Africk E, vnto Hercules pillars, and to the fea ATLANTICKE, to come hither to fight to stablish leetes tyranny: who, if he had benea wife and skilfull captaine, would not have cast out his ancestours and founders, to bring into his country the ancient enemies of the fame: but might have receiued fach honor and authority of the Corinthian's and Timoleon, as he could reasonably hane defired, and that with all their fauor and goodwill. The fouldiers that heard this tale, reported it againe in their camperinfomuch they made Mago suspect there was treason in hand, & so sought some colour to be gone. But herupon, not with standing that Icetes praied him all he could to tary, declaring vnto him how much they were stronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather prevaile by his hardinesse and good fortune, then exceed him in number of men: yethe hoifedfaile, & returned with shance inough into Africk E, letting slipthe conquest of Sicil E Magofr. cut of his hands without any fight of reason or cause stall. The next day after he was gone, Ti- sales side moleon presented battell before the city, when the GRECIANS and he vinderstood that the le vions CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they faw the hauen rid of all the ships: and then began for the state of th to iest at Magoes cowardlinesse, and in derission proclaimed in the city, that they would give him agood reward that could bring them newes, whither the army of the CARTHAGINIANS were sed. But for all this, Icetes was bent to fight, and would not leave the spoile he had gotten, but defend the quarters of the city he had possessed, at the swords point, trusting to the strength and stuation of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceiuing that, divided his army, and he with one part thereof did fet vpon that fide which was the hardest to approch, and did stand upon the riner of Anapus: then he appointed another part of his army Anapus st. to affault all at one time, the fide of Acardina, whereof Isias Corinthian had the leading, The third part of his army that came last from Corinth, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led, he appointed to affault the quarter called Epipoles. Thus, affault being given on all fides at one time, leetes bands of men were broken, & ran their way. Now that the city was thus won by affault, and come fo fuddenly to the hands of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled, it is good reason we ascribe it to the valiantnesse of the souldiers, and the captaines great wisdome. But where there was not one Corinthian flaine nor hurt in this affault, fure me thinkes herein it was onely the worke and deed of Fortune, that did fauour and protect Timeleon, to contenda. gainst his valiantnesse: to the end that those which should hereafter heare of his doings, should have more occasion to wonder at his good hap, then to praise and commend his valiantnes. For the fame of this great exploit, did in few daies not only run through all IT ALY, but also through all GRECE. In fo much as the CORINTHIANS (who could feant believe their men were paffed with fafty into Sigile yunderstood withall that they were fafely arrived there, and had gotten the victory of their enemies: so prosperous was their journy, and Fortune so speedily did fauour his noble acts. Timoleon having now the castle of Syracvs a in his hands, did not follow Dion. For he spared not the castle for the beauty and stately building thereof, but avoiding the sufficient tion that caused Dien first to be accused, and lastly to be flaine, he caused it to be proclaimed by trumpet, that any Syracys an what focuer, should come with crowes of iron and mattocks. uerthrow. to helpe to dig downe and ouerthrow the fort of the tyrants. There was not a man in all the city of Syracvsa, but went thither straight, and thought that proclamation and day to be a most [lie ef Syra_ happy beginning of the recourry of their liberry. So they did not only overthrow the caftle.bur the pallace alfo, & the tombs: and generally all that ferued in any respect for the memory of any of the tyrants. And having cleared the place in few daies, and made all plaine, Timoleon at the full of the citizens, made councell hals, and places of inflice to be built there; and did by this means made Stra stablish a free state and popular government, and did suppresse all tyrannical power. Now, when he faw he had won a city that had no inhabitants, which wars before had confumed, and feareof tyranny had emptied, so as graffe grew so high and rank in the great market place of Syraces as they grafed their horfes there and the horf-keepers lay downe by them on the graffe as they fed:and that all the cities, a few excepted, were full of red deare and wild bores, fo that mengiuen to delight in hunting, hauing leifure, might find game many times within the fuburbes and towneditches, hard by the wals: and that fuch as dwelt in castles and strong holds in the country, would not leave them, to come and dwell in cities, by reason they were all growne so flour. and did to hate and deteft affemblies of councell, orations, and order of government, where many tyrants had reigned. Timoleon thereupon feeing this defolation, and also fo few Syracy. SAN'S borne that had escaped, thought good, and all his captains to write to the Corinthians to fend people out of GRECE to inhabit the city of Syracvs a againe. For otherwise the comtrey would grow barren and unprofitable, if the ground were not plowed. Besides, that they looked also for great warres out of Africk Ebeing aductifed that the Carthaginians had hung vp the body of Magotheir Generall vpon a crosse, (who had staine himselfe for thathe could not answer the dishonor laid to his charge) and that they did leavy another great mighty army, to return again the next yeare following, to make wars in Sicili. These letters of Timo lean being brought vnto Corinth, and the ambaffadours of Syracvia, being arrived with them also, who befought the people to take care & protection oner their poore city, & that they would once againe be founders of the fame: the Corinthians did not greedily defire to be Lords of fo goodly and great a city, but first proclaimed by the trumpet in all the assemblies, so lemne feafts and common playes of GRECE, that the CORINTHIANS having destroyed thety ranny that was in the city of Syracvsa, and driven out the tyrants, did call the Syracvsas that were fugitiues out of their countrey home againe, and all other Sicilians that likedto come and dwell there, to enjoy all freedome and liberty, with promife to make just and equald uffion of the lar ds among them, the one to have as much as the other. Moreover, they fent out posts & messengers into Asia, & into all the Hands where they understood the banished Syra CVSANS remained, to perswade and intreat them to come to CORINTH, and that the Corin

at their own proper costs and charges. In recompense wherof, the city of Corinth received uery mans most noble praise and bleffing, as well for delivering Sicile in that fort from the bondage of tyrants, as also for keeping it out of the hands of the barbarous people, and restoring the naturall Syracysans and Sicilians, to their home and country againe. Nevertheleffe fuch Sicilians as repaired to Corinth vpon this proclamation (themselves being but a final number to inhabite the country) befought the Corinthians to loyne to the fome other inhabitants, aswel of Corinth it selfe, as out of the rest of Grece: the which was performed. For they gathered together about ten thousand persons, whom they shipped and sent to SyracvsA. Where there were already a great number of other come vnto Timoleon, as well out of S1- The Corincile it selfe, as out of Italy besides : so that the whole number (as Athanis writeth) came this ires to three fcore thousand persons. Amongst them he decided the whole country, and sold them being of the cities who he was a feet by the cities of the cities houses of the citie vnto the value of a thousand talents. And because he would leave the old Sy-RACVSANS ableto recouer their owne, and made the poore people by this meanes to have mo- with threeny in common, to defray the common charge of the city, as also their expences in time of wars: fore thouses or images were fould and the records him and the records h the statues or images were fould, and the people by most voices did condemne them: for they bitants. were folemnly indited, accused and arraigned, as if they had bene men aliue to be condemned. And it is reported that the SYRACVSANS did reserve the statue of Gelon, an ancient tyrant of their city, honoring his memory because of a great victory he had won of the CARTHAGINI-ANS, nerethecity of HIMERA: and condemned all the rest to be taken away out of every corner of the city, and to be fold. Thus began the city of SIRACVSA to replenish again, and by litle and litle to recouer it selfe, many people coming thither from all parts to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to fet all other cities at liberty also, &vtterly to root out all the tyrants of Sr-CILE: and to obtaine his purpose, he went to make wars with them at their owne doores. The first he went against was seetes, whom he compelled to for sake the league of the CARTHAGI-NIANS, and to promife also that he would race all the fortresses he kept, and to live like a private man within the city of the LEONTINES. Leptines in like maner, that was tyrat of the city of Ap-POLLONIA, and of many other litle villages thereabouts, when he faw himself in danger to be tyran of takenby force, did yeeld himselse: Whereupon Timoleon saued his life, and sent him vnto Co-Appellonia RINTH: thinking it honorable for his country, that the other GRECIANS should see the tyrants Timolous, of Sicil E in their chiefe city of fame, liuing meanly and poorely like banished people. When he had brought this to passe, he returned forthwith to Syracysa about the stablishment of the commonweale, affilting Cephalus and Dionysius, two notable men sent from Corinth to reformethe lawes, and to helpe them to stablish the godliest ordinances for their commonweale. And now in the meane time, because the souldiers had a mind to get something of their encmies, and to avoid idlenesse, he sent them out abroad into a country subject to the CARTHAGI-MIANS, under the charge of Dimarchue, and Demaratus: where they made many litle townes rebellagainst the barbarous people, and did not only line in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered mony together also to maintaine the wars. The CARTHAGINIANS on the other fide while they were busic about these matters, came downe into Lylibea, with an army of threefcore and ten thousand men, two hundred gallies, and a thousand other ships and vessels that caried enfignes of batterie, carts, victuals, ununition, and other necessary prouision for a campe, intending to make sporting wars no more, but at once to drive all the GRECIANS again quite out of Sicile. For indeed it was an able army to ouercome all the Sicilians, if they had bene whole of themselves, and not divided. Now they being advertised that the Sicitians had inuaded their country, they went towards them in great fury led by Astrubal and Amilear, Gene- Ibearny rals of the army. This newes was firaight brought to Syracvsa, and the inhabitants were for the carthan of the carthan that have a served to the carthan the carthan army that have a served to the carthan army that friken with feare of the report of their army: that being a maruellous great number of them ginism awithin the city, scant three thousand of them had the hearts to arme themselves, and to go to the gainst 11field with Timoleon. Now the strangers that tooke pay, were not aboue soure thousand in all: and of them, a thousand of their hearts failed, and left him in mid way, and returned home a- and Amil gaine: faying, that Tymoleon was out of his wits, and more rash then his yeeres required, to vndertake with fluethousand footmen, and a thousand horse, to go against threescore and tenne thousand men: and besides, to carie that small force he had to defend himselfe withall, eight Timoleon great dayes iourney from Syracvsa: fothat if it chanced they were compelled to fly, they were routh had no place whither they might retire themselues vnto with safetie, nor man that would take 6000 min care to burie them, when they were flaine. Neuertheleffe, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe Carthaginiofthem, before hecame to battell. Moreouer, having encouraged those that remained with mans. him, he made them march with speed towards the river of CRIMESVS, where he vnderstood he should meet with the CARTHAGINIANS. Sogetting vp vpon a litle hill, from whence he might cimpia f.

fee the campe of the enemies on the other fide: by chance certaine moiles fell vpon his army. loden with smallage. The souldiers tooke a conceit at the first vpon sight of it, and thought it was a token of ill lucke: because it is a maner we vse to hang garlands of this Herbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vse to speake, when one lyetha paffing in his bed: He lacketh but smallage: as much to fay, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw them from this foolish superstition and discourage they tooke, staid the army: & when he had vsed certaine perswasions vnto them, according to the time, his leisure, and occasion, he told them that the garland of it self came to offer them victory before hand. For, said he, the Co. RINTHIANS do crowne them that winne the Istmian games (which are celebrated in their country) with garlands of smallage. And at that time also cuen in the solemne Is MIAN games. they yied the garland of smallage for reward and token of victory: and at this present it is also. fed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp, that they have vsed branches of pine apple trees in the Ist MIAN games. When Timoleon had thus encouraged his men, as you have heard before the first of all tooke of this smallage, and made himselfe a garland, and put it on his head: and after him the Captaines and all the fouldiers also tooke of the same, and made themselues the like. The soothsayers in like maner at the very sametime, perceiued two Eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a fnake in her talens, which she pierced through and through, and the other as she slew, gaue a terrible cry. So they shewed them both vnto the fouldiers, who did then all together with one voice call vpon the gods for helpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of Sommer, and towards the latter end of May, the Sunne drawing towards the folftice of Sommer: when there arose a great mist out of the river, that covered all the fields ouer, fo as they could not fee the enemies campe, but onely heard a maruellous con. fused noise of mens voices, as it had come from a great army; and rising vp to the top of the hill, they laid their targets downe on the ground to take a litle breath; and the Sun having drawn and fucked vp all the moist vapours of the mist vnto the top of the hils, the aire began to be so thicke that the tops of the mountaines were all couered ouer with clouds; and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and faire, that they might easily fee the river of CRIMESUS, & the enemies also, how they passed it ouer in this sort. First, they had put their carts of warre foremost; which were very hotly armed & well appointed. Next vnto them there followed tenthousand footmen armed with white targets vpointheir armes; whom they feeing afar off fo well appointed, they conicctured by their stately march and goodly order, that they were the CARTHAGI-NIANS themselves, after them, divers other nations followed confusedly one with another, & so they thronged ouer with great diforder. There Timoleon confidering the river gave him oportunity to take them before they were halfe past ouer, and to set upon what number he would after he had shewed his men with his finger, how the battell of their enemies was divided in two parts by means of the river, some of them being already passed ouer, & the other to passes he comanded Demaratus with his horsemen to give a charge on the voward, to keepe them from putting themselues in order of battell. And himself coming down the hill also with all his soomen into the valley, he gaue to the SICILIANS the two wings of his battell, mingling with the fome strangers that served under him: and placed with himself in the midst, the Syracus and with all the choice and best liked strangers. So he taried not long to joyne, when he saw the small good his horsemen did. For he perceived they could not come to give a lustie charge vpó the battelof the Carthaginians, because they were paled in with these armed carts, that ran here & there before them: wherupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (vnlesse the would haue put themselues in danger to haue bin vtterly ouerthrown) & in their returnes to give venture of charge, by turns on their enemies. Wherfore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out aloud to his footmen, to follow him couragioufly, & to feare nothing. Those that heard his voice, thought it more the the voice of a man, whether the fury of his defire to fight did so frain it beyond ordinary courfe, or that fome god (as many thought it then) did firetch his voice tody out fo loud & fenfibly. His fouldiers answered him againe with the like voice: and praied him to leade the without longer delay. Then he made his horfmen vnderstand, that they shold draw on the one fide from the carts, and that they should charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the flankess and after he did fet the foremost ranke of his battell, target to target against the enemies, commanding the trumpets withall to found. Thus with great fury he went to give a charge vpon them, who valiantly received the first charge, their bodies being armed with good iron corseless their heads with faire murrions of copper, besides the great targets they had also, which did easily receive the force of their darts, and the thrust of the pike. But when they came to handle A marueltheir fwords, where agilitie was more requisite then force: a fearefull tempest of thunder, and lous tempest their fwords, where against was more require then force: a reaction tempers of thanker, and flashing lightning withall, came from the mountaines. After that came darke thicke clouds also distance, lighning, (gathered together from the top of the hils) and fell vpon the vally, where the battel was fought raise, and with a maruellous extreme shower of raine, sierce violent winds, and haile withall. All this tempeft was vpon the Grecians backs, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the raine that came full nian face. vpon them with the wind, and the lightnings fo oft flashing amongst them, that one vnderstood forgets. not another of them. Which did maruellously trouble them, and specially those that were but fresh-water souldiers, by reason of the terrible thunderclaps, and the noise the boisterous wind and haile made upon their harnefie; for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captaines. Moreouer, the dirt did as much annoy the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were not nimble in their armour, but heavily armed as we hauctold you and besides that also, when the plaites of their coates were through wet with water, they did lode and hinder them so much the more, that they could not fight with any case. This stood the GRECIANS to great purpose to throw them downe the easier. Thus when they were tumbling in the dirt with their heavie armour, vp they could rife no more. Furthermore, the river of CRIMESVS being rifen high through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of people that passed ouer it, did ouerflow the valley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was fraight all drowned ouer, and filled with many running streames, that ran ouerthwart the field, without any certaine channell. The Carthaginians being compaffed all about with thefe waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being ouercome with the forme that fill did beat vpon them, and the GRECIANS having flaine of their men at the first, onset, to the number of source hundred of their choicest men, who made the first front of their battel all the rest of their army turned their backs immediatly, & sted for life. Insomuch as some of the being followed very nere, were put to the fword in the midft of the vally:other holding one another hard by the arms together, in the midst of the river as they passed over, were caried downe the streame and drowned with the swiftnesse and violence of the river. But the greatest number thinking by footmanship to recouer the hils thereabouts, were ouertaken by them that were light armed, and put to the fword enery man. They fay, that of ten thousand which were the costs flaine in this battell, three thousand of them were naturall citizens of CARTHAGE, which was Elians. avery for rowfull and grieuous loffe to the city; for they were of the nobleft, the richeft, the lufliest and valiantest men of all Carthage. For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any formerwars at any time before, where there dyed fo many of Carthage at one field and battell, as was flaine at that present time. For before that time, they did alwayes entertaine the Fyb 1-ANS, the SPANIAR DS, and the Nomades, in all their wars: fo as when they loft any battell, the losse lighted not on them, but the strangers paid for it. The men of account also that were slain, were eafily known by their spoiles. For they that spoiled them, stood not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, because they found gold and silver enough. For the battell being won, the GRECIANS passed ouer the river, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their cariages and baggage. And as for the prisoners, the souldiers stole many of them away, and fent them going: but of them that came to light in the common division of the spoile, they were about fine thousand men, and two hundred carts of war that were taken besides. Oh, it was anoble fight to behold the tent of Timoleon the Generall, how they enuironed it all about with heapes of spoiles of cuery fort: among which there were a thousand braue corcelets gilt, and graven with maruellous curious works, and they brought thither with the also ten thousand targets. So the conquerers being but a final number, to take the spoile of a multitude that were flain they filled their purses cuen to the top. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battel, they fet up a marke or token of their victory. Then Timokon fent unto Co-RINTH, with the newes of this ouerthrow, the fairest armor that were gotten in the spoile because he would make his country & native city spoken of & commended through the world, aboue all the other cities of GRECE. For that at CORINTH only, their chiefe temples were fee forth & adorned, not with spoils of the GRECTANS, nor offerings gotten by spilling the bloud of their owne nation and countrey, (which to fay truly, are vnpleafant memories) but with the

Timoleon fuffered him to passeby, but followed him afterwards with his horsemen and lighest armed footmen. Icetes understanding that, passed oner the river called mong Timo. Now the captaines of Timoleons bands fellout maruelloufly amongst themselues, strining for honor of this service, which was cause of delaying the battell. For none would willingly come behind, but enery near

and inflice of those also, who by victory had obtained the. That is to wit, that the Coringin ANS and their captaine Timoleon (having delivered the GRECIANS dwelling in SICILF, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had given those offerings vnto the gods, to give thanks for their victory. That done, Timolean leaving the ftrangers he had in pay, in their courty subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, to spoile and destroy it, he returned with the rest of his army vnto SYRACYSA: whereat his first coming home, he banished the thousand fouldiers that had for faken him in his journey, with expresse charge that they should depart the city before Sun set, So these thousand cowardly and mutinous souldiers passed ouer into ITALY, where, vnder promise of the contrary, they were all vnfortunatly flaine by the BRV SIANS: fuch was the inflice of the gods to pay theinft reward of their treason. Afterwards, Mamereus the tyrant of CATHANA, and Icites (whether it was for the enuy they did beare to Timoleons fameus deedes, or for that they were afraid of him) perceiting tyrants could looke for no peace at his hands: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote vnto them that they should send another army and

captaine fuddenly if they would not vtterly be driven out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS

of GREGIAN fouldiers into pay, which were the first the CARTHAGINIAN'S cuer retained in their feraice: for they never gave them pay vntill that prefent time, when they thought them to

of MESSINA, having made a fecret confpiracy among themselves, did slay four hundred men vnto a place they called HIERES, there was another ambush laid for Euthimus LEVCADIAN, fo

as himselfe and all his souldiers were cut in peeces. Howbeit the losse of them made Timoleons doings notwithstanding more fortunate: for they were euen those that had forceably entredthe temple of Apollo in the citic of Delphes, with Philodemus the Phocian, and with Onomarchus, who were pertakers of their facriledge. Moreouer, they were loofe people & abicets, that were abhorred of enery body, who vagabonelike wandred vp and downe the country of PELOPON-MESVS, when Timoleon for lacke of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into Signature, they alwaies our came in all battels they fought, whilft they were in his company, But in the end, when the fury of wars was pacified, Timoleon fending them about some special feruice to the aide of some of his, they were east away euery man of them; and not all together, but at diuerstimes. So as it feemed that gods inflice, in fauour of Timoleon, did separate them from the rest, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deserts, searing lest good men should suffer hurt by punishing of the euill. And so was the grace & goodwill of the gods won-

and writings of the tyrants against them, in maruellous chill part. For Mamercus amongst other, thinking well of himfelfe, because he could make verses and tragedies, having in certaine battels gotten the better hand of the strangers which the Syracvs ans gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offered vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the temples of the gods; he

defired to leade the voward, for honour to begin the charge: so as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thrusting another to get before his companion. Wherefore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them should passe ouer first, and tooke a ring of euery one of them, and denice to cast them all within the lap of his cloke: so rolling them together, by chance he pluckt one at the draw loggether first, whereon was grauen the markes and tokens of a triumph. The yong captaines seeing that, gauea shout of ioy, and without tarying drawing of other lots, they began every man to passe the riner as quickly as they could, and fet vpo the enemies as fuddenly. But they being not able to abide their force, ran their waies, & were faine to cast their armour away to make more haste: howbeit there were a thousand of them lay dead in the field. And within few dayes after Timolean leading his army to the city of the LEONTINES, tooke Iceres aliue there, with his fon Eupo- Timoleon limite, & the Generall of his horfmen, who were deliuered into his hands by his own fouldiers. So teetes and his sonne were put to death, like traitors and tyrants: and so was Enthydemus also, polenus his who though he was a valiant fouldier, had no better mercy shewed him, then the father and the foune aline, fon, because they did burthen him with certaine iniurious words he spake against the Corinthem to them to them the Corine full state of the state of them to the them to the them to the them to them to the them to THIANS. For they say, that when the Corinthians came first out of their countrey into death Sicile, to make wars against the tyrants: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, faid amongst other things, that they should not need to be afraid, if The women of Corinth were come out of their country.

Thus we see, that men do rather suffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: and do pardon their enemies, though they reuenge by deeds, because they can do no lesse. But as for iniurous words they seeme to proceed of a deadly hate, and of a cankered malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned againe to Syracusa, the Syracusans arraigned the wives of Icetes, and his fon, and their daughters: who being arraigned, were also condemned to die by the judgement of the people. Of all the acts Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the foulest deede: are put to for if he had listed, he might have saved the poore women from death. But he passed not for them, and so less them to the wrath of the citizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the inimies that were done to Dion, after he had driven out the tyrant Dyonifius. For it was Icetes that Theories caused Areie, the wife of Dion, to be cast into the sea, his fifter Aristomache, and his sonnethat of Levis to was yet a fuckling child, as we have written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he or, and his. went to CATANA against Mamercus, who taried for him by the river ABOLVS, where Mamer- Mamercus ess was overthrowne in battell, and about two thousand men flaine, the greatest part whereof bastell. were the CARTHAGINIANS, whom Gifco had fent for his reliefe. Afterwards he granted peace Abolu B. to the Carthaginians, vpon earnest suite made to him, with condition, that they should Timoteon keepe on the other side of the river of Lyevs, and that it should be lawfull for any of the inhabitants therethat would to come and dwell in the teritorie of the Syracysans, and to bring a- the Carthaway with them their goods, their wines and their children; and furthermore, that from thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS should renounce all league, confederacy, and alliance with the tyrants. Whereupon Mamereus having no hope of good successe in his doing, he would go into ITALY, to ftir vpthe Ly CANIAN's against Timoleon and the Synacysan's. But they that were in his company, returned back againe with their gallies in the mid way; and when they were returned into Sicile, they delivered up the city of CATANA into the hands of Timoleon, to as Ma- catana mercus was constrained to saue himself, and to slie into Messina, to Hippon the tyrant thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and befreged the city both by fea and by land. Whereat Hippon quaked for feare, and thought to flie by taking ship, but he was taken starting. And the MESSINI- Hypon the Ans having him in their hands, made all the children come from the schoole to the Theater, tyrone of Million. to see one of the good liest fights that they could denise to wit, to see the tyrant punished, who Hippon put was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamerous, he did yeeld himselfe "death. vnto Timoleon, to be judged by the Syracysans, fo that Timoleon might not be his accuser. So he was brought vnto Syracvsa, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But seeing that the people cryed out and made a great noise, because they would not heare him, and that there was no likelihood they would pardon him: he ranne ouerthwart the Theater, and knocked his head as hard as he could drive, vpon one of the degrees whereon they fate there to feetheir fports, thinking to have dashed out his braines, and haue ridde himselfe sodainly out of his paine. But he was not happy to die so, Mimerous for he wastaken straight being yet aliue, and put to death as theeues and murtherers are. Thus the sprant did Timelean roote all tyrants out of Sicil B, and made an end of all warres there. And whereas he found the whole Ile, wilde, fauage, and hated of the natural country men and inhabitants of the fame, for the extreme calamities and miferies they fuffered, he brought it to be fo civill, and fo much defired of ftrangers, that they came far & neare to dwell there, where the naturall inhabitants of the country selfe before, were glad to fly and for sake it. For Agricinty M, and Gr. LA, two great cities, did witnesse this, which after the wars of the ATHENIANS, had bin vtterly for faken and destroyed by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe: the one. by Merellus and Pheristus, two captaines that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the Ile of CEO. And as necre as they could, they gathered again together the first ancient citizens and inhabitants of the fame: whom Timoleon did not onely affure of peace and fafety to live there, to fettle them quietly together; but willingly did helpe them befides, with all other things necessary to his vitermost meane and ability, for which they loued and hononred him as their father and founder. And this his good love and favour was common alfo to all other people of Sicile whatfocuer. So that in all Sicile there was no truce taken in wars. nor lawes established, nor lands divided, nor institution of any policy or government thoush good or availeable, if Timoleons device had not bene in it, as chief directer of fuch matters; which gaue him a fingular grace to be acceptable to the gods, and generally to be beloued of all men. For in those dayes, there were other famous men in GRECE, that did maruellous great thingsa. mongst whom were these, Timotheus, Agesilaus, Palopidas, and Epaminondas: which Epaminondas Timoleon fought to follow in all things, as neare as he could, about any of them all. But in all the actions of these other great captaines, their glory was alwaies mingled with violence, paine, and labour: fo as fome of them have bene touched with reproch, and other with repentance. Where. as contrariwife, in all Timoleons doings (that only excepted which he was forced to do to his brother) there was nothing but they might with troth (as Timeus faid) proclaime the faying of Sophocles :

And like as Antimachus verles, and Dionyfius painting, both Colophonians, are full offi. newes and ftrength, and yet at this prefent we fee they are things greatly laboured and made with much paine: and that contrariwife in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verses, besides the paffing workmanship and fingular grace in them, a man findeth at the first fight, that they were eafily made, and without great paine. Euen foin like manner, who focuer will compare the painfull bloudie wars and battels of Epaminondas, and Agestlaus, with the wars of Timoleon, in the which befides equity and inflice, there is also great ease and quietnesse: he shall find, weighing things indifferetly. That they have not bin Fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble and fortunate courage. Yet he himself doth wifely impute it vnto his good hap and fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar friends at Corinth, and in someother orations he made to the people of Syracvsa, he spake it many times, that he thanked the almightie gods, that it hath pleased them to saue and deliver Sicile fro bondage by his means and service, and to give him the honour and dignity of the name. And having builded a temple in his house, he dedicated it vnto Fortune, and furthermore did consecrate his whole house vnto her. For he dwelt in a house the Syracvs ans kept for him, and gaue him in recompence of the good service he had done them in the warres, with a marvellous faire pleasant house in the countrey also, where he kept most when he was at leisure. For he neuer after returned vnto Co-RINTH againe, but fent for his wife and children to come thither, and neuer dealt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongst the GRECIANS, neither did make himselfe to be enuied of the citizens (a mischiese that most gouernours and captaines do fall into, through their violatiable defire of honour and authoritie) but lived all the rest of his life after in Significant. cing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many cities and thousands of people happy by his meanes. But because it is an ordinary matter, and of necessitie, (as Simonides saith) that not onely all larkes have a tuft vpon their heads, but also that in all cities there be accusers, where the people rule there were two of those at Syracvsa, that continually made orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphy stim, and the other Demenetus. So this Laphystim appointing Timoleon a certaine day to come and answer to his accusation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the citizens began to mutine, and would not in any case fuffer the day of adjornment to take place. But Timeleon did pacific the declaring vnto them that he had take all the extreme paines & labor he had done, & had passed so many dangers, because euery citizen & inhabitant of Synacusa, might frankly vse the liberty of their laws. And another time Dementue, in open affebly of the people, reprouing many things Timoleon did whehe was General: Timoleon answered neuer a word, but only faid vnto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had so requested of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once see the Syracvsans hauefull power and liberty to say what they would. Now Timoleo in al mens opinio, had done the noblest acts that euer GRECIAN captain did in his time, great praje and had alone deferued the fame & glory of all the noble exploits, which the rhetoricians, with all their cloquent orations perswaded the GRECIANS vnto, in the open assemblies, & common feafts and playes of GRECE, out of the which Fortune delivered him fafe and found before the trouble of the civill wars, that followed soone after and moreover he made a great proofe of his valiancy and knowledge in wars, against the barbarous people & tyrants, and had shewed himfelfalso a just & merciful man vnto all his friends, and generally to all the GRECIANS. And furthermore, seeing he won the most part of all his victories and triumphs, without the shedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of the mourned by his meanes, & also rid all Sicile of all the miseries and calamities reigning at that time, in lesse then eight yeares space the being now Timelennin grownold, his fight first beginning a litle to faile him, shortly after he lost it altogether. This hapned, not through any cause or occasion of sicknesse that came vnto him, nor that Fortune had cafually done him this iniury:but it was in my opinion, a disease inheritable to him by his parents, which by time came to lay hold on him alfo. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like cafe had also lost their sight, which by litle and litle with age, was cleane taken from them. Howbeit Athans the historiographer writeth, that during the warres he had against Mamereus & Hippon, as he was in his camp at MYLLEs, there came a white spot in his eies, that dimmed his sight somewhat: so that enery man perceined that he should lose his fight altogether. Notwithstanding that, he did not raise his siege, but continued his enterprise, vntil he tooke both the tyrants at last: and so some as he returned to Syracus againe, he did put himself out of his office of general, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather because things were brought to fo good passe, as they theselues could defire. Now that he patiently tooke this misfortune to beblind altogether, peraduenture men may somewhat maruell at it; but this much more is to be wondred at, that the Syracy sans after he was blind, did so much honour him, and acknowledge the good he had done the, that they went themselves to visite him oft, and brought strangers (that were trauellers) to his house in the city, & also in the country, to make them see their forware the benefactor, reioycing & thinking themselues happy, that he had chosen to end his life with the, Syraculaus and that for this cause he had despised the glorious returne that was prepared for him in GRECE len being forthe great and happy victories he had won in Sicile. But amongst many other things the blind. Syracv sans did, and ordained to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefestithat they made a perpetual law, so oft as they should have warres against forrein people, and Alaw made not against their owne countrymen, that they should chuse a Corinthian for their generall. to history It was a goodly thing also to see how they did honor him in the assemblies of their councel. For if any trifling matter fell in question among them, they dispatched it of themselves: but if it were athing that required great counsell and addice, they caused Timoleon to be sent for. So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the affembly of the people was, and caried in even so in his litter as he sate: and then the people did all salute him with one voice, and he them in like case. And after he had paused a while, to heare the praises and bleffings the whole affembly gaue him, they did propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he deliuered his opinion vpon the same: which being passed by the voices of the people, his seruants caried him backe againe in his litter through the Theater, and the citizens did waite on him a little way with cries of ioy, and clapping of hands: and that done, they did repaire to dif-patch common causes by themselues, as they did before. So his old age being thus entertained of Timole's.

with fuch honour, and with the loue & good will of euery man, as of a common father to them all: in the end a ficknesse tooke him by the backe, whereof he died. So the Syracysans had Timoleons accreaine time appointed them to prepare for his funerals, and their neighbours also there- formerals. abouts to come vnto it. By reason whereof his funerall was so much more honourably performedinall things, and specially for that the people appointed the noblest young gentlemen of the city to cary his coffin vpon their shoulders, richly furnished, and set forth, whereon his body lay, and so did conuey him through the place, where the palace and castle of the tyrant Dionyfins had bene, which then was razed to the ground. There accompanied his body also many thousands of people, all crowned with garlands of flowers, and apparelled in their best apparel; fo as it seemed it had bin the procession of some solemne feast, & all their words were praisings and bleffings of the dead, with teares running down their cheekes, which was a good teftimony of the entire good will and loue they did beare him, and that they did not this as men that were glad to be discharged of the honour they did him, neither for that it was so ordained but for the inth forrow and griefe they took for his death, & for very hearty good loue they did bearehim. And lastly, the coffin being put vpon the stacke of wood, where it should be burnt, Demetrius one of the heraulds that had the lowdest voice, proclaimed the decree that was ordained by the people, the effect whereof was this. The people of Syracvs a hath ordained, that this prefent body of Timoleon Corinthian, the sonne of Timodemus, should be buried at the charges of the common-weale, vnto the fumme of two hundred Minas, and harh honoured his memory with playes and games of mufick, with running of horses, & with other exercises of the body, which shall be celebrated yearely on the day of his death for enermore; and this, because he did drine thy tyrants out of Sicile, for that he ouercame the barbarous people, and because he replenished many great cities with inhabitants againe which the wars had left desolate and vnhabited, and lattly, for that he had restored the Sicilians agains to their libertie, and to live after their owne lawes. And afterwards, his tombe was built in the market place, about the whicha certaine time after, they builded certain cloisters and galleries to exercife the youth in, with exin the mare ercife of their bodies, and the place fo walled in, was called Timeleontium: and so long as they did observe the lawes and civill policy, he stablished amongst them, they lived long time in great and continuall prosperity.

The come parifon of Timoleon and Paulus Amylius. for the warres, 🔏 🍇 Ith thefe two men were fuch as the Historiographers haue described them to be: it is certaine, that comparing one with the other, we shall finde no greate oddes or difference betweene them. For first of all, the warres they made, haue bene against great and famous enemies: the one against the MACEDONIANS, and the other against the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them, conquered the realme of MACEDON, which he tooke from the scuenth king that rained by succesfion from the father to the sonne, since the time of the great Antigonus; and the other draue all the tyrants out of Sicile, and restored the whole He and cities therein, vnto their former libertie. Vnlesse some will alledge perhaps that there was this difference betweene them, that Amylius fought against King Perseus, when he had all his power whole and entire, and had fought with the ROMAINES many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timeleon let vpon Dionysius, when he was in greatest dispaire, and in manner veterly cast away. On the contrary side, it may be objected for Timeleon, that he ouercame many tyrants and a mightic great army of the CARTHAGINIANS, with avery fmall number of men, and yet men of all forts:not as Æmylius with a great army of well trained and expert fouldiers in warres, but with men gathered together, at aduenture of all forts, being mercenary hirelings, and men fighting for pay, loofe people, & vnruly in wars, that would do but what they lifted. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we must consesse that the praise is due unto the Generall. Both the one and the other kept their hands cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it seemeth that Æmylius came so fashioned and prepared, by the good civill law, & morall discipline of his country: & that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards fashioned himself to be that he was. And this is to be proved for that all the ROMAINES in that time were so civilly brought vp, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the lawes of their countrey. Where to the contrary, there was not one of the Captaines of the GRECIANS that came then, or were fent into Sicile, but fell ftraight to corruption, when he had put his foot into Sicile, Dion only excepted and yet they had a certaine fulpition of him, that he aspired to the kingdome, and imagined in his head to stablish a certain Empire at Syracvsa, like vnto that of Laced Amon. Timens the historiographer writeth, that the Syracvsaks fent Gilippus with shame back again into his courry, for his vnsatiable greedy concrousines, and for his great thefts and bribes taken in his charge. Diverse other have also written the great treasons and fullhoods Pharax Spartan, and Calippus Athenian did commit, both of them feeking to make themselves Lords of Syraevsa, and yet what men are they, and what meanes had they to have fuch a foolish vaine hope and fancy in their heads? considering that the one did follow and serue Dianysius, after he was driven our of Syracysa; and the other also was but a primate captaine of a band of footmen, of those that came with Dion. Timoleon in contrary maner was sent to be General of the Syracysans, vpon their great instance and suite. And he hatting nonced to seeke or hunt after it, but onely to keepe the power and authority they did willingly put into his hands: so soone as he had destroyed and ouerthrowne all such as would vniustly vfarpethe gouernment, he did immediatly of his own good will, frankly refigne vp his office and charge. And fure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus Aimylius: who having conquered to great and rich a realme, he never increased his goods the value of one farthing, neither did fee nor handle any mony at all, although he was very liberall, & gaue large-despitent hy vnto others. I meane not in speaking this to vpbraide or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted tivenite of afaire house the Synacvans gave him in the city, and a goodly mannor also in the countrey: from bribes, for in such cases there is no dishoness in receiping hor verifies and a goodly mannor also in the countrey: from bribes, for inflich cases there is no dishonestic in receiving, but yet it is greater honesty to resuse, then to take. But that vertue is most rare & singular, where we see they will receive nor take nothing, gife, some though they have justly deserved it. And if it beso, that the body is stronger and better com-mended for pounded, which best abideth change of parching heat, & nipping cold and that the mind is much more fironger & stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of prosperity, nor droopeth for forrow inaductifitie. Then it appeareth that Amylius vertue was so much more perfect; in that he showed himself of no lesse graue and constant a mind, in the patience he endured for his losse and sorow happened vnto him, (lofing at one time in maner, both his children)then he had done before, in all his triumph & greatest felicity. Where Timoleon to the contrary, having done a worthyact against his brother, could with no reason suppresse the griefe & sorrow he telebut ouercome with bitter gricfe and repentance, continued the space of twenty yeerestogether, and nener druft once only shew his face again in the marker place, nor deale any more in matters of the common-weale. Truly, for a man to beware to do cuill, and to shun from cuill, it is a very good and comely thing: so also befory, and afeard of enery reproch, and ill opinion of the world, it sheweth a simplenesse of nature,

ATO the elder, answered certaine on a time, that maruellously commended a bold, a venturous, and desperate man for the warres: That there was great oddes, to esteeme manhood so much, and life so little And furely it was wifely spoken of him. The report goeth, thatking Antigonus gaue pay to a fouldier among other, that was very hardie and venturous, but he had a naughtic fickly body. The King asked him one day, what he ayled to be fo pale, and cuill coloured. The foulding told him, he had a fecret difease vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The King hearing him fay fo, commanded his Physici-ons and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they should heale him with all possible speede: and so they did. After the souldier had his health againe, he would venture to more to desperatly in the wars as he did before. Insomuch as king Antigonus self perceiving his flackneffe in drawing backe, rebuked him and faid vnto him: that he wondered to fee fo greata change & alteration in him. The fouldier neuer shrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainly: Your felf, & it please your Maiesty, is cause of my cowardlinessenow, by healing my disease, that made my life lothfome to me. Much like were a Sybaritans words touching the life and maner of the Laced Emonians: that it was no maruel they had fuch a defire to die in the wars fecing they did it to rid themselues of their troubles, and most miserable & straight life. But we must not wonder though the Sybaritan's, being womanish men, altogether given to pleasure, did for thinke; that those men hated their lives, who feared not death, for the defire they had to do good, and good will they had to do their dutie. Which was contrary in the LACED EMONI ANS: for they were of opinion, that to live and die willingly, was a vertue: as these funerally crles do witnesse:

The dead which here do rest, did not in life esteeme, That life or death were (of them (elues) or good or bad to deeme. But even as life did end or death was brought to paffe, So life or death, was good or bad; this their opinion was.

And indeede to flie death is no shame, so it proceede not of a cowardly heart: neither to desire death is commendable, if it be with hate and contempt of life. This is the reason why Home faith, the valiantest men are ever best armed, when they come to battel. The law-makers among the GRECIANS, do ever punish him that casts away his target, but never him that casteth away why the his fword or lance. For enery man must first thinke to defend himself, before he seeke to hurt his Greeting do enemy, and specially such as haue the whole state of a Realme in their hands, and be Generals of the field. For if the comparison be true about 12 the field. the field. For if the comparison be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captain made, that in an away bis army of men, the light horsmen resemble the hands, the men of armes the feet, the battel of footmen the stomack and breast, the captaine the head of a mans body: it seemed then that the venturous captaine putting himselfe in danger without cause, is not onely carelesse of his ownelife, of an arm, but also of al theirs whose liues depend upon his safety. And contrarily, he being carefull of his owne person, cannot but be carefull of his souldiers that serue vnder him. Therfore Callicratidas a Laced Emonian captaine, and a worthy man otherwife, did vnwifely answer a foothsayer Alieute that bad him take heed to himself: for the signes & tokens of the sacrifices did threate his death. Sparta, faid he standeth not upon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by sea or by land, man becareful for man, Callicratidas was but one man of himselfe, but as captaine or lieutenant general, he had the whole power & force of the army in his person. For he was not a man alone, when so many himselfe. mens lines were lost with his. Now old Antigonus was of a corrary mind: for he being ready to giue battell by sea, about the Ile of Anoros, made a better answer to one that said vnto him his enemies had moe ships then himself. For how many ships then doest thou reckon my selfe, said he? Therin he did wisely to make great account of the worthinesse of a General, specially when it is joyned with hardinesse and experience. For the chiefest point of service, is to save him that fauethallother. For when Chares on a time shewed the Athenians opely, the fundry wounds and cuts he had received upon his body, and his target also thrust through with many pikes: Timotheus straight said vnto him: Chares, I am not of thy mind. For when I did besiege the city of Timotheus Samos, I was afframed to fee a dart throwne from the wals, light hard by me, for that I shewed sping. my selfea rash yong man, and more venturous then became a Generall of so great an army. For when it standeth much vpon the whole army, and that it is necessary the General therof do pur himselfe in danger: then he should put himselfe forward, and occupy both hands and body without respect, not regarding their words that say, A good and wise Captaine should die for age, or at the least, old. But where there is small honor to be won by very good successe, & contrariwise much losse and destruction by great misfortune: no man of wisdome or judgement would wish a Generall to fight as a private souldier, to hazard the losse of a Generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the lines of Pelopidas and of Marcellus, both which were worthy men, and died other wife then they should. For they were both valiant souldiers in the field, and did both of them honor their country with famous victories, and specially against great & dreadfull enemies. For the one was the first (as they say) that ouerthrew Hannibal, who was neuer ouercome by any before. And the other also ouercame the LACED EMONIANS in Pelopidas battel, that ruled al GR E CE at that time both by sea & by land, yet they both carelesly lost their and Marv lines, by venturing too boldly, when their country flood in greatest need of such men & captains less than their as they were. This is the cause why we following the resemblance that was between them, have lives by too compared their lives together. Pelopidas, the fon of Hippoclus, came of one of the noblest houses of the city of Tite B s , as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left turing. him heire of all hislands and goods, being but a yong man. So he straight shewed himselfe willing to do good, with his mony, to those that needed helpe, and were worthy to let the world see liberality. that his mony was not his mafter. For as Aristotle faith of these rich men, the most part of them do not vse their goods for extreme coueteousnes, other again do abusethé, as being giue to ouermuch pleasures. So rich men become slaues all their lifetime, some to pleasure, other to profite. Now, all Pelopidas other friends would be beholding to him, & take very thankfully his courtese & liberality towards them; but Epaminondas could neuer be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeit Pelopidas selfe followed Epaminondas maner: for he took a pride and pleasure to go simply apparelled, to fare meanely, to labour willingly, and to make wars openly as he did. He was even fuch another, as Euripides the Poet described Capaneus to be, when he said of him: He rich and wealthy was, yet was he therewithall

For he wold have bin ashamed, that the poorest man of the city of Thebes, should have worne meaner apparell vpon his backe then himselfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouerty was not dainty to him, because his parents were ener poore, & yet for al that he passed it oner more easily by fludy of Philosophy, which he gaue himself vnto, and for that from his youth he liked to leadea fpare life without excesse, Where Pelopidas matched in a noble house, and maried highly, & had two children by his wife:neuerthelesse he had no mind to keepe or increase his goods the more for that, but gaue himselfe altogether to serue the comon-weale as long as he lived. By reason whereof his wealth decayed, and his best friends grew angry with him, telling him that he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was fo necessary, as to have goods. Andhe answered them: Indeed they are necessary I do confesse it, but yet for such a one as this poore. lame, and blind man that standeth by. They both were alike borne to all vertue, fauing that Pelo. pidas tooke most pleasure in exercise of his body and strengh, and Epaminondas in the exercise of his wit and learning. So as the pastime each of them tooke when they were at leasure was, that the one delighted to wrestle & to hunt, and liked any kind of exercise of his body: and the other The perfect to heare, to fludy, and alwaies to learne fomething of Philosophy. But among all the excellent gifts and good parts in either of them, and that most wasne them honour and estimation in the world, they were only commended, and fingularly noted of wife men, for the perfect loue and and Epami- friendship that was ener inviolably kept betweene them vntill their deaths: having bene joyned together in so many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwise in matters of state and gouernement. For if a man will confider, and looke into the doings of Ariftides, Themistocles, and Cimon, of Pericles Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of differtions, enuies, and sufpiri. ons they were one against another, in gouerning the common-weale: and againe will consider the love, honour, and kindnesse, that continued alwaies betwixt Pelopidas, and Epaminondas: no doubt they will say these two are more worthy to be called brethren in warre (as they say) and companions in gouernement, then any of them we have named before, whose care and study was alwayes rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, & the only cause therof was their vertue. For their acts shewed they did not seeke glory, nor riches for themselues (the couetousnesse whereof doth alwayes breed quarrels and enuy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with another, with a great kindnesse and estimation of themselues, to feetheir countrey flourish, and grow to great honour through their seruice, and in their time; and for they reckoned all the good exploits both of the one and the other, that tended to that end, as their own. The most part of writers thinke, this great and earnest loue the one did beare to another, did grow fir & betweene them in a journey they made together vnto Mantine a to aid the LACED EMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both fet in battell ray, one hard by another among the footmen, against the Arcadians that stood before them; it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACED EMONIANS in the which they were gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. Butthey determining to die rather then to flie, flood close together, and fought with the enemies that came vpon them, vntill such time as Pelspidas being hurt in seuen places before, sell downe at the last vpon a heape of dead bodies, aswell of their owne souldiers as of their enemies, euen one vpon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had bene slaine, stept notwithstanding before him to defend his body and armour, and hea-Ione fought against many, being willing to die rather then to forsake Pelopidus lying amongstthe dead bodies: vntil himselfe being thrust into the breast with a pike, and sore cut on his arme with a fword, was even ready to give over, when Agefipolis (King of the LACED EMONIANS) came wish the other point of the battell in happy houre, who faued both their liues past all hope. Now after this battel, the LACED AMONIANS both in words and deeds did courteously intreate the THERANS as their friends & confederates. Notwithstanding, intruth they began to fearethe power and great courage of that city, and specially the faction and associats is menias and Andreclidas had fet vp, whereof Pelopidas also was a companion: because they thought it was popular, and inclined much to defire liberty. Whereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, all three great wealthy men of the city of THEBES, & misliking to be equall with other citizens, did perswate Phabidus, a captaine of the LACED EMONIANS, that going and coming through the countrey of BOEOTIA with an army, he would one day affay to take the castle of THEBES called CAD-MEA and driving those out of the city that would resist him, he would put the government of the state into the hands of a few of the noblest persons, who would be at the deuotion of the La-CED EMONIANS, and obey them in all things. Phabidas brought it to passe, & did work his feate before the THEBANS mistrusted any thing, vpon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the castle, he apprehended Ismenias, and sent him to LACED EMON, where shortly after they put him to death, Pelopidas. Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other faued them- Pelopidas, felics by flying, & were banished THEBES by found of trumper. Epaminondas taried Itil in THE Pherenen, EES, & no mantouched him, for they made small account of him, because he was altogether gi. and endro uento his booke; and though his goodwill had ferued him to have done fome feate, his pourry faul from made him vnable to do any thing. The LACED & MONIANS vnderstanding of the taking of the Thibes. cassle, did straight put Phabidas out of his charge, and set a fine of a hundred thousand drachines vpon his head: but yet they kept fill the castle of CADMFA in their hands with a great garrison. All the other cities & people of GRECE did wonder much at it, that they should allow the fact, and punish notwithstanding the doer. So the Thebans having lost their ancient liberty, and Archive being made fubicet by both these, Archias and Leontidas, soas all hope was taken from them e- Leontidas, uer to wind out of this tyranny, or at any time to ouerthrow it, seeing it was maintained and defended by the Laced Monians, and that they could not possibly take from them all the feigniorie & dominion they had throughout GREBCE, as well by fea as by land: Leontidas and his cedemonfollowers notwithstanding, when they understood that they who were banished fro Thebes, 47% were very well received and entertained of the people at Athens, & much made of also by the nobility, they fought fecretly by treason to have them killed. To do this seate they sent certaine men vnknown to ATHENS, who by treaton flue Androelidas, howbeit they miffed the killing of the other. Furthermore, the LACED EMONIANS, Wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they should Andredis not receive fuch as were bareflied from There's, nor that they should favour them, but drive das same. them out of their city, as those which by their allies were infly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS, notwithstanding, being men alwaies civilly given, and inclined in nature to humanitic, as being borne, and bred vp withall, and very defirous besides to require the The - The thanks BANS courtefie, who had bene the chiefest meanes and doers in restoring against he popular fulling of flate and government at Athens: they would by no meanes offer the Thebans any figh the athe. inurie, iceing they had stablished a law and decree, that if any Athenias passing too and the thelans forthrough the countrey of Bosotta, did bearcarmour against the thirty tyrants, that were gonernours and oppressors of the liberty of Athens, there should no Bosotian seemeto he, or know any thing thereof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger Felopidas fort, did procure fill euery one that was banished, to seeke the libertie of his country, and openly made an oration to them all, declaring that it were not onely a cowardly part, but also a wic- of the The. kedoffence to the goddes, if they would fuffer their countrey to remaine fo in continual bon- bans. dage, and ffrangers to inhabite it with a garrifon, to make them subject to the yoke; and they in the meane time to be contented to faue themselves, to live delicately and idlely at ATHENS, to fludieto do what shall please the Athenians to command them, and to be afraid of the Oratours, and those which through eloquence can perswade the common people to do what they lust. Therefore he perswaded them that they should hazard all, being a matter of so great weight, and take example of Thrasybulus noble courage and hardinesse: who departing from THERE'S, did drive out the tyrants that oppressed ATHENS: and even so, we departing from ATHENS, should seeke to deliver THERES also from bondage. When he had by these perswastons drawne them to his opinion, they feeretly fent vnto their friends that remained fill in $T_{\rm H\ E-}$ mes, to let them understand their mind and determination: who all liked very well of their purpole. Infomuch as Charon that was the chiefest man among them, promised to lend them his house to assemble in. Philidas also found meanes to be Secretary to Philip and Archias, who were gouernors and Captaines of the citie at that time for the LAGED AMONIANS. Epaminondas on the other fide making no shew of any thing, had of long time practifed to stirre vp the courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they were arany games or exercises of body, he would ever procure them to wreftle with the LACEDEMONIANS. And after he faw them reioyce when they had cast them, and that they were the stronger: he would chide them, and tell them they might be assamed, for lacke of courage to suffer the LACED EMONIANS TO hold their noses to the grindstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the confederates appointed a day certaine to breake the ice of their pretended enterprise, and agreed that confinacy Pherenicus, with other that were banished, should tarie at the village of Thriasivm, and that again the they should send the valiantest and lusticst young men before, to give the venture to enter the Lacedame city:adding this therewithal, that if the enemies fortuned to surprise the, all the other of y coffiracy ioyntly together, shold be ready to give order, that their fathers, mothers, & childre shold of Theles.

lacke nothing necessary for them. Pelopidas was the first man that offered himselfe to vndertake theenterprise: and after him Melon, Damoclidas, and Theopompus; all three, men of the greatest houses of Theres, who loued maruellously together, & for no respect would ever offend one another, although from the beginning there was ever emulation among them for honour and glory, by striuing who should exceed other in vertue and valiantnesse. Now they were twelve of them, who taking leave of the rest, sent a foot post before to Charon, to advertise him of their. coming and they themselues went on their journey casting little short clokes vpon them, and taking hounds with them, and hunters staues in their hands, because their enterprise should not be mistrusted by those that met them on the way, and that they should thinke them hunters vo and downe the fields for their pleasure. So, when the messengers they sent, came to the citie. and had rold Charon that they were coming, he neuer shrunke from his word, though the danger towards was great, but like a frout and honest man did abide by his promise made, and told him they should be most heartily welcome to his house. But another mancalled Hipposthenidas. very honest otherwise, and one that loued his country and the preservation thereof, and a good friend of those also that were banished: fainting straight vpon the sudden report of these newes. his mind was troubled, and his heart failed him fo, as his nofe fell a bleeding, to thinke vpon the greatnesse of the instant danger he was like to fall into, having never cast before with himselfe how by this enterprise they should put all the empire of the LACED EMONIANS in hazard of vtter destruction, and lay a plot besides to ouerthrow all their comon wealeand state; by lay. ing all their hope vpon a few banished men, hardly able to wade through with their enterprise. Whereupon to foone as he was come home, he fecretly dispatched a messenger one of his familiar friends, vnto Melon and Pelopidas, to will them they should defer their enterprise for better oportunitie, and foto returne backe againe to ATHENS. Chliden was the man he fent of this melfage, who presently went home to his house: and taking his horse out of the stable, bad his wife fetch him the bridle quickly. The bridle being not readily to be found, she told him she had lent it out to one of their neighbors. Then they fell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to foule words, and laftly his wife fell a curfing of him, and praied the gods he might haue ill lucke in his journey, and those that sent him. Childen having spent the most part of the day chiding and brawling with his wife about the bridle, and furthermore misliking the tokens of his wives curfing and banning of him: he determined not to go a foote out of the dooreson that arrand, and so went about some other businesse. Thus had this noble enterprise in manner bene altogether dashed before it was fully begun. Now those that were in Pelopidus companie, changed apparell with the countrey men, because they would not be knowne, and did deuide themselves for that they would not come into the citicall together, but at divers gates, being stownes ap day light. At that time it was a maruellous wind and great fnow, and the weather was so boifte. rous, that every man got him within dores; which fell out happily for the conspirators, that they were not knowne when they came into the city. So their friends & confederates within the city received them as they came, and brought them to Charons house, where were assembled togither, with those that were banished, eight and forty persons onely. Now for the tyrants, thus flood the matter with them. Philidas their Secretary was of the conspiracy, as we have told you before, and he knew all the practife. Wherfore he had long before folemnly bidden Archiasand his company, to supper to his house, that very night, to be merry together, and had promised to entertaine them with women to welcome them withall: of purpose, that when they had in their full cups, and were in the midst of all their pleasure, the conspirators might then vie them as they would. So they being fet at table, before they were fped of their cups, one came to them, & told them truly of the treason (not the particularities, neither as a thing certaine, but of a rumour onely that ran abroad in the towne) that the banished men were hidden in Charons house. Philidas would have paffed the matter over. Howbeit Archies would needs fend one of his guard fraight for Charon, to command him to come to him presently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themselues to worke their feat, being armed enery man, & their fwords in their hands, when vpon a fodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the house running straight to the gate, came back again afeard, to tell them that it was one of Archias guard that came for Charen, to come immediatly to the governours. Then were they in doubt that their practife was discouered, &that they were all cast away, before they could make any proof of their valiantnes:notwithstanding, they were all of opinion, that Charen should obey the melfage, and that he should present himselfe before the gouernours, to take away all suspition from them. Charon of himselfe was a stout man very constant, and resolute in danger for his own perfon: yet it grieued him much at that time, for feare the confederats should suspect him he had bewraied them, if io many honest citizens whom he had lent his house vnto, should vnfortunatly miscary. Therefore before he went out of his house, he went into his wines chamber, to setch his fon that was a goodly boy, but ftrong as any boy of his age could be: so he brought him to Prlopidas, & praied him, if he vinderstood he had betraied the any way, or otherwise had sought their hurt, they should then vse his son as an enemy, without any compassion towards him. Whe the confederates faw the good zeale and true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he should thinke any of the so faint hearted, or timorous, for any danger could come to them, that they should suspect or accuse him for any thing; and there withall they prayed him, not to leave the boy with them, but rather to convey him into some place out of the tyrants danger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong and injury they had done to them, and to their country. Charon answered them, he would not take him away, & that he faw no life nor health more happy for him, then to die with his father without infamy, and with so many honest men his friends. So after he had be sought the gods to prosper them, and had encouraged and embraced enery one of the confederators one after another: he went to the gouernours, and studied by the way so to frame his words & countenance, as though he should seeme to thinke of any thing else, then of that he purposed to do. When he came to Philidas dorethat made the feast, Archias & Philidas himselfe came vnto him, and asked him: Charon, what are they (faid they) that are come into the citie, and hidden in some house, with certaine citizens, that do accompany them? Charon was somewhat abashed at the first and asked them againe: What men be they? who are they that hide them in the city? But when heperceiued hat Archias could tel nothing of certainty, then he thought straight that some man had informed them that was not privy to the practife, but had heard something of it. Therupon he willed them to take heed it was no false alarme, to make them afraid neuerthel sie (said he) I wilenquire further of it: for at all aduenture it is good to be circumspect in such a case to be sure. Philidas answered him, he said truly and so he brought Archias backe again into the hall, where hemade him drinke deeper then before, still entertaining the company with hope of the womens coming. Charon returning home againe, found all the confederates ready to attempt their enterprise, not as men that reckoned of their lives, nor that had hope to prevaile: but as those that were determined to die valiantly, & to fell their lines dearely. Now he truly told vnto Pelapidas only, what was faid vnto him: and the rest, he told that Archidas had sent for him to speake withhim of other matters. The storme of the former danger was scant blown ouer, but Fortune fent them another: for immediatly vpon talke had with Charon at the first, came a messenger from ATHENS, that brought a letter to the fame Archias, written by the Bishop of ATHENS at Archia that time, called Archias, also as himselfe, and was his old host and friend: wherein hewrote not bifting of of simple coniecture, nor surmised suspicion, but the plaine conspiracie in enery degree, as afterwards it fell out. So the meffenger was brought to Archias that was drunke, and deliuering him trason to the letter he said vnro him: Sir, he that sendeth you this letter, straightly charged me to tell you, Archico in that you should presently reade the contents thereof, because it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing faid vnto him: Weightie matters to morrow. So he tooke the letter and put it weight vp, and then fell againe to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But euer after, the GRECIANS matters to made this a common prouerbe among them, Weighty matters to morrow. Now when the confirstore field their times a cochout their hufges, they divided them filling in two companies.

Prouerb. spirators spied their time to go about their busines, they divided themselves in two companies. Pelopidas and Damoclidas went with one company, to fet vpon Leontidas and Hypates, because Pelopidas they dwelt neare together: Charon and Melon with the reft, went against Archias and Philip, be killethibe ing disguised in womens apparell they had put vpon their priny coates, and wearing garlands of vrante pine apple and firre trees on their heads, they couered all their faces. So when they came to shew themselves at the hall doore where the banket was made, they that were in the hall at the first fight, thinking they had bene the women they looked for, began to shoute and made great noise for ioy. But when the conspirators cast their eyes round about the hall to know those that were at the table, they drew out their fwords, and let vpon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they shewed theselues what they were. Then Philidas bad his guests he had bidden to the banket with them, that they should not stir, for they should have no hurt: so some of the sate stil, 292 But the greatest number of them would needs from the boord, to defend their gouernors, How. beit because they were drunke that they knew not what they did, they were soone slaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterprise was not so easie. For they went against Leontidas, that was a sober discreet man, and withall hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his doores were shut vp, & they knocked long before any man came to the doore. At the length, one of his menthat heard them rap so hard, with much ado came to open the doore; but he had no sooner thrust backe the bolt of the doore, and began to open it, but they pushed it from them with such a force vpon him altogether, that they laid him on the ground, and went straight to his masters chamber. Leontidas hearing the noise of them that ran vp to him in such hast, presently mistrufted the matter; and leaping out of his bed, tooke his fword in his hand, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chamber all night; for if they had bene out, they might eafily have hurr one another in the darke. But the lampes giving cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber doore, and gaue Cephisodorus the first man that pressed to enter vpon him, such a blow with his fword, that he dropped downe dead at his feet. Having flain the first man, he dealt with the second that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betweene them two. both for that the chamber dore was very strait, as also for that Cephisodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the coming in at the chamber. Notwithstanding, Pelopidas ouercame him in the end, and flew him: and went from thence with his company straight to Hypates house. where they got in, as they did vnto Leontidas house before. But Hypates knew presently whatir was, and thought to faue himselfe in his neighbours houses. How beit the conspirators followed him so hard, that they cut him offbefore he could recouer their houses. Then they gathered together, and loyned with Melons company, and fent immediatly with all possible speede to A-The Winty THENS, to the banished THEBANS there, and cryed through the city, Liberty, liberty, arming those citizens that came to them with the armour and spoiles of their enemics, that were hanged vp in common vaults, and armourers shops about Charons house, which they brake open, or caused to be opened by force. On the other fide, Epaminondas and Gorgidas, came to ioyne with them, with a company of young men and honest old men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Herupon the whole city was straight in an vprore and tumult, and every house was full of lights, one running to another to know what the matter was. Neuertheleffe the people did not yet assemble together, but every one being amazed, musing at this stir, not understan. ding the troth, stayed till day came on, that they might call a councell. But truly herein me thinkes the Captaines of the garrifon of the LACED EMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not ftir betimes, & fer upon them incontinently:confidering there was fifteene hundred foldiers, besides a great number of citizens that would have come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noise they heard made them afeard, & to see lights in enery mans house, and the people running vp and downe the fracers in great multitudes too and fro: whereupon they flirred nor, but only kept them within the castle of CADMEA. The next morning by breake of day, came the other banished THEBANS from ATHENS, very well armed, and all the people of THEBES drew together in councell. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas and his conforts, and presented them before the people, compassed about with priests and the profeffed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpontheir heads, and they prayed the affembly of the citizens, that they would helpe their gods & their country. All the people that were prefent, when they faw them, arose vp and stood on their feet, and with great shouts and clapping of hands received them, as their fauiours, that had delivered their country from bondage, & reftored them again to liberty: and thereupon before them all, euen in the market place, by the whole voice and consent of the people, they chose Pelopidas, Melon, and Charon, gouernors and captains of BOEO'TIA. Pelopidas then immediatly made them befiege the castell of CADMEA about, with trenches and force of wood, doing all he could possible to win it, and to expulse the LACEDE. MONIANS, before any supply or aide came to them from Sparta. So he did, and preuented it Pelopidas fo fuddenly, that the garrifon being departed out of the castle by composition, as they returned towards LACED EMONIA, they found Cleombrotus king of SPARTA in the country of MEGARA, coming towards them with a great army to helpe them. Afterwards, of the three Captaines which had charge of their garrifon that lay at Thebes, the Spartans condemned two of them to death: Hirmippidas and Arcissus were presently executed: and the third captaine, Dysaeridas, they fet fo grieuous a fine on his head, that he went out of PBLOPONNESVS. This enterprise being attempted, and executed with the like valiantnesse, and the same danger and trouble, that Thrasibulus practise was, when he deliuered ATHENS from the slauery of the thirty Gonernours and tyrants; and having the like fortune and happy end, the GRECIANS termed it cofingerman to Thrasibulus act. And indeed it were a hard matter to finde two other such, besides them two, that with so few men ouercame their enemies, being many mo in number then themfelues, or that with fo small help did ouercome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprise with their onely valiance and wisdome, and were cause besides of so great bleffing and benefite to their country, as Pelopidas and Thrafibulus attempt was. But the great change and alteration of the state afterwards, did make their acts farre more noble and famous. For the warre that ouerthrew the maiestie of Sparta, and that tooke away all the seignorie Pelopidus and rule of the LACED EMONIANS both by fea and by land, beganne the very fame night, ourthrew when Pelopidas himfelfe making the twelfth person, and entring into a private house, taking the signaneither citie, nor cassle, nor strong hold (to rell truly by figuratine speech) did breake and cut Lucdome. in funder, the links and chaines that linked straight together, and strengthened the Laced Man. NIANS whole Empire and monarchie ouer all GRECE: who vntill that present time were thought fo strong, as no possibility could breake or funder them. Now the Laced Minne fortuning afterwards to inuade the country of Boeotia with a mighty army, the Atheni-ANS trembling for feare of their great power, did vtterly leaue to protect them, and renounced the league and alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did straightly profecute lawe against those, that were accused to take part with the Bosorians: whereof some of them were pur to death, other were banished from ATHENS, and the rest condemned in great fummes of money. To be short, every man said the THEBANS were but vindone, considering they had no helpe, and were beloued besides of none. At that present time it sell out Pelopidas and Gorgidas were Generals over all Bosorta for that yeare, who deuifing to throw abone betwirt the Athenians and the Laced Emonians again, to make them square, they reliable vsed this policy. There was a captain of the LACED EMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valiant man, policieto but else of small capacity, and vainely given, having a certaine fond ambition and humour, perfivading himselse he had done some notable good service in his time. This Sphodrias was left full out inthecitie of The spies, with a great band of fouldiers, to receive and favour all the Boe or i-ANS that had a mind to revolt from the THEBANE. Pelopidas of himselfe sent a merchant (avery friend of his) vnto Sphodrias with a great fumme of money from him, and certaine perswasions withall, which prevailed more then the money, wishing him to attempt some greater matter, and to seeke to win the hauen of PIR EA: a thing soone wonne, if he came to assault it on the sodaine, and the rather, for that the ATHENIANS mistrust nothing, neither keepe watch nor wardthere. Moreouer, that he might affure himfelfe, nothing could be better welcome to the lords of Laced Emonia, then to make them lords of the city of Athens also. And again, that the THEBANS being at deadly fode with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betrayed and forfaken them in their need, would not aide nor fuccor them in any respect. Sphodrics giving too light eare to this vaine perswassion, tooke the souldiers he had with him, and marching away by night entred the realme of Attica, & went on to the city of Elevsin: but when he came this ther, his fouldiers were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpose being discouered, he was forced to returne backe to The spies, having raifed fuch a war to the Laced Amonians, as felout to be of no small importance to them, nor easie to be pacified. For after that time, the A-THENIANS fought league and amity again with the THEBANS, and did aide them very louingly: and moreouer, putting themselves to sea, they sailed up and downe, procuring and drawing to their league all fuch as were willing to rebell against the LACED EMONIANS; and the THE- The The. As we reade, that Antalcidas a Spartan said one day to king Agestlam, coming home fore hurt from Bobotia: Surcly the Thebans have given you a worthy reward, for teaching them to be fouldiers against their wils. in chusing their game, could skilfully chuse both time and placeto giue their enemies battel, and make them retire again with fafety, after they had bin fleshed, giving them a litle tast of the fruits and commodity of victory: but among them, Pelopidas was he that deserved most honor. For fince the first timethey gaue him charge of men of war, they neuer failed, but chose him continually energy yeare, either captaine of the holy band, or gouernour of Bosotia fo long ashe lived: fo that Pelopidus only did the most things in this war. The Laced Emonians were overthrowne in fundry journeies, that they were diffressed by the cities of Plates, and of These PIES, where Phabydas himselfe (that had before taken the castell of CADMEA) was slaine among other. Another great power of theirs also was ouerthrown neareto the city of TANAGRA. where Panthoidas gouernor of the same, was also slain. Now al these victories, though they much encouraged the hearts of the conquerors, & made them hardy: yet did they not thereby altogether conquer the minds of the vanquissed. For the LACED &MONIANS WERE not ouercome in any pitched field, nor fet battel, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rodes, & skirmishes properly laid of purpose, where sometime flying, sometime driving themagaine, they bickered very oft, and put them to the worst. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a flourish and proofe to the iourny of Levernees, wan Pelopidas great honor: for he had no companion to challenge any part of his glory and victory, neither did he leave his enemies any lawfull excuse, to shadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he spied all occasion he might possible. of Pogita. how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that took part with the LACED EMONIANS, and hadreceiued two ensignes of footmen of theirs to keepe it. Pelopidas being aductised one day, that the garrison of OR CHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the country of the Localds. hoping he should finde Orchomene without garrison, he marched thicher with his hold band, and certaine number of horsemen. But when he drew nearethe city, he had intelligence there was another garrison coming from Sparta to supply the place of the garrison that was abroade:wherupon he returned backe again by the city of Trora, for he could have paffedno other way, but to have turned down by the foot of the mountaine. For all the valley that lay betweene both, was drowned with overflowing of the river of Melas which even from his very head carieth ever such breadth with it, as it maketh y marishes navigable, so as it is vnpassa. ble for any shallow it hath. Not far fro these marishes standeth the temple of Apollo TEGIRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left off at this day, and had neuer long continuance, but only untill the time of the wars of the Medes, when Echecrates was master and chiefe priest there. And some hold opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they call the next mountaine to it DE-10s, at the foot whereof the marishes of the river of MELAS do end, and behind the temple are two goodly springs, from whence cometh great abundance of good sweet water: whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue. And some say also, that the goddesse Latona was not brought to bed betweene two trees, but betweene these two springs. For mount Provm is hard by it also, from whence the wild bore came of a sodaine that flighted springs cal- her. And the tale that is told of the serpent Pytho, and of the giant Tytius, do both confirment, that Apollo was borne in the same place. I passe ouer many other coniectures confirming the fame, for that we do not believe in our countrey that Apollo is among the number of those, who from mortall men haue bene translated to immortall goddes, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put off mortality, and tooke immortalitie vpon them: but we rather take him for one of those that neuer had beginning nor generation, at the least if those things be to be credited, which so many grave and ancient writers have left in wilting to vs, touching fo great and holy things. The Thebans returning back fro Orchomene, and the LACED AMONIANS on the other fide returning also from Lockide both at one time, they fortuned both armies to meet about the city of TEGYRA. Now so some as the THEBANS had discourred the Laced Monian's passing the straight, one of them ranne sodainly to Pelspidas, and told him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACED EMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, answered Pelopidas againe? With these words he commanded his horsementhat was in the rereward, to come before, and set vpon them: and him selfe in the meane time put his footemen immediatly into a pretie squadron close together, being inall not aboue three hundred men, hoping when he should come to give charge with his battell, he should make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACE-DEMONIANS divided themselves in two companies, and every company, as Ephorus writeth, had fine hundred mentand as Calliftenes faid, feuen hundred. Polybia: and diverse other authours fay, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and Gorgoleon, the Captaines of the LACED A-MONIANS, luftily marched against the THEBANS: and it fell out so, that the first charge was ginen, where the chiefetaines or generals were of either fide, with great fury on either part, fo as both the Generals of the LACEDEMONIANS which fet vpon Pelopidas together, were flainc. They being flaine, and all that were about them being either hurt or killed in the field: the reft of the army was so amazed, that they deuided in two, and made a lane on either side, for the THE-BANS to passe through them if they would. But when they saw Pelopidas meant not to take the paffage they offered him, and that he came on still with his mento set v ponthose that were yet in battell ray, and flue all them that stood before him: then they turned taile, and tooke them to their legs. How beit the THEBANS did not chase them farre, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not farre from the, and the new garrison besides, that were come from Laced MMON not long before. And this was the cause they were content that they had ouercome them by force, and had passed through their army in despight of them, and broken and ouerthrowne them. So when he had fet vp markes of triumph, and spoiled their slaine enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obtained victory. For in all the warres the LACED EMONIANS CHE made, as wel with the Grecians as with the barbarous people also, there was neuer chronicle mentioned at any time, that their enemies being fo few, did ouercome them that were fo many, northat they were ouercome also by any number equall in battell. Whereupon they grew io couragious and terrible, that no man durst once abide them: for their onely fame did so terrific their enemies that came to fight against them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe as much as they had done. But this battell of Tegyra was the first that made both them and the other Grecians know, that it was not the river of Evroras alone, nor the valley that lieth betweene the rivers of CNACION, and of BABYCE, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places els, where they learne yong men to be ashamed of what energy dissonest and vile things, and to venture their lines for honest causes, fearing more dissonorable misses reproach, then honourable danger. These are the people most to be feared, & are most terrible most terrible reproach, then nonourable danger. I nere are the people most to be realed, was emolt to their enemies. And for the holy band we mentioned before, it is faid Gorgidas was the befored. first erector of the same. They were three hundred chosen men entertained by the state, & they The sine. alwayes kept within the castle of CADMEA, & the band was called the townes band: for at that time & specially in that part of GREGE they called the castles & great holds in cities & townes to hold in cities & townes & t time, & specially in that part of GRECE, they called the castles & great holds in cities, y towns. band. Other fay it was a band of footmen that were in loue one with another. And therefore Pammenespleafant words are noted, faying, that Nefter could no skill to fer an army in battell ray, feeinghe gaue the GRECIANS counfell, in the Hiades of Homer, that they should set them in battellray, enery country and tribe by themselues:

The one might alwayes helpe at hand, that other do behoue. For, faid he, one friend should rather be set by another that lonestogether; because in danger, men commonly do litle regard their countrey men, or fach as are of their tribe. But men that do Mentouing loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the passion of loue that entertaineth the schothers affection, for affections sake, doth keep the fro for saking one another. And those that fight affection, for affections sake, doth keep the fro for saking one another. And those that are beloued, being assamed to do any vile & dissoness thing before those that loue them, for we-gainst their. ry loue will sticke one by another to the death. And sure the reaso is good, if it be true that louers enemies. do indeed more regard them they loue, though they be absent, then other that be present. As appeareth by the example of him, that being striken downe to the ground, his enemie lifting vp his sword to kill him, he prayed him he would give him his deaths wound before, lest his friend that loued him, feeing a wound on his backe, flould be assumed of him. It is reported also, that Tolaus being beloued of Hercules, did helpe and accompany him in all his laboures and quarrels. Wherupon Aristotle writeth, that vnto his time, such as loued heartily together, became sworne and tolans brethren one to another, vpon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this band love. was first called the holy band, by the selfe same reason that Plato calleth a louer, a divine friend Platoes say. by Gods appointment. It is written also, that this band was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowne ingof also. before the battell of CHERONEA. After that battell, Philip taking view of the flaine bodies, he stayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that band lay dead on the ground, one hard by another, and all of them flaine and thrust through with pikes on their breasts, whereat he wondred much: and being told him that it was the louers band, he fell a weeping for pittic, faying: Wo beto them that thinke these men did, or suffered any euill or dishonest thing. And to be short, the misfortune of Lains; that was slaine by his owne brother OEdipus, was not the first originall cause of this custome, that the Theban's began to be in loue one with an. other, as the Poets write; but they were their first law-makers, who perceiuing them to be a stout and fierce nation on nature, they fought even from their youth to make them gentle and civill and therefore in all their actions both of sport and earnest, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, being highly efteemed of them in those dayes. They brought in the vie also to make loue in the middest of altheir youthful sports & exercises of their bodies, to frame the yong mens manners, and to bring them to a civil life. And therefore they had reason that gaue the goddesse Harmonia to the THEBANS, for defender and patronesse of their cities who was begotten (as they fay) between Mars and Venus. For that give this to understand, that where force and warlike courage is joyned with grace, to win and perfwade, all things by thisy. nion and accord are brought to a goodly, profitable, and most perfect gouernment. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy band of the THEBANS, Gorgidas deuiding it in the former rankes, and placing it all along the front of the battell of the footmen, it did not appeare what they were able to do of themselues, for that he brought them not all into one body: so as thereby they might fee what service the whole company could do being together, confidering that it was deuided and mingled amongst many other, that were a great deale of lesse value then themselues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantnesse before, when they fought about him of themselues, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would neuer after deuide nor separate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire body that had all his members, he would alwaics begin with them to give a charge in his most dangerous battels. For, as we see in running of coaches at games, that horses being tied all together in a front, do runne faster and stronger then they do when they are loose, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together do breake through the aire better, but for that the contention and enuy betweene them to outrunne one another, doth indeed fet their hearts and stomackes on fire. Eucn so he thought, that valiant men giuing one another a desire and enuy to do well, should haue the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers fight, But the LACED EMONIANS afterwards being at peace and league with all the other GRECI-ANS, proclaimed open warres against the THERANS only: and king Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an army often thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen. Whereupon the The-BANS were not only in the like danger they stood in before to lose their libertie, but the LACE. DEMONIANS did opely threaten they would veterly destroy them for euer: so that all the country of Bozor in stood in greater feare then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his houseto go to the warres, his wife bringing him to the dores to take her leave of him, weeping, she prayed him heartily to looke well to himself. But he answered her again: My good wife, it is for private fouldiers to be carefull of themselves, but not for Captaines: for they must haue an eye to faue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he found the Captaines and the Lieutenants of the army in fundry opinions and he was the first that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it best they should give battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither governour of Bororia, nor Generall of the army, but onely captaine of the hely band:notwithstanding they had great affiance in him, and gaue him great authoritie in counsell concerning their affaires: such as became a manthat had made so good testimony of his naturall loue and affection to his countrey, as he had done. Now being determined in counfell that they should give the enemie battell, they all mustered together in the valley of Levetrees, wherehe had a vision in his dreame, that troubled him very much. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedasus, which by reaso of the place, they call the Levetribes, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defiled and rauished by certaine guests of the Spar-TAN's that lay in their house, trauelling that way. This act being so horrible and wicked, the poore father of these defiled virgines, could neither haue instice nor reuenge of the LACEDA-MONIANS, and therefore after he had banned and curfed the LACED EMONIANS with most horrible and execrable railings and curfes as might be possible, he killed himself vpon the graues plague! folof his daughters. The LACED EMONIANS had many fundry oracles, prophecies, and fignes of low where the gods to warne them, to take heed of the wrath of the LEVETRIDES: howbeit every man vnderstood understood not the fignification of this prophecy, but were deceived by the equinocation of the name. For there was a litle towne in the country of LACONIA, standing vpon the sea side, called LEVETRYM: and in Arcadia also by the city of Megalipolis, there was another towne called by the same name. This misfortune chanced long before the battell of Leverres : but then Pelopidas dreaming in histont, thought he faw in a vision the daughters of Scedafus weeping Pelopidas about their graves, and curfing the LACED EMONIANS: and that he law their futher allo, com- decome and manding him to facrifife a red maiden to his daughters, if they would obtain the victory. This Victory. commandementat the first, seemed very cruelland wicked: whereupon when hearose, he went Longreen to the Prognosticators, and Generals of the army, and told them his dreame. So, some of them faid, this was no matter to be lightly passed ouer, but to be considered of, alledging many examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the sonne of Creon in old time, and of Macarea the daughter of Hercules. And yet of latter memory, the wife Pherceydes, whom the LACED EMONIANS flue, and whose skinne their Kings do keepe at this day, by commandement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecy of the gods, did as it were facrifile himfelfe, for the fafety of GRECE. And furthermore, the young boyes which Themistocles did sacrifise to Bacchus omestes (to say seating raw sless) before the battell of Salamina. And all these sacrifices were acceptable to the gods, as the victories following did plainely shew. In contrary maneralso King Ageflaus, coming from those very places, from whence King Agamemnon came in the time Aceflaus ofthe warres of Troin, and going also against the same enemies, dreamed one night in the ci- dreams. ty of AVLIDE, he saw the goddesse Diana, asking him his daughter for sacrifice. But he tenderly louing her, would by no meanes performe it and thereupon was compelled to breake off his iourny before he had executed his enterprife, and departed with small honor. Other to the contrary stood to it stoutly, and said, it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abhominable, & brutisha Godly sayfacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the gods, nor to any god, better or mightier then ingreenerours:confidering that they be no impressions in the aire, nor Gyants that rule the world, but the ning God. one onely mighty and eternall God, Father of gods and men. And to beleeue that either gods or demi-gods dodelight in murder, or fliedding of mans bloud, it is a meere mockery and folly. But admit it were fo, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that haue no power atall: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirit, when they have such damnable and horrible defires in them, and specially if they abide still with them. Now the Generals and heads of the Godsproni. army of the THERANS being of fundry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraid then before, dense and by reason of their disagreement: a yong mare colt, or filly breaking by chance fro other mares, foldain running and flinging through the campe, came to ftay right against them. Then every man began to looke vpon her, and to marke what a faire filly it was, and red coloured enery where, and what a pride she took with her selfe to heare her owne neighing. Theoritas then the soothsayer beingamongst them, did behold her, and knew straight what the filly meant, and so cried out forthwith: O happy Pelopidas, loe here is the facrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other virgine for thy facrifice, but take this that God himfelfe doth fend thee. When Theocritas had faid to, they took the filly, and laid her vpon the tombe of scedafus daughters, and put garlands of flowers abouther, as they handled other facrifices: and then after the prayers made to the gods, they did The file facrifice her with greatioy, and told Pelopidas vision in his dreame the night before through all facrificed. the camp, and the facrifice they had made also according to the fignification therof. Moreoner when they came to joyne battel, Epaminondas being general, drew all his army on the left hand, because he would bring the right wing of the enemies army (where they had placed the natural) Spartans) further from the other Grecians their friends and allies, that were let in the other wing of their battel: that he comming with his whole power together to give a charge vpon Cleombrotus their King (being in a corner by himselfe) might be distressed or ouerthrowne. The cause The enemies finding Pelopidas intent, began to change their order, and having men enough, of the our throw of meant to thrust out their right wing at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the intra stated of the Lacods. meane time fodainely preuented them, and running in great fury with his squadron of three moniens. hundred men, heset vpon Gleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put foorth the right wing, and ionne them together againe. And so he found the LACED EMONIANS not yet setled in their rankes, and brake them in this diforder, thrusting one in anothers place to put theselues againe in order: notwithstandiag the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the onely captalnes and most expert souldiers in martiall discipline, as men so trained and practised, that no

fodgine altering, of forme or order in their rankes, could either trouble or diforder them. For they were men to trained, that they could turne head or fide vpon any fodaine occasion offered and could fight and order themselves in battell every way alike. So Epaminondas going to give the onset vpon them alone, with the whole force of his battell together, not tarying for others: and Peloridas also with an incredible courage and readinesse, presenting himself in battell before them, did put them into such a terrible feare, that they cleane forgot their skill in fighting and their wonted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and there were more LACED EMONIANS flaine arthat day, then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopida therefore, being neither gouernour of Boforia, nor Generall of all the army, but onely can. taine of the holy band; did not with frankling win as much honour and glorie of this victory, as \tilde{E} . paminondas, that was governour of BOEOTIA, and Generall of all the army. Indeed afterwards they were both gouernours of Borotia together, when they inuaded the country of Pelo. PONNESVS: wherethey made most part of the cities and people rebellagainst the LACED ENG. NIANS, and take their part; as the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARGADIA, and the best part of LACONIA selfe: notwithstanding it was in the heart of Winter, and in the shortest dayes of the yeare, and towards the latter end also of the last moneth of their yeares authority and rule, ha uing not many dayes to continue in office, being forced to leave their authoritie, vpon paineof death if they did refuse, vnto other officers new chosen, the beginning of the next monethfollowing. Whereupon their other companions, and gouernours also of the country of Bosoma, what for feare to incurre the danger of the law, as also to avoid the trouble to lie in campe in the sharpest of Winter: they did vrge and perswade them to bring the army backe againe into their countrey. But Pelopidas wis the first that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, and wanne the other THEBANS also to consent unto it, to be contented to be led by them, to give affaulto the city selfe of Sparta. So, through their perswasion they passed ouer the river of Evrotas, and tooke many litle townes of the Laced Emonians, and wasted and destroyed al the coun. trey to the fea fide, leading under their enfignes an army of threefcore &ten thousand fighting men, and all GRECIANS, the THERANS not making up the twelfth part of them, Now, the honour and great reputation of these two persons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any resolution of counsell or pub-Eke order, and neuer opened their mouthes against them, but willingly marched vndertheir conduction. And in my opinion, truly methinkes it is the first and chiefest point in the law of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himfelfe, should leane to one that is strong, and able to defend both. Euen much like to fresh-water fouldiers, and raw sea-men, that lying at fea incalme weather, and in fafe harbour, are as luftie and bragge with the mafters and boate fwaines as may be: but let a little florme of weather come vpon them fuddenly, and thatthey be in any danger, then they looke on the masters, hoping for no life but at their hands. And euen in like manner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all affemblies of councell they would ener iarre and striue with the THEBANS, for honour and superiority in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherein they faw there was danger, then their peacockes brauery was gone, and they were glad to obey their Generals commandement. In this iour ney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to be in league with them, and tooke all the countrey of Messenia from the Laced Emonians, which they peaceably enjoyed: and called home againe all the ancient inhabitants of the same; and restored them to their country, and replenished the citie of ITHOME. Then returning afterwards into their countrey by the city of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entring into the straight of PELOPONNESVS, supposing to have stopped their palfage. Thus was the valiant neffe of the fetwo worthie men greatly commended and honoured of enery body for formany notable exploits and victories as they had wonne, and their maruel. Ious good fuccesse, greatly wondered at. But as their glorie and renowne increased abroade, to did their country mens malice and enuie increase against them at home: who had preparedsuch a welcome home for them, as was so bad and vile for so honourable service as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelepidas both at their returne, were accused of treason. For therewas a special law at THEBES, that commanded all such as should happen to be gouernours of Boso-Framinon-TIA, to refigne their office immediatly to the new officers electratthe beginning of the first moneth of the yeare, which in Boxoria they call Boveation; and they had kept it four ewhole moneths about their terme appointed, in which time they had done all that we have spoken of before, as well in the province of Messenia and of Arcadia, as also in the countrey of La-CONIA. Pelopidas was the first of the two that was called in by processe, therfore he stood in the greater danger: howbeit in the end, they were both discharged againe. As for Epaminondas, he Epaminon. tooke his accusation and the attempt of his enemies (whereby they sought to have cast them both away) quietly enough iudging, that patience to those that deale in state and gouernement, is a great shew of force and magnanimitie. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more chokricke, and fet on besides by some of his friends, did take this occasion, to be revenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of those that came into Charons house with Pelopidas and Melon: Menecilidas but not with standing the THERANS did nothing honour him, as they did the rest. He taking trator and this ill at their hands, being maruellous eloquent of speech, but viciously given other-accuses. wayes, and a man of a vile and mischicuous nature: did fondly abuse his eloquence, falsly accufing those that were his betters, in honesty and credite. And not being contented with this first accusation, he practised so commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being governour of Bo E O TIA, which he fued for: and moreouer, he was ever against him in all matters of state he tooke in hand. But he could neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he fought to make debate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all fpitefull persons, who when they cannot be thought so honest men, as those whom they enuy, the of togo about to produc that they are not so honest and meete men, as those whom they preserve frightful and commend. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble acts & victories, and specially that victory aboue other, which the THE-BANS wonne before the journey of Leverres, in a skirmish of horsemen, that was before the city of Plates, he having charge of the same: of the which he would leave his memorie. Androclides a Cyzicenian and painter, was at a prife with the Thebans to paint them our forests fome other battell in a table, & he did draw this worke in the city selfe of There es:but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the THEBANS fellout against the LACED EMONIANS, and fesforth warre followed on the necke of that, whereupon the painter forfooke THEBES, leauing his their batworke in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they would hang it vp in some temple of publike place with an inscription vpon it; faying thus: This was Charons victory: of purpose to deface and obscure the gloric of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. Too vaine and fond was his ambition, to fet before fo many noble battels and victories, one simple ouerthrow of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meanest gentlemen of all Sparta was slaine, and forty other with him: and this was all he did. Pelopidas misliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly against the lawes of THEBES, which did expresly forbid that no private person should be honoured with the title of common victorie, but willed the glorie therof should be attributed to all the people generally. Indeed Pelopidas in his orations did greatly praise and commend Charon, notwithstanding he made open proofe, how Meneclidas was an enuious and spitefull detractour, and a naughtie wicked man, oftentimes asking the THERANES, if they themselues were worthy of no honour! fo as in the end he caused Meneclidas to be condemned in agreat summe of money. But hefinding himselse vnable to pay it, being so great a summe, practised afterwards to alter the whole state and gouernement. I thought good to dilatethis at large, because me thinkes it doth somewhat declare Pelopidas nature & manners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander Alexander thetyrant of PHERES, was at open wars with many people of THESSALY, and did vseall policiehe could, to bring them all to his obedience. Whereupon the free cities sent their Ambassadours vnto Theres, to pray them to fend them a captaine with an armie to aide them. Then Pelopidas sceing Epaminondas occupied about the warres of Peloponnesus, did offer himselse to the Thessalian Ambassadours, being loth to drowne his experience and sufficiencie in warres, with unprofitable and tedious idlenesse, knowing that in those parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other captaine. Now when he came with his army into THESSA-17, the citie of LAR 188A yeelded presently vnto him : where the tyrant Alexander came to Lavista meete with him, and to pray him to treate a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopi- cip. das attempted to bring it to passe, seeking in steed of a tyrant to make him a gentle, just, and lawfull gouernour of THESSALY. But when he saw no perswasions could take place with the tyrant, and that he grew more stubburne and vntra table, and would not heare reason : and more-

to be a maruellous diffolute and vnruly person in all his doings, and extreamely couctous befides: then he began to speake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyrant there.

his case was to be pitied, and that he was in no state meete for the glory of his name; wherewith she fell a weeping for compassion. Pelopidas that knew not what she was, beganne to muse at the first, but when it was told him she was Iasons daughter, then hecourteously saluted her for her father Islans fake, who while he liued was his very good friend. So Thebe faid vnto him:my Lord Pelopidas, I pitie thy pooreladie and wife. Truly fodo I pitie thee, quoth Pelopidas againe to her:

that thou being no prisoner, canst abide such a wicked Alexander. This answer tickled Thebe atthe heart, who with great impatience did beare the cruelty, violence, & villanie of the tyrant her husband: that besides all other infamous acts of his detestable life, committed Sodomic with her yongest brother. So she of tvisiting Pelopidus, and boldly making her moune to him, telling him closely all the iniuries her husband offered her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle she grew to abhorre him, and to conceine a hate in heart against him, desiring reuenge on him. But now the captains of the Theranes that were fent to deliver Pelopidas, being entred into THESSALY with their army: whether it was through default of ignorance, or their mishappe) they returned home with shame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THERANES at

of Pelopidas, before the confideration of his owne honour and glory, and fearing left Alexander seeing himselfe in danger to be turned out of all he had, falling into despaire like a bedlem beast,

compassing him round about, but not fiercely setting vpon him, with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying still, thereby to soften the cruell mind of this tyrant, going on in this gentlesort; and partly to cut his combe and extreme pride, but specially to preserve Pelopidas from the danger and crueltie of his beastly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruell man, and one that neuer regarded reason, nor instice in any sort, considering how he made some men to be

them being in league and friendship with him, he spying time one day when the citizens were affembled in councell together, fodainly compaffed them in with his guard and fouldiers, and put them every one to the sword, even the litle children. And he consecrated the dart also wherewith he had staine his owne vnkle Polyphron, and having put garlands vpon it, he did sa crifife to it, as to a god, and called it Tychon, as one would fay, happy killer. And another time being in a Theater, where the Tragedie of Troades in Euripides was played, he went out of the peace and amilie one with the other, he went into Macedon: where Ptolomie made warre at hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyrant wondring at this great fromacke of his, and at that time with Alexa ider, being king of MACEDON, they both having fent for him to heare and his maruellous constancy fearing nothing; asked what he meant to long for hastic death? Pelodetermine the quarrell betwixt them, & alfo to help him that had the right, against him that did pidas being told what he said, answered him againe: Marie, said he, because thou shouldest die the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and restored the banished menos the sooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. After this answer, the tyrant would neuer fuffer any man to come and speake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the Thibeshe either fide, to their lands and goods againe. For affurance of peace, he tooke the kings brother in hostage, whose name was Philip, and thirtie other children of the noblest mens sonnes of Mi. daughter of the tyrant Isson deceasifed, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyrant, hearing re-CEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBES, to let the GRECIANS fee, that the repu port of Pelopidas noble mind and courage by his keepers: the had a maruellous defire to fee him, lixander tation of the Thebans power stretched farre and the renowne also of their maner of gouerne. and to speake with him. But when she came to see him, like a woman she could not at the first discerne the greatnesse of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in such misement and inflice. It is the fame Philip, that made warre afterwards with the GRECIANS, to take their liberry from them, howbeir being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THEBES in ry: yet coniecturing by exteriour shew, noting his simple apparell, his haires and beard growne very long, and how poorely he was served, and worse entertained: she thought with her selfe Pammenes house. And this is the cause, why some thought Philip did follow Epaminondas manner and it might be peruduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres. which was indeed baca peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as for the continencie, iustice, magna. nimicie, and elemency, which were the speciall points that made Epiminondas of great fame: Phis lip could neither by nature, education, or study ever attaine vnto. The THESSALIANS having funt afterwards to Thebes, to complaine of Alexander the tyrant of Phebes, that did against molest and trouble the free cities of THESSALY, Pelopidas was sent thither Ambassador withit menias, carying no power with him from THEBES, little thinking he should have needed to have made wars; wherupon he was compelled to take men of the country felt, vpon the instant neces.

five offered. At the very fame time also all MACEDON was up in armes: for Peolomy had flainthe King, and vfurped the kingdome, and the feruants and friends of the dead king called vpon Pells. pidas for aid, who defiring to come even upon the fact, and having brought no men of warreout of his owne countrey with him, did pr fently leny certains men where he was, and fo marched forward with them against Piolomy. Now Piolomy when both their powers met, did corrupt the fooldiers Pelovidus had brought, with money to take his part. But not with flanding this policie he had practiled, yet he was afraid of the name onely, and greatnesse of Pelopidas reputation wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas, as to a better man then himselfe, and making maruellous much of him, and i areasing of him, he made promife, and bound it by oath, that he would keepe enemies, whom the Thebans did either love or hate. And for affurance of his promise, he game him his fon Philoxenus in hostage, and fiftie other of his friends, all the which Pelopidus fent vno THERES, But in the meane time, being maruelloufly offended with the treason of the souldiers against him, understanding the most part of their goods: their wines, & children, were in the dry of PHARSALE, he thought if he could win that it were a maruellous good way for him to be reuenged of the treachery of the fouldiers against him: whereupon he leavied certaine Thessathe Realme for the brethren of the dead King, and that he would take all those for his friends or

LIANS, and went to that city. Pelopi las was no sooner come thither, but Alexander the tyrant arrived of o with his army. Pelopidas supposing he had come to instiffe himselfe, clearing the complaints of the THESSALIANS made against him; went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delighted in murch rand shedding of bloud. Neuerthelesse, he hoped he durft not have attempted any thing against him, for the authority and seigniories sake of Thebes, by whom he was fent thither, as also for his owner eputation. But the tyrant seeing him flenderly accompanied and without traine of fouldiers, took him prisoner, and wan thecity of PHARSALE at that present time. But this act of his put his subjects in a great feare, who seeing him commit to flumefull a deed against all equity, did thinke straight he meant to spare 10 erant de man, but would vse men, and all things else that came in his hands, like a desperate man, and one that reckoned him selfe cast away. But when the THEBANES vnderstood this newes, they were maruellous fory, and straight fent an army thither, appointing other captaines then Epaminondas: because then they had some missiking of him, Alexander the tyranthaning brought Pelopidus in the meane time to PHERES, did fuffer any man that would at the first to come to feehim, and fpeak with him: supposing his imprisonment had killed his heart, & had made him very humble.

their returne home condemned them every man in the summe of ten thousand Drachmes, and fent Epaminondas thither againe with another armie: at whole coming, all THESSALY role in- Epaminon. continently, for the reputation of fo great a captaine. And his fortune was fo good, that he had in amount veterly overthrowne the whole fore of the twenty his friends and captaines when to The file. amanner vtterly ouerthrowne the whole state of the tyrant: his friends and captaines were so with anarmuch afraid, and his subjects on the other side so well disposed to rebell, & maruellous glad for wir. thehopethey had, quickely to feethe tyrant haue his deferued hire, for all his former wicked of Persia: but faid furthermore, that he would have a law made, that in stead of the nine officers they did yerely chuse to rule the whole city, they shold chuse nine of the poorest & meanest citizens, and fend them ambassadours vnto the king of Persia, that they might returne home rich men with gifts. The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THE-

HANS had obtained all that they had demanded: and confidering that Pelopides estimation and worthines did more prenaile and take better effect, then all the orations the other could make,

& specially to aprince that sought alwaies to entertaine those GRECTANS, which were of greateff force and power in the warres. This ambaffage did greatly increase cuery mans love and goodwill vnto Pelopidio, because of the replenishing again of Messina with inhabitants, and in-

franchifing and setting at liberty of all the other Grecians. But the tyrant Alexander of Phe-

RES, returning again to his old accustomed cruelty, and having destroyed many cities of THES.

fauiour: the There's onely at the felfe-fame time took earnes against them, to deliner those whom the tyrants oppressed, and sought to roote out all tyrannicall government over the $G_{R\,E-}$

CIANS. So when he came to the city of PHARSALE, and had gathered his army together, he went presently to the field to meet with the tyrant. Alexander perceiving Pelopidas hadvery few THEBANS about him, and that he had twife fo many THESSALIANS with him, then the other had: he went vnto the temple of THETIS, to meet with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelo-and good men at armes in the field, fent them before to give charge vpon the enemies, that pref-fed to winne the vantage of the place; and having ouerthrowne them, they followed the chase

all the valley ouer. But in the meanetime Alexander having his footemenby, marched forwards

&gotthe hils, because the THESSALIANS that were further offcame too late motwithstanding when they came to the hils, they foughtforcibly to climethem vp, being very high and fleepe:

againe without their purpose. Pelopidas seeing that, sounded the retraite for the horsemen that followed the chase, to repaire to the standard, and commanded them they should set upon the footemen of the enemies that were in battell ray; and he himselfe ran to helpe those that fought to win the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and passing through the rereward, he got to the foremost rankes: to whom, the fight of his person did so redouble their force and courage, as if he had bene still among them: faying that he came not away for any misliking he had of nondas; and as the common prouer be faith:

Which doth refuse the pit prepar'd, and list not bide the shocke, ferued that turne. Moreouer, he received fourescore milch kine to the paile, and neateheardes to great giftes keepe them, having neede of cowes milke belike, to heale a disease that fell vpon him: & would of the king needs be carried in a litter upon mens armes from the kings Court, unto the Mediterrantum fea, the king rewarded them for their paines that caried him, with four talents. Yet it feemeth the gifts he tooke did not offend the Athenians fomuch, confidering that Epicrates (a drudge

NESIANS: the cities being aduertifed of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they fent ambaffadours immediatly to THEBES, to pray them to fend them an army, and namely, Pelopidas for captaine, to deliner them from the miserable bondage of the tyrant. The THERANES willingly granted them, and put all things in readincfie very fodainely. But Pelopidas being ready to fet Pelopidas forward in his journey, there fell a sudaine eclypse of the Sunne, so as at noone day it was very fecondition. darkein Thebes. Pelopidas seeing enery man afraid of this eclypse aboue, he would not compelthepeople to depart with this feare, nor with foill hope to hazard the loffe of feuen thousand THEBANS, being all billed to go this journey: but notwithstanding, he put himselfe alone into the Thessalians hands, with three hundred horsemen of strangers that were glad to serve of the Sun with him, with whom he took his journy against the fouthfayers minds, & against the goodwill made the of all his citizens, who thought this celypse did threaten the death of some great person like him-afraid. felfe. But Pelopidus though he needed no spurre to be reuenged ypon the tyrant Alexander, being by nature hot, and defirous of himfelfe to reuenge the spite and villany he had offered him: yethe had a further hope to find the tyrants house denided against himself, by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his imprisonment there. Neuerthelesse, the same and reputation of the journey undertaken, did wonderfully increase his noble courage, and the rather because he was desirous (all he could) the Greetans should see, that at the very same time when the LACEDEMONIANS did fend gouernors and captaines to Dionyfius the tyrant of SI-CILE, to serue and aide him, and that the ATHENIANS as hirelings tooke pay of the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whose honour they had set up a statue of brassein their city, as vnto their pidas, that Alexander was coming against him with a great power, Pelopidas answered him unbyshe ftraight, All the better we shall kill the more. Now in the midst of the valley, there are certaine people of round hills of a pretie height, which they commonly call the dogs heads: they both friued to have the which of their footemen should first get those hils. Pelopidas hauing a great number of horsmen, durander, them or of the play, but because he was ashamed his people should see him weepe, to see the miferies of Hecuba and Andromacha played; and that they never faw him pitie the death of any one man, of so many of the citizens as he had caused to be slaine. The guilty conscience therefore of this cruel and heathen tyrant, did make him tremble at the onely name and reputation of Epami. Helet his wings downe fall, not much unlike the cocke, So he sent straight vnto Epaminondas to excuse himselfe. But Epaminondas would in no wise suffer the THEEANS, through his meanes, to make league with fuch an helhound: onely he veel ded to abstinence of armes for thirty dayes, vpon delinerie of Pelopidas and Ismenias into his Epaminon. der Jelines hands, with whom he straight returned into THEBES. Now the THEBANS being aduertised that the Laced Emonians and the Athenians, did fend Ambassadors to Artaxerxes the mighty king of PBRSIA, to make league with him: they fent to him Pelopidas for them also, be. Artanernes ing wifely confidered of them to fend a man of fuch fame and reputation. For Pelopidas passing first through coutries subject to the king of Persia, his fame was such where he came, that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous battels he had won of the Lace-DAMONIANS, was not only caried into the next regions and countries of Asia: but fincethe baffadour first newes of the journey of Levetres was brought thither, Pelopidas having after that wonne to the King of Perfia. victory vpon victory, his estimation grew so great, as it was blowne abroad through the world, even to the highest and furthest parts of the East countries. And when he came to the king of PERSIAES court, the Princes, great Lords, and Captaines of PERSIA that faw him, had him in great admiration, faying: Lo this is he that conquered the LACED EMONIANS, and tookeall their seignorie and authoritie from them, both by sea and by land, and draue the SPARTANS be yond the river of Evrotas, and from mount Tavgetvm, who not long before made warres with the great king of Persia being led under their king Agesilans, even in the middest of ASIA, for the realmes of SVSE, and of ECBATANE. So king Artaxerxes felfe was very gladof Pelopidas his coming, and praised him about them all, and made his estimation greater then it was before, by his great and honourable entertaining of him, meaning thereby to returne the honour to himselfe againe: because men should thinke that the most famous men of the world came to honour him, and to fee his Court, as esteeming both him and his greatnesse, the onely happinesse of the world. But when he had feene his face, and heard him speake, & perceived that his words were much greater then the Athenians, and playner then the LACED EMONIANS: he then was further in loue with him then before, and without difguifing, he did honour and fauor him aboue all the other Ambassadours, who found that he made more estimation of him, then of them all. Notwithstanding, he seemed to beare greater goodwill vnto Antalcidas LACEDE. MONIAN, then to any other of the GRECIANS: for that one day being at the table he tookea garland of flowres from his own head, and washed it in perfuming water, and sent it vnto him. Indeed he did not vie Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he fend him the goodliest and richest presents he could deuise, and granted him besides all his requests he made vnto him: which were, that all the people of GRECE should be free: that the citie and country of MESSI-NA should be inhabited againe and that the citizens of THEBES by their successours should be taken, as ancient friends and allies of the kings of PERSIA. So when he had received these anfwers, he returned home againe, and would by no meanes accept any of the great prefents the Pelopidas king had offered him: which caused the other ambassadours of the GRECIANS to be so ill welcome home to their cities. For among other, Timagoras was accused to the ATHBNIANS, and condemned to die, and was executed; which if they did in respect of the great presents he had taken of the king, truly they had reason, and it was worthily done of them. For he tooke not only gold and filter enough, as much as they would give him: but received a very rich bed also, and PERSIAN chamberlaines to make and dreffe it vp, as if no GRECIAN servants of his could have

that the enemies themselves thought it had benea fresh supply of new mens hearts & other box dies then theirs with whom they had fought before, that came thus luftily to fet againe voon them. And yet they did abide two or three onsets. Howbeit in the end, perceiuing those men did still more fiercely force to get vp the hill, and moreouer how their horsemen were comein from the chase: they gaue way, and left them the place, tety ring backe by litle and litle. Then Pe lovidas having won the hils, stayed on the top of them, viewing the army of his encmies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waved vp and downe in great disorder. And there he looked all about, to fee if he could spie out Alexander: and at the length he found him out 2. mongst others, in the right wing of his battell, setting his men againe in order and incouracing of them. After he had set eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his heart so rose against him vpon fight of him, that giving place to wrath, he neither regarded his person, nor the intent of his journey, but returning farre before his men, he cryed with a loud voyce to the tyrant, and challenged the combate of him. The tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, & hid himselfe amongst his souldiers. But for his souldiers, the first that thought to set vpon Pelopidas, was staine by him, and many left dead in the field. The residue standing floutly to it, and close together, did passe his curaces through with their long pikes, and thrust him into the breaft. The THESSALIANS feeing him thus fore handled & diffressed, for pity sake came running from the toppe of those hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to help him. But cuen as they came he fell downe dead before them. Then did they together with their horimen fo fiercely let vpon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to flie; and following them in chase a great way from that place, they couered the valley with dead bodies, for they flue about three thousand men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death tooke it very heavily, and lamented bitterly : calling him their father, their faulour and mafter. as one that had taught the the worthieftthings that might be learned of any. But the THESSA LIANS, and other friends and confederates also of the city of THEBES, besides their exceeding in setting out their common proclamations and edicts in praise of his memory, and doing him all the honour that could be due to the most rare & excellent person that euer was: they did ver more flew their love and affection towards him, by their paffing great forow & mourning they made for him. For it is said, that they that were at the battell, did not put off their armour, nor vnbridle their horses, nor would dresse their wounds, hearing tell of his death, before they went first & saw his body not yet cold with fighting, laying great heaps of the enemies spoiles about it, as if he could have told what they had done, nor before they had clipped off their own haires, and the haire of their horses, in token of sorrow. And many of them also, when they were come into their tents and paullions, wold neither have fire, cate, nor drinke; and all in the campe were full of forow and mourning, as if they had not won a notable victory, but had bene ouerthrown and made subject by the tyrant. Afterwards when the newes of his death was spread throughal the countrey, the Magistrates of every citie through which Pelopidas bodie was conveyed, went to receive it very honourably, accompanied with all the yong men, the Priests and children carying tokens and crownes of triumph, and other ornaments of gold; and when his funerall day was come, and that his bodie should be caried to be buried, the oldest and the noblest perfons of the THESSALIANS went vnto the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might have the burying of him: and one among them being the mouth of the rest, spake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lords of THEBES, our good beloued friends and confederates, we only craue this good turneat your hands, wherein you shall much honour vs, and in our great calasbs Thebans mity somewhat also comfort vs. For we shall never more accompany Pelopidas alive, nor requite his honorable deferts to vs, that he shall euer know them. But if it please you to let vs handle his body with our hands, and that we may bury him, and fer forth his obsequies, we will imagine 25 then at ý least that you do think that, which we our selucs do certainly belocue: That we These salians not you Therans, have received the greater losse of both. For you have lost indeed a worthy Captaine, and we have not onely received the like losse with you, but the hopealso of recoucring of our libertie. For how dare we againe fend to you for another Captaine, when

, fire and in mine opinion, no funerals could be done with greater pompe and honour, then the

, THESSALIANS performed his, being men that recken not dignitie, magnificence, and pompe

55 to consist in ornaments of Iuorie, nor of purple: as Philistus doth set it out, who praises we cannot redeliuer you Pelopidas? The THEBANS hearing their petition, granted their deto the moone the burying of Dionysius the tyrant of Syracvsa, which was the end of his tyranny, as a sumptuous conclusion of a stately tragedy. And Alexander the Great, at the death The strenge of Ephestion, did not onely clippe his horse haires and mules, but plucked downe also the battelments of the walles of the citie: because it should appeare, that the very walls themselves did forman, of mourne for his death, shewing that deformity in stead of their former beauty. But all such things the Great are done onely by force and compulsion, vpon the Lords commandements, which do but raile for the vpenny against their memory for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are against their death of wils constrained to do the thing they millied and are no influences of honour negativity. wils constrained to do the thing they misliked: and are no inst proofes of honour nor goodwill, but rather vaine shewes of barbarous pompe and pride in him, that disposeth his authority and plenty of goods, in trifling toyes not to be desired. Where contrariwiseit plainely appeareth, that a prinate man dying in a forraine countrey, by reason should be accounted most happy of alother creatures, that having neither his wife, kinne, nor his children by him, he should be conneved to his funerals, accompanied with fuch multitudes of crowned people and number of cities, enuying one another, who should most honour the funerals, as being vnrequested, and least of all compelled. For faith Efope, the death of a happy man is not grieuous, but most bleffed, seeing it bringeth all good mens doings to happinesse, and leaueth fortune to her fickle change, and ing of the fporting pleasure. But in my judgement a LACEDEMONIAN spake better, when he said to Diagorus an old man, that had himselfe in old time gotten victory in the games Olympicall, and had fene befides his own children, and his childrens children (both fonnes and daughters) crowned with victories also in the selfe same games: O Diagoras, die presently, else thou make neuer come Peable to heaven. But these victories of the Olympicall and Pythian games, whosoeuer should put thirty. theall together, are not to be compared with one of the battels only, that Pelopidas hath fought and won having spent the most part of his time in great calling and dignity, and lastly ended the same, being gouernour of Bo E OT IA the third time (which was the highest office of stare in all his countrey) when he had destroyed the tyrants that kept the Thebans in bondage, and was also slaine himself, valiantly fighting for the recourse of the Thessalians liberty, But as Pelopidas death was gricuous to the THERANS friends and confederates: so fell it out very profitable for them. For the THEBANS hearing of Pelopidas death, did not delay reuenge, but fent The The anarmy forthwith of seuen thousand footmen, and seuen hundred horsemen, under the conduct of Milcitas and of Diagiton. They finding Alexanders army ouerthrowne, and that he had lost the most part of his strength, did compell him to give vp the THESSALIANS towns he kept by force against them, & to fet the MAGNETIANS, the PHTHIOTES, and the ACHAIANS aliberty, withdrawing his garrifons he had placed in their strong holds: and therewithall to fweare, that from thenceforth he would march vnder the THEBANS, against any enemy they should leade him, or command him to go against. So the Thebans were pacified vpon these conditions. Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him foone after for Pelopidus death, who (as we hauetold you before) had pretily instructed Thebe his wife, that she should not fearethe outward appearance nor power of his tyranny, although she were enuironed with souldiers of banished men, whom the tyrant entertained to guard his person. Her selfe on the other side, searing his falshood, as also hating his crueltie, conspired her husbands death with her three brethren, Tisiphonus, Pytholaus, and Lycophron, and executed her conspiracie after this fort. Thetyrants pallace where he lay, was straightly guarded enery where with soldiers, who nightly watched his person: but their bed chamber which they commonly vsed to lye in, was in the toppe of Three of all his pallace, where they kept a dog tyed at the chamber doore to give warning, which was flaine by big a terrible dog, and knew none but the tyrant and his wife, and his keeper that gaue him meate. Nowwhen Thebe purposed to worke her feate, she locked up her three brethren a whole day neare vnto their bed chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, she went her selfe aloneaccording to her manner, into Alexanders chamber; and finding him afleepe, she stole out straight again, and bade the keeper of the dogge to carie the dogge away, for her husband was disposed to take rest, and would have no noise. There was no way to get vp to this chamber but by a ladder, which she let downe: and fearing lest her brethren should make a noise, she had couered the ladder staues with wooll before she let it fall downe. When she had gotten them vp with their fwords, and had fet them before the doore, she went first her selfe into the chamber, and tooke away the tyrants sword that hung at his beds head, and shewed it them as a token gi-In them that he was afleepe. When it came to the pinch to do the deede, these young men were afraid, and their hearts began to faile them. But she tooke on with them, and called them cowardly boyes, that would not fland to it when it came to the point, and withall, fware in her rage that the would go wake the tyrant, and open all the treason to him. So partly for shame, and partly for feare, the compelled them to come in, and to step to the bed, her selfe holding; lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feete, and bound them hard; another caught him by the haire of his head, and pulled him backward. & the third thrust him through with his fword. So by chance he died fooner then he should have done, and otherwise then his wicked life deserved, for the manner of his death. So Alexander was the first tyrant that was ever flain by the treason of his wife, whose body was most villanously and despitefully vsed after his death. For when the townes men of PHERES had drawne him through the city in the mire and dirt, they cast him out at length to the dogges to deuour.

Marcellus senditions.

Arcus Claudius that was fluetimes Confullat Rome, was the fonne (as they fay) of another Marcus: and as Posidonius writeth, he was the first of his house surnamed Marcellus, as who would say, a martiall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at weapons, skilfull in warres, firong and lufty of body, hardy, and naturally given to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor shewed his great courage, but in wars against the enemie: otherwise he was very gentle, and faire conditioned. He loued learning, and delighted in the Greeke tongue, and much esteemed them that could speake it. For he himselfe was so troubled in matters of state, that he could not fludy and follow it, as he defired to have done. For if God(as Homer faith) did

To vse their youth in warres, and battels sierce and fell, Till crooked age came creeping on, such feates for to expell:

They were the noblest and chiefest men of Rome at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in SIGIL B: in their middle age, againft the GAVIBS, to keepethem from the winning of all ITALIE: and againe in their old age, against Hannibal and the CAR-THAGINIANS. For their age was no priviledge for them to be differed with, in the service of their warres, as it was elle for common citizens; but they were both for their nobilitic as also in the field that called him to combat. In Sicila he faued his brother Octavilius life, being Marcellus ouerthrowne in a skirmish for with his shield he couered his brothers body, and slue them that faurthin offerthown and the came to kill him. These valiant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the Geoffsating. nerals under whom he ferued, with many crownes, & warlike honours, vfually bestowed upon valiant foldiers. Marcellus increasing still his valiantnesse and good service, was by the people Marcellus chosen Ædilis, as of the number of those that were the worthiest men, and most honorable; and the Priests did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Priesthood at Rome, having authority by law, to confider and observe the flying of birds, to divine and prognosticate things thereupon. But in the yeare of his office of Ædile, he was forced against his will to accuse Capitolinus his brother in office with him. For he being a rash & dissolute man of life, fell in dishonest loue with his collegues sonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who being a goodly young gentleman Capitalinus and newly come to mans state, was as well thought of, and taken of every man for his manhood and good qualities, as any way for his beauty and personage. The first time Capitolinus moued this dishonesty to him, he did of himselfe repulse his shamelesse offer, without any other prinity: but when he faw he came againe to tempt him the second time, he straight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his father being maruelloufly offended withall, (as he had good cause) went & accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the first, laid in many exceptions and fained excuses, to keepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: butthey declared plainely they would not receive his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to answer the matter before the Senate, & denied flatly that heattepted ener any fuch thing, because there were no witnesses proue it against him. Wherupon the Senate thought good to fend for young Murcellus, who comming before them, both bushed and wept together. The Senate seeing shamefastnesse in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that could not be pacified; without feeking other proofe, they took it a cleare cafe, and fo condemned Capitolinus prefently in a great funme of mony, which Marcellus converted into filnervessel, to serve at facrifices, & so did consecrate them to the service of the gods. Now when the Romaines had ended their first warre against the Carthaginians, which held them maines had fully the space of two & twenty yeares immediatly after that, they began a new war against the war with GAVLES. For the Insubrians, being a people derived from the GAVLES, and dwelling at the ginians 22. foot of the mountaines of the ALPES on ITALY fide, being able to make a good power of them. Yearestoge. felues, did norwithstanding pray aide of the other GAVLEs inhabiting on the other side of the mountaines: and they caused the Gessates, mercenary people and hirelings to the that would the Ganles, gine pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truly me thinkes it was a maruellous matter, and Giffair wonderfull good hap for the Romaines, that this war of the Gavles came not vpon them, Gaules. whilethey were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS: & that the GAVLES also had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purposely sworne to set upon the conquerors) expecting stil an end bctweene the, & then to fet vpon the conquerors, when they had nothing to fay to any other. Yet the situation of their country did trouble y Romains much, because they were so neare neighbors vnto them, & had wars as it were at their own doores. And so did the ancient reputation of the GAVLES formwhat appaule the ROMAINS, who, as it should seeme, they did seare more then any other natio what soener; because Rome had bin taken before by the GAVLES, Since which timea law was made, that Priefts, & eclefiafticall perfons should be dispenced with from going to the wars, vnleffe the GAVLES did rife against the. The preparation they made for this war at elegalical thattime, did plainely shew the fearethey had then of the Gavles. For it is thought, that neuerbefore nor fince, there were fo many naturall Romains affebled together in field, as were were, then at that present. Moreover, the new come cruckie they ysed in their sacrifices, doth record The Rothis to be true. For before they neuer vsed any strange maner in their facrifice, or barbarous fahion, but were fauourable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religio, & agreeable to the warrer of GRECIANS touching the service of the gods. But then they were copelled to obey certain oracles and ancient prophecies they found written in Sibyls bookes; and they buried two Gr E C 1-Ans aline in the oxe market, a man and a woman, and likewise two Gave es, a man & a woman. sied aline.

Vnto them they do yet continue certaine fecret anniuer faries in Nouember, that are not to be feene of every body. The ROMAINE's in their first battels of this warre, were often overcome and did ouercome: but these battels, were to litle purpose for ending of the warres. In the yeare that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Confuls, and fent with great armics to make warre vpon the Insurrans, people subject to the state of Millane, newes were broughtto Rome, there was a river feene in the country of Romania, red as bloud, and three moones also at the very fame time in the citie of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Priefts and foothfayers that had observed & confidered the tokens and fignifications of birds on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls they told plainly there was errour in their election, and that they were directly chosen against all fignes and tokens of the birds. Therupon the Senate wrote immediatly to the camp to them, & willed them to come home to depose themselves of their Consulship, before they did attempt any thing as Confuls against the enemies. The Confull Flaminius received the letters in time: but because he was ready to give battell, he would not open them, before he had first overthrown his enemies, and spoiled their country, as indeed he did. But when he was come back to Rome again, and had brought maruellous great spoiles with him, the people for all that would not go out to meete him, because he did not presently obey the letters they wrote ynto him, nor returned upon it as they commanded him, but contemptiously, without any regard of their pleasure, followed his owne fantasie: whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honour of triumph. For his triumph was no fooner ended, but they compelled him to give ouer his Confulfhip, and made him a private man with his companion. The ROMAIN'S therein were fo religiously bent, as they would all things should be referred vnto the gods good grace and pleasure, and would suffer none to contemne the observations and prognosticating of the south fayers, nor their ancient vies and customes, for any prosperity and felicitie that could happen For they thought it more necessary and profitable for benefit of the common-weale, that the Senate and magistrates should reverence the ceremonics and service of the gods, then that they should ouercome their enemies in battel. As for example, Tiberius Sympronius, a man as much honored and efteemed of the Romains for his inflice and valiantnesse, as any other of his time. being one yeare Confull, did nominate and elect two other for Confuls the yeare following Scipio W afica, and Caius Martius. These two being entred into their Consulship, and sent from Rome also to their several provinces appointed them by lot. Sempronius by chance took certain litle bookes in his hand, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonics of publike facrifice; and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he neuer heard before. And this it was: That if a magistrate were fet in any tent or hired house without the city to behold obscrue the prognostications of birds, & that you any sodain occasion he were driven to come againe into the city, before the birds had given any certaine fignes: the fecond time when hereturned againe to end his observations, there was no remedy, but he must leave his tent or first hired house, and take another, and begin new observations again. Tiberius vtterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his observations twife in one self house, and had chosen there Nasica and Martius, Confuls to fucceed him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it: who would not let flip fo litle a fault, but wrote to the new Confuls, and they straight left their provinces, & returned again to Rome, willingly refigning vp their offices. That was a prety while after. Again also about the very present time we write of now, there were two Priests of noble houses (and noble persons also) the one called Gornelius, & the other Cethegus, both which were difgraded of their Priefthood, because they had not given the intrails of the sacrifised beast in order as they should have done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was difgraded of his Bishopprick, because his miter which the FLAMINS do weare, fel off his head in his sacrififing, Minnius being dictator also, and having chosen Caius Flaminius Generall of the horsemen: becausethey heard the noise of a rat at the election of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authority & other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise even in trifles, it was not by reafon of any superstition mingled with their religion; but because they would not break any iotof the ancient inflitutions & ceremonies of their country. But to our flory againe. Flaminius being deprined of his Confulfhip, Marcellus was created Conful in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus being instituted in his office, chose Cnens Cornelius for his companion and they fay, that the GAVLE's being inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME, also willing to harken to peace, Marcellus did stir vp the people, & made them defire war. Notwithstanding, they concluded peaceat that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the wars The Gaules againe. For there came ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, thirty thouland of them, and they make war iovned with the Insubrans, which were many moe in number then themselues. Now, they with Rome, being in a maruellous iollitie, went incontinently to lay fiege to the citie of Acerres, that standethypon the river of Po: and during the fiege, King Britomarus taking ten thousand Gessa- alpes. TES with him, went and destroyed all the countrey about the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left destres, a with his companion Crane Cornelius all the armed frozensor and the children of the line of the property of the propert with his companion Gneus Cornelius, all the armed footemen, and the third part of the horfmen, the riuse in his camp by Acerres: and he himselfe with the residue of the horsmen, and sixe hundred of Po. footmen light armed, marched towards the enemie, trauelling night and day, vntil he met with ten thousand Gessates, neare vnto a village of Gavle on this side & mountaines, called Cla- classidium stidium, which was subject not long before to the Romaines. So he had no leisure to take avilage reft, nor to refresh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew straight he was come, & tooke the mount for no better then by and by overcome because he had a form of the mount of the mount. him for no better then by and by ouercome, because he had so few footmen. And for his horsemen, the GAVLES made no reckoning of the for besides the selues are very good men at armes, and excel al other in that fight, yet were their number of horfmen far aboue Marcellus. Therfore they straight marched towards him in a maruellous furie, and with thundring shouts, as if they would have denoured them at their coming, Britomarus their king, advanced himfelfe before all his companie. Marcellus fearing to be compassed in behind, being so small a number: he put out the wings of his horfmen as much as he could, to have the country at large, fo that his two wings were very sleder, vntil he came neere his enemies. And being ready to gallop towards y enemy, it fortuned his horse being afraid with the noise of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus back again in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the Romaine's superstition, in taking this for an euil token, & that they wold take a conceit vpon the same: plucking the bridle with his lest hand, turned his horse head again vpo the enemy, & then he worshipped the Sun, as though he had not turned his horse by chance, but purposely for that cause. For it is the Romains maner to turne The maner about fo, when they do honor their gods. So when they began to joyne battel, he made a vow to of the Re-Impiter Feretria, to offer him vpthe goodlieft spoiles of the enemies, if he did ouercome. The king of the GAVLES seeing him at that instant, imagined by the marks & tokens he saw, that he shold worlding. bethe General of his enemies: So he fet spurs to his horse, & gallopped towards him from al his company, giving him defiance, & challenged him, shaking his staffe in his hand. He was the goodlieft person & strongest man of all the GAVLES, and his armour was all gilt & siluered, and so fet on horse forth with fundry works & colours, that it shined as the Sun. Mircellus on the other fide having viewed all the army of his enemies throughout, & perceiuing none fo richly armed as the king, timarus thought fraight it was against him, that he had made his prayer & vow to Iupiter. Then he put king of the hishorfe in full cariere against him, and came with such a force and furie to him, that he pierced his armour with his staffe, and ouerthrew him, but yet he killed him not dead whereupon he sodainely redoubled two or three strokes besides upon him, and so slue him right out. Then he starking lighted from his horse, and taking the dead Kings armour in his hand, he lift up his eyes to heauen, and said: O Inpiter Feretrian, thou that doest from heaven behold and direct all martiall sudam. feates and Captaines deeds: thy selfe I call to witnesse, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being Generall of the armie, haue flaine with my owne hands, the King and General of the to tupiter enemies; and I promise here to thee, to offer thee vp the richest spoiles of mine enemies; so thy Ferriran. godhead will vouchfafe to grant vs the like good fortune in all this warre besides. His prayer ended, the men of armes of the Romaine's ranne in among the horsemen and sootemen of the GAVLES, one being unparted from another; and Fortune did so fauour them, that they wan a passing victory, in such a strange and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer seene before nor fince, that so few horsemen did ouerthrow so great a number of men of armes and footmen ranged together. Now when Marcellus had flaine the greater number of them, and 7h: Gaules had gotten their spoiles and all their baggage, he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelins, whom he found making warres vnfortunatly with the GAVLES, before the greatest and by Marcel. most populous citie they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAVLE's on this side the mountaines take for their chiefe citie, and from whence all other had their first originall. Wherupon they did all their possible endeuour to defend it, and did as straightly besiege the Consult Cornelius, as he did them. Now when Marcellus was come to the camp againe, the GESSATES vnderfanding that their king Britomarus was flaine in battell-returned backe again into their country, 310 and the city of MILLAINE was taken. After that althe other cities thereabouts yeelded of the felues, without force of fiege, and the GAVLES wholy fubmitted them felues & all that they had to the mercy of the Romaines, who granted them peace vpon case conditions. For these mous victories, the Senate of ROME gaue all the honour of triumph vnto Marcellus onely, and that was as wonderful and worthy a fight, as any that euer past before him: what for the infinite spoiles, and the numbers of great men taken prisoners, as also for the exceeding sumptuousness. and flately flew thereof. But the goodlieft fight of all for the rareneffe, was to behold Marcellus felfe, carying on his shoulders the whole spoile of the barbarous King, to offer vp to Inpiter Fere. trian. For he had cut downe a goodly yong oke of the mountaine, straight, and shut vp very long. which he had trimmed up in forme of triumph, hanging all the aimed preces he had won of the King, very orderly round about it. Then when all the flew of his triumph was past, he himself tooke the oke vpon his shoulders, and got vp vpon his triumphant chariot, & so marched thorough the citie, carying these fignes thereupon: which was the noblest fight, and honourablest thew of the whole triumph. His army followed after the chariot, finging vertes and fongs of victory, in praise of the gods and their Captaine; and when he had passed through the wholeging & was come to the temple of Inpiter called Feretrian, there he fet vp this yong oke, and tokenof triumph, This Marcellus is the third and last ROMAINE cuptaine, to whom happened this honor in our age. For the first man that euer offered vp to Iupiter the spoiles of the General of their enemics, was king Romulus, who wan the like spoiles of Acran king of the CANINIANS. The second was Cornelius Coffus, who flue Tolumnius, Generall of the Tivs cans. And the third was Mar. cellus, who flue with his owne hands Britomarus king of the GAVLES: and after him, no man euer fince could obtain the like good fortune. The god to whom these maner of spoiles are confecrated thus, is called Impiter Feretria, to termed as fome write, because they do cary this token of triumph to him, following the derivation of this greeke word, Ferin, which fignifies to cary. for in those former times, many Greek words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirmeits one of the furnames of Inpiter, fignifying as much as lightning: for Ferire in the Latin toung, fig. retrian who nifieth to strike. And some say also, in wars it is properly to hurtor kil with his own hands for ROMAINS do vie at this day when they give a charge vpon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chase flying to cry incouraging one another, Feri, Feri, which is as much as kil kil And the spoiles taken from the enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieute. nants generall, or Generals, do take from the Generals of their enemies, when they have flaine them, they are called particularly, Spolia opima. Yet fome hold opinion that King Numa Pompilins mentioning the rich spoiles, or Spolia opima, in his commentaries, speaketh of the first, the fecond, and the third: and commandeth that the first spoiles which are wonne, should be consecrated to Inpiter Fereirian: the second vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they should give to him that had wonne the first spoiles, three hundred * Asses, the second, two hundred; and the third a hundred. But not with standing the best opinion, and vsuall taking of spolia opima, referreth them to be the first spoiles wonne in a foughten field, and those which the Lieutenant of an army, or a Generall doth take from the Generall of the enemies, after he hath flain him with his owne hands. And thus much for the declaration of this matter. Furthermore the ROMAINS were so joyfull of this victory, and of their good successe in this warre, that they can fed a maffic cup of gold to be made of the spoile they had gotten, weighing a hundred pound weight, which they fent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias, in the citie of DELPHES in token of thankes; and they made liberall division besides of the spoiles vnto their friends and confederates, and fent a great part of it vnto Hieron king of Syracy sa, who was their confederate. Not long after Hannibal being entred ITALY. Marcellus was fent with an army by fea, into Sicile. And after the great ouerthrow was given at the battell of CANNES, wherin there died fo many thousand Romaines, and that very few of them saued themselves by flying into the citic of CANNVSIVM: they looked that Hannibal having overcome the flower of all the ROMAINES youth, and their greatest force, would not faile to come straight to Rome. Wherefore Marcellus first sent fifteene hundred of his men by sea, to helpe to defend Rome: & having afterwards received commandement from the Senate he came to CANNVSIVM, where he took fuch as were fled thither for fuccour after the battell, & fo brought them out of the field to defend the countrey. Now the ROMAINS having lost the most part of all their best Captaines, in divers fundry battels before: of all those that remained, Fabius Maximus was the only able and reputed man for commendation of his honesty and wisdome, yet they misliked of him not withstanding, for a timorous man, and of no courage, as a man too ful of doubts & considerations, & lorhto put any thing in hazard: faying, he was a good captaine to defend, but notto offend the enemy. Wherupon they thought good to joyne Marcellus lively youth and courage, with Fabius feminine feare & wisdome: and therefore some yeares they chose them both Consuls together, orelsthey fent one of them as Consul, & the other as Proconsul, each in his turne, to the countrey where they had wars. And for proof hereof Pifidonius Writeth, that the Romaines at that Pofidonius time called Fabius Maximus their target, and Marcellus their sword. Therfore Hannibal himself words of faid, he feared Fabius Maximus as his gouernor, and Marcellus as his enemy; because the one kept fabius of him from hurring of others & the other did hyerro him fall I am a link to the Marcellus. him from hurting of others, & the other did hurt to himself. Immediatly after this great victory at CANNES, Hannibals fouldiers became so bold, so carelesse, and disordered, that they kept the field without feare of any thing, & dispersed themselves far fro their camp: wherfore Marcellus fetting vpon those stragglers, he slue them euery man, and so by litle & litle did still lessen the power and strength of his enemy. Afterwards he aided the cities of BIZANTIVM & of NOLA, and fablished the true denotion and lone of the Bizantines towards the Romains: from thence hewentto Nola,& found great sedition there betwixt the Senate & the people, because the Senate could not keep y people in obedience, but they would needs take Hannibals part. The cause ofthe peoples stubburnnesse grew, by occasion of agentleman of the city called Bandius, a nobie Lucius Eans. gentlemento the people, & a valiant man of his hands. This Bandius having fought valiantly at divise No. the battell of CANNES, after he had flaine many a CARTHAGINIAN, was himselfe in the end ast many striken downe, and found lying among the dead bodies, fore wounded and mangled: wherupon Hannibal greatly commending his valiantnesse, did not only let him go without ramsome, but allo gaue him rich gifts, and made him his host and friend. Hereupon Bandius at his coming home to requite Hannibals honor and courtefie, became one of those that most fauoured Hannibal; and most perswaded the people of NoLA to take his part. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus Atareellus thinking it too great a finne against the gods, to put a man to death that had made so great proof gentlenesses of his valiantnesse, and had served with the ROMAINES in their greatest warres and extremest danger, and who besides the goodnesse of his nature, had a maruellous gift also to winne mens good wils by his great courtesie: when this Bandius came one day to do his dutie to him, Marallus of purpose asked him what he was, though he had knowne him long before, only to take occasion to talke with him. The other answered him, his name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marallus feeming to be maruellous glad, and to wonder athim faid: And art thou that Bandius they speake so much of at Rome, who they say did so notable service in person at the battel of Can-RES, and neuer for fooke Paulus Emylius the Confull, but received fo many wounds upon his body in defence of him? Bandius answered, that he was the man, & therewith shewed him many wounds he had vpon his body. Marcellus then replied: Alas, thou that carieft fuch notable marks ofthy vnfained loue toward vs, what diddest thou meane, that thou camest not straight againe vinovs: art thou perswaded we are so miserable and virthankfull, that we will not worthily rewardthe vertue and valiantnesse of our friends, whom our enemies selues do honor. After Marallushad vsed this courteous speech vnto him, and had imbraced him, he gaue him a goodly horse for service in the warres, and five hundred Drachmes of silver besides. So after that time, Bandius did euer take Marcellus part, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, and Reward shewed himselfe very seuere and earnest to accuse them that tooke Hannibals part in the citie: distantes which which would be an earnest to accuse them that tooke Hannibals part in the citie: distantes the control of the control of the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which would be a control of the cities that the cities which we can be a control of the cities that the cities which we can be a control of the cities that the cities which we can be a control of the cities that the cities which we can be a control of the cities where the cities which we can be a control o which were many in number, and had conspired among themselves, that the first time the Ro- soies. MAINES should go into the field to skirmish with the enemies, they would shut the gates after them, & take the spoile of all their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treason, did set his men in battel ray within the city, hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the sumpters and cariage in good order: besides that, he made proclamation by trumpet, that no citizen vpon paine of death should approach the walles. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the citie, feeing no watch vponthe walles, and made him the bolder to come in diforder, imagining there had bene some mutiny or sedition within, betweene the noble men and the people. But in themeane time, Marcellus set open the gate being hard by, and sallying out vpon the sodaine Marcellus with the best men of armes he had, he gaue a charge vpon Hannibal in the voward. Immediatly after came out his footmen at another gate, running straight vpon Hannibal, with a wonderfull Hannibal cry and shout: so as Hannibal to withstand the, was driven to devide his men in two companies. 42 Mela, gine them any crownes or rewards of honour, for any notable service soener they did, as all Generals are wont to give to honest men that serve valiantly. This order of the Senate misliked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of Sicil B, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifest wrong, to denie him that fauour, that having done the commonwealth fuch faithfull service diverse times, as he had done, he might not restore so many poore Romaines to their honour againe. Now when Marcellus was in Sicile, he crates had before caused it to be bruited at Syracvsa, that Marcellus had put all the LEON-TINTS to the sword, not sparing litle children; and afterwards Hippocrates coming thither on the fodame, in the feare and garboile of this false bruite, he casily tooke the citie. Marcellus hea-

wholearmy, and camped hard by Syracvsa: and fent his ambaffadours to tell the Syracv-sans truly, what he had done in the citie of the LEONTINES, and quite contrary to that they were informed of. Howbeit that prevailed not, for they beleeved not Marcellus, because Hippocrates being the stronger, had won the city. Whereupon he began then to approch the wals, and made a great engine, and denice of battery, vponeight gallies chained together, to batter ý wall: trusting in the great multitude of his engines of battery, and to all such necessary provision as were not his owne fuch, as himfelfe did reckon of, to shew singularitie of worke and deuice. For those he had made, were but his recreations of Geometrie, and things done to passe the time fratine, and plaine, to the understanding of the common people by experiment, and to the benefit and commodity of vse. For this inventiue art to frame instruments and engines (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, fo highly comended and esteemed of all forts of people) were first set forth by Architas and by Eudoxus, partly to beautifie a little the science of Geometry by two lines meane proportionall, which cannot be proued by reason demonstrative: and yet notwithstanding is a principle and an accepted ground, for many things which are contained in the art of portraiture. Both of them have fashioned it to the workmanship of certaine instruments, without body, vnto things fensible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable substance, where the vile and base handy worke of man is to be employed: since that time I say, handy crast, or the art of engines, came to be separated from Geometry, and being long time disposed by the Philosophers, it came to be one of the warlike arts. But Archimedes having told king Hieron, his kinfman and very friend, that it was possible to remoue as great a weight as he would, with as little received great hurts and injuries by Hippocrates Generall of the Syracvsans:-who, to pleasure Wepocrates the Carthaginians, & by their meanes to make himselfe chiefe Lord of Syrac vsa, did put the many Romaine citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and laid fiege to the city of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by affault, he hurt neueratownes man, nor naturalleitizen of the fame: bur such traitours as he found there, who had fled from his campe, and yeelded enter the to the enemies, them he caused to be whipped; and then hanged. he had for wars, as also in his owne reputation. But Archimedes made light account of all his deuices, as indeed they were nothing comparable to the engines himselfe had invented: and yet desanted with, at the request of king Hieron: who had prayed him to call to mind a litle his Geometricall speculation, and to apply it to things corporall and sensible, and to make the reason of it demon-this finenesse; and partly to proue and confirme by materiall examples and sensible instruments, & Endow certaine Geometricall conclusions, whereof a man cannot find out the conceineable demonstrations, by enforced reasons and proofes. As that conclusion which instructeth one to search out

But after that, Plato was offended reproued with them, and maintained against them, that they did vtterly corrrupt and disgrace the worthineffe and excellency of Geometrie, making it to defeend from things not comprehensible, and and archive the defend from things not comprehensible, and task

But as he was deuiding of them, fodainly a third gate opened vpon them, fro whence all there, fidue of the ROMAINES iffued out, who fet vpon the CARTHAGINIANS on every fide, they be. ing maruelloufly amazed to be fo fodainely fet on, which they looked not for : fo having their hands full with those that came first your them, being scant able to defend themselves against them, and feeing this new and last charge also, they were forced to retire. This was the first time that euer Hannibals fouldiers began to give place to the Romain Es, who draue them back ynto their camp, and flue a great number of them, and did hurt divers of the befides. For some write there were flaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, about flue thousand, and of the ROMAINS there died not past five hundred men. But Titus Livius doth not set out the overthrow fo great, and yet confesset hthat Marcellus wan great honor by it, & that it made the ROMAINS maruellous valiant again, after so many and fundry battels as they had lost one after another for the they were perswaded that they fought not with an enemy altegether inuincible, but that he might sometime also, as wel as themselves, receive both losse & hurt. Therfore, one of the Con. fuls dying about that time, the people caused Marcellus to be sent for, & placed him in his roome. and in spite of the Senate they deferred all deputation untill his returne from the camp. Marcellus came no fooner to Rome, but he was chosen Confull in the dead mans roome, by all the voices of the people. Notwithstanding, when they went to chuse him, it thundered maruellously, which the Priests and Augures took for an ill token, but yet they durst not openly speake against his election, because they feared the people. How beit Marcellus of himself did willingly given his Confulfhip, and yet was it no exception to him for his feruice in the wars: for they created him Proconfull, and fent him againe to the camp at NoLA, where he did feuerely punish such as tooke Hannibals part who being aducrtifed therof, came thither with all possible freed to helpe them; and even at his first coming he offered Marcellus battell, which he refused at that time, Neuertheleffe he tooke his time, when Hannibal had fent the best part of his army to forage, as meaning to fight no more battels: and then he set vpon him, having given his footemenlong pikes, fuch as they vie in fight vpon the fea, and taught them also, how to hurt the enemie a farre off, keeping them still in their hands. But the CARTHAGINIANS having no skill of their pikes, and fighting with short iauelins in their hands, did strike downe-right blowes: which was the cause, that they being set upon by the Romains, were driven to turne their backes, and sie before them. So there were frue thousand of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field, some elephants flaine, and two taken aliue: and furthermore, three dayes after the battell, there came three hundred horsemen, some of them Spaniands, and other NVMIDIANS, that submitted themselves to the Romains. Never came there such a missortune before to Hannibal: who had rolled from of long time kept together in loue & amity, an army affembled of fundry barbarous nations and people. How best the fethree hundred continued ever after faithful to the end, both to Marcellus, and to all other Lieutenants and Generals of the ROMAINES. Shortly after, Marcellus being againe chosen Consult the third time, went into Sicile. For Hannibal's prosperous successed and victories, had so incouraged the CARTHAGINIANS, as they sought again to conquer this Iland; and specially because that after the death of Hieronimus the tyrant, there rose some tumultat Sy-RACVSA. Vpon which occasion the Romains had sent an army thither before, and a Prator called Appins; at whose hands Marcellus having received the army a great number of the Ro-MAINES became humble futers to him, to pray him to aid the in their calamity, which was this. Of those that scaped from the battell of CANNES, some faued themselues by flying, other were taken prisoners, of which there was such a number, as it appeared that Rome had not people inough left only to keepe the walles. Neuertheleffe, those few that remained, their hearts were fo great, that they would neuer redeeme the prisoners, which Hannibal was contented to deliver them upon final ransome, but made a decree they should not be redeemed. & so suffered some of the to be killed, others to be fold for flaues out of ITALY. And moreouer, those that faued the felues by flying, they fent straight into Sicil Ecommanding they should not set a footagain in ITALY, whileft they had wars with Hannibal. These were the men that came altogether, and fell downe at Marcellus feet, so soone as he arrived in Stetle, and humbly befought him, to appoint them to serue vnder some ensigne, that they might fight to do their country honour and seruice: promifing him with teares running downetheir cheekes, that their faithfull service then should withefle for them, that the ouerthrow they had at CANNES, fell vpon them rather by misfortune, then through lack of courage. Whereupon Marcellus having compassion on them, wrote to

314 strength as he listed to put to it and boasting himselfe thus (as they report of him) and trusting to the force of his reasons, wherewith he proued this coclusion, that if there were another globe of earth, he was able to remouethis of ours, & passe it ouer to the other: king Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this device in execution, and to make him fee by experience Archimedes fome great & heavy weight removed by little force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greatest carects or hulkes of the king, (that to draw it to the shore out of the water, re. quired a maruellous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done fo) and put a great number of men moreinto her, then her ordinary burthen; and he himselfe sitting alone at routes the position his ease afar off, without any straining at all, drawing the end of an engine with many wheeles & had, aftere and foftly with his hand, made it come as gently and fmoothly to him, as it had floted in the sea. The king wondring to see that fight, and knowing by proofe the greatnesse of his art: he prayed him to make him some engines, both to affault and defend in all manner of sieges and affaults. So Archimedes made him many engines, but king Hieron neuer occupied any of them, because he raigned the most part of his time in peace, without any wars. But this prouision and munition of engines, served the Syracysans turne maruellously at that time: and not only the prouision of the engines ready made, but also the enginer and work-master himself that had invented them. Now the Syracvsans feeing themselves affaulted by the Romains both by sea and by land, were maruellously perplexed, and could not tell what to say, they were soafraid:imagining it was impossible for them to withstand so great an army. But when Archimedic fell to handle his engines, and to fet them at liberty, there flue in the aire infinit kinds of shot, and maruellous great stones, with an incredible noise and force on the sodaine, vpon the sootemen that came to affault the citie by land, bearing down, and tearing in peeces all those which came against the, or in what place so ever they lighted, no earthly body being able to resist the violen of so heavy a weight so that all their ranks were maruellously disordered. And as for the gallies that gaue affault by sea, some were sunke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of slips, where they fastentheir sayles, which were sodainly blown ouer the wals with force of theseen. gines into their gallies, and so sunke them by their ouer great weight. Other being hoissed vpby the proocs with hands of Iron, and hookes made like cranes bils, plunged their poupes into the sca. Other being taken vp with certaine engines fastened within one contrary to another, made them turne in the aire like a whirlegig, and to cast them vpon the rockes by the towne wals, and fplitted them all to fitters, to the great spoile and murther of the persons that were within them, And sometimes the ships and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a feareful thing to fee them hang and turne in the aire as they did: vntill that casting their men within them ouer the hatches, some here, some there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be emptie, and to breake against the wals, or else to fall into the sea againe, when their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought against the walles, vpon a bridge made of gallies ioynedtogether: that was called Sambuca, by reason of the fashion it had like to an instrument of musicke of the same name, which is a harpe. The same being yet a good pretie way of from the wals, there fell a great stone upon it sent from the wals, weighing tentalents: then a fecond after that, & a third one after that, the which falling all into this engine with fuch a thunder and terrible tempest, brake the foundation of the engine, and tore all v bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that fustained it. So that Marcellus being amazed withal, not knowing well what it meant, was glad to retire quickly, and fent to make his trumpet found the retraitto those that gaue affault by land. Herupon they sate in councell to determine what was to bedone, & they refolued, that the next morning before day they should approch the wals if it were polfible:because that Archimedes engines, which were very strong and hard wound vp, should by this meanes fend all the force and furic of their stones and shot over their heads, and that neare hand also he could do no good with them, for that they had not the scope of their levell and cariage they should have. But Archimedes had prevented this device by long preparation before, having made provision of engines for far and neare, the levell and carriage whereof was proportioned for all distances: their short short, their arrowes not very long, many holes & arches in the walles one hard by another, where there were store of crosbowes to kill neare at hand, set in fuch places, as the enemies could not fee them without. Wherefore, when the Romaines thought to approch, thinking they had bene fafe and close, that no man faw them: it amazed the all when they were received againe with infinite shot, and striken to the ground with stones that fell ypon their heads like lead: (for there was no part of all the walls, from whence they had nor the like shot.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retire from the wals. And yet when they were further off from them, the arrowes, stones, and other kinde of shot, that slue in enery place among them, killed a great number of them, scattered farre from thence : so that many of them were flaine and fore wounded, and diverse of their ships splitted, and they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, because Archimedes had placed his engines very closely behind the wals, and not vpon the wals in fight of the enemy. So that it appeared the gods fought against the Romaines, they were so slaine and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstanding, Marcellus escaped with life, safe from hurt, and mocking his workemasters and enginers he had in his campe, he said vnto them: What shall we not leaue to make wars with this Briarian enginer and Geometrician here: who fitting stil vpon the wharfe in sporting manner hath with shame ouerthrowne our nauic, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred hands of the Giants, discharging at one instant so many shot among vs. For indeed, all the refidue of the Syracveans, were as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he gines. himselfe was the only creature that moued and did all, all weapons else being quiet, and his ensines onely occupied, to affault and defend, At the length Marcellus feeing his men thus afcard, as if they did but fee the end of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archemedis was letting loofe fome of his engines vpon them: he would no more approch the wals, nor give affault, determining to fee if he could win it by long fiege. Notwithstanding, Archimedes had such a great mind, and was so profoundly learned, having hidden Archime. in him the onely treasure and secrets of Geometricall inventions, as he would never set foorth any booke how to make all these warlike engines, which wan him at that time the same and glory, not of mans knowledge, but rather of divine wisedome. But he esteeming all kind of handicraft and invention to make engines, and generally all maner of sciences bringing common comoditie by the vse of them, to be but vile, beggerie, and mercenarie drosse: emploied his wit& studie only to write things, the beauty and subtilty whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with necessity. For all that he hath written, are geometricall propositions, which are without comparison of any other writings what societ because the subject whereof they treate, doth appeare by demonstration, the matter giving them the grace and the greatnesse, and the demonfiration prouing it so exquisitly, with wonderful reason and facilitie, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written, in more plain and fimple tearmes, and by more case principles, then those which he hath invented. Now fome do impute this, to the sharpnesse of his wit and vnderstanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre itto the extreme paines he tooke, which made these things come so eafily from him, that they feemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man living of himself can deuise the demonstration of his propositions, what paine socuer he take to seeke it: and yet straight so soone as he cometh to declare and open it, every man then imagineth with himself he could have found it out well enough, he can then so plainely make demonstration of the thing he meaneth to shew. And therfore that me thinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him; that he was so rauished & drunke with the sweet enticements of this Syren, which Archimeter as it were lay continually with him, as he forgot his meate & drink, and was careleffe otherwife Spen. of himfelf, that oftentimes his feruants got him against his will to the baths, to wash and annoint him:and yet being there, he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures, cuen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with oyles and fweete fauours, with his finger he did draw lines vpon his nakedbody: To far was he taken fro himfelfe, & brought into an extasse or traunce, with the delight he had in the study of Geometrie, being ranished with the loue of the Muses. But among many notable things he deuised, it appeareth, that they most esteemed the demonstration of the proportion between the Cylinder (to wit, the round colomne) and the sphære or globe contained in the same; for he prayed his kinsmen and demonstrate friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder vpon his tombe, containing a massic sphere, with an inscription of the proportion, whereof the continent exceedeth the thing contained. So Archimedes being as you have heard, did asmuch as lay in him, both to save himselfe and Syracvs a from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the fiege at Syraevsa, wan the citie of MEGARES in Stelle, one of the ancientest cities in all the Hand: and he Marzellus took befides, the camp of Hippecrates, lying by Aciles, where he flue about 8000 men, furprisite in fing them vpon the sodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge, and to fortific their campe. Then he ouercame a great part of the champion country of SICILE, & made thecities to rebel that tooke the Carthaginian's part: and in all the battels he fought, he euer ouercame them that durft bid him battel. It chanced afterwards, that he took a LACED EMONIAN captain priso. ner, called Danippus: cuen as he came out of Syracysa by fea. The Syracysan's defirous to redeeme him, lent to him to pray he might be ransomed. They made many parlees about his ransome, and drew out this practise to dinerse meetings: vntill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certainer ower, that had no great watch kept you it, and into the which he might secretly convey a certaine number of men, the wall of the citie in that place being no very hard thing to fcale. Therefore when he had given a good geffe by estimation at the height of that tower, by of. ten approaching to it, having parleed many a time hard by it he provided skaling ladders, and tooke the oportunity of a feast which the Syracvsans solemnized in the honour of Diana, on which day they gaue the selues to al feasting sporting & playes. So he took not only the towerbut filled all the wals round about with armed men before day, & brake open the maine gate & entry of the city called Hexapile. And as the Syracvsans began to stirre, perceiuing the Ro-MAINES on the wals, Marcellus made his men found their trumpets on enery fide. Whereupon the Syracysans were fo affraid and amazed, that they began to fly, thinking although besides had bene taken, where indeed the greatest and strongest quarter of the city called ACRADINA. was not yet touched: because it is walled in round about, and separated from the rest of the city, which is denided into two other parts, the one called the new city, & the other fortune. The two parts wherof being won, Marcellus by the breake of the day forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapile. And when his captaines told him he was happy to win fo goodly a city fo eafily they fay that he (looking about him, and confidering the great neffe and stateline ffe of the same) wept for very pitie, forefeeing whereto it should come, thinking with himselfe what a sudaine change it should have, when his army came to spoile & sacke the same. For there was not a captain that durst deny the souldiers when they demanded the spoile, and yet were there many that would needs haue it burnt and rased to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any case, and befides, it was fore against his mind to grant them the spoile of the goods & slaues: straightly commanding them not with standing, not to lay hands on any free man, & not to kil, hurt nor to make any Syracvsan flaue. Wherein, though he shewed great fauor and mercy, yet it grieued him to fee fo famous a city, brought to that miserable state; and in the midst of all the iow he had for his victorie, he could not refraine from weeping for pitie to see so rich and welthiea citic, in the turning of a hand, spoiled and brought to nought. For it is faid, that the riches and goods taken away at the facke of Syracvsa, were nothing inferiour to the spoiles of Can-THAGE, which was also sacked not long after that; for the other part of the city of Syracvsa called AGRADINA, was soone after also taken by treason, and spoiled against the captains wilk, fauing the kings treasure, which was reserved to be caried to the comon treasure of Rome. Sy-RACVEA being taken, nothing grieued Marcellus more, then the loffe of Archimedes: who being in his study when the citie was taken, bufily seeking out by himselfethe demonstration of some Geometricall proposition which he had drawne in figure, and so carnestly occupied therein, as he neuer faw nor heardany noise of enemies that ran vp and downe the citie, and much lesse knew it was taken: he wondred when he faw a fouldier by him, that bade him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithstanding, he spake to the souldier, and bade him tarie vntill he had done his conclusion, and brought it to demonstration; but the fouldier being angry with his answer, drew out his fword and killed him. Other fay, that the Romaine fouldier when he came, offered the fwords point to him to kill him and that Archimedes when he faw him, prayed him to hold his Archimedes hand a litle, that he might not leave the matter he looked for unperfect, without demonstration, But the foldier making no reckoning of his speculatio, killed him presently. It is reported athird way also, saying, that certain souldiers met him in the streets going to Marcellus, carying certain Mathematicall instruments in a little prety coffer, as dials for the Sun, sphæres & angles, wherewith they measure the greatnesse of the body of the Sun by view: and they supposing he hadcaried some gold or silver, or other precious iewels in that litle coffer, slue him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was maruellous fory for his death, and euer after hated the villaine that flue him, as a curfed and execrable perfon: & how he made also maruellous much afterwards of Archimedes kinsimen for his sake. The Romaines were esteemed of at that time by all nations, for maruellous maruellous expert fouldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be delt with: but they neuer shewed any example of their clemencie and courteste, and lest of all of any civill maner to any strangers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whose acts did shew the Grecians then, that the ROMAINES were more gracious and mercifull then they. For hedid so courteoully intreate those that had to do with him, & shewed such fauour to private persons, and also to whole cities: that if there were any crueltie shewed in the cities of Enna, or at Megares, or against the Syracvsans, it was rather through their own fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for proofe hereof, I will recite you one example only among many. There is a citie in Sicile called Engrium, it is no great thing, but a very ancient citie Engrium a of name, by reason of the trafficke thither, for that there are certain goddesses to be seene, whom citie in Si. they worship, called the mothers. Some say the CRBTANS were the first builders and founders etc. of the temple there, where you shall see speares and helmets of copper, and vpon them are granen the name of Meriones: and vpon others, Viffes name also, which are consecrated to these goddeffes. This citie stood altogether at the devotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias beingthe chiefest man of the same, was all he might against it, and perswaded them openly in all their councels to take part with the ROMAINES, prouing it by many reasons, that his enemies counselling the contrarie, were unprofitable members of the common wealth. Wherupon Niciasenemies fearing his greatnesse and authority, they did conspire among themselves to apprehendhim, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias hearing of fuch a matter, and finding that they lay in waite to take him, vied this policy to preuent their treason. He gaue out Wicios openly very ill speeches against the goddesses, and did many things in derogation of their honour: and faid the fight of them (which was a matter of great credite) was but a deuice, and that there was no credit to be given to them. These words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the mischiefethey pretended against him, to himselfe, as the onely causer of his ownchurt. So they having appointed a day to apprehend him, by chance a common councell was kept that day they had determined of: where Nicias speaking to the people about matters of counsell, in the midest of his oration he fell to the ground, to the great wonder of thewhole affembly, as enery man may coniecture. Howbeit, neuer a man stirred, and a pretie while after he began to lift vp his head alitle, and to looke gaftly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he still gathered higher and lowder by litle and litle, vntil he saw all the peoplewonderoufly affraid and amazed, that not one of them durst speake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and rantowards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddeffes mothers did torment him: and not a man durst once come neare him, nor offer to stop him, they were so superstitious & soolishly affraid of the goddesses, imagining it was some divine punishment. But by this means he cassly got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all, and he was neuer scene after that time, to do or speake like a madman in any thing. His wifethat was made privile to his device, and furthered his intent, went first and fell downe on her knees before the goddesses mothers in the temple, as she had heartily prayed vnto them : and faining afterwards the would go feeke her husband, that ran vp & down the fields like a mad man, she went out of the citie with her little children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they escape without danger, & went unto Marcellus to Syracvsa. The Engie-MIANS afterwards played fuch infolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and caused them all to be taken and bound, as though he would have put the to execution, But Nicias came tohim with teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kiffing his hands, befought him to take pity vpo his poore citizens, beginning first with those that were his greatest enemies. This good nature of Nicias fo pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, and did no hurt to the city, & gaue Nicias certain land, befides many other rich gifts he bestowed vpon him. Thus it is reported in the historie of Pisidonius the Philosopher. Now Marcellus being sent for home Marcellus by the Romaines, because they had wars in their owne country, and euen at Rome gates: he that departed out of Sicile returning towards Rome, and caried the goodlieft tables, pictures, and breaght in statues, and other fuch ornaments as were in Syracvsa, meaning first to beautific his triumph finance with them, and to leaue them afterwards for an ornament to Rome, which before that time nener knew what fuch curious works meant. For, this finencise, and curious tables & imagery, nener came into Romb before, but was throughly fet out with armour and weapons of barbarous people, and with bloudy spoiles, and was also crowned with monuments of victories & triumphs of Syracus.

was an oxe and he that by force, and bloudy battel had obtained victory, only offered vp a cock for facrifice. For though they were very good foldiers, yet they thought better of his feruice, that by his wildome & wife perswasions obtained victory, then of his, that wan it by valiantnes, & force of armes. Thus you may fee which of these two law-makers had best reason by his or-

inflice. The other Conful that was prefent rebuked the being angry that they had so maliciously foied the occasion of Marcellus absence. But when Marcellus heard of it, he straight left off all, & came to the Senate, and first fate him downe in his Consuls chaire, where he gaue audience as Confull and dispatched divers causes: when he had so done, he rose out of his chaire and came downe among them, standing as a private person to answer at the barre, as other offenders and menaccused, fusfering the Syracvsans to alledge and say against him what they would. The werethe Syracus and his staied countenance in all things: and as they had found him before a very valiant man in wars, and vnconque-rable, they found him then a man no leffe dreadfull in his Confuls robe; so that they hung down their heads, & durst not looke him in the face. Notwithstanding, they being suborned by his encmies, began at the length boldly to accuse him, andyet with forrow and lamentation, the effect

inimies at Marcellus hands, as al other Generals neuer offered their very enemies. Wherto Marthe tyrants had compelled them to make wars: when they to the contrary because they would enter into wars, were contented to be subject to a tyrant. So, when both parties had spoken their minds, the Syraevsans (as the manner is) went out of the Senate house, and Marcellus also, leauing his fellow Consul in his place in the Senate; & taried without the doore, attending the sen-whethe Senators voices were gathered together, & that Marcellus was cleared by most voices:

then the Syrac vs ans fell down at his feet weeping, & befought him not to wreake his anger vpon them that were present, & moreover that he would have compassion on the residue of the citizens, who didacknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confessed them-the liberty & benefit of their own laws, & quietly enjoy their goods also which were left them,

To requite the special grace procured them by Marcellus, the Synacus ans gaue him many honors, and among others they made a law, that cuer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or house

of diuerse enemies, which were no pleasant, but rather feareful sights to looke vpon, farre vnsi for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminodas called the plain of Bozotia, Mars his scaffold, where he kept his games: and Xenophon also called the city of EPHESVS, the armorers shop: even so me thinkes (as Pindarus faid) they might rightly have termed Rome, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wan the peoples good wils much more to Marcellus, because he did so passingly set forth Rome with such excellent fine toyes of Greee. But Fabius Maximus on the other fide, was better beloued of the old men: because he brought no such toyes with him from thecity of TARENTYM, when he wan it. Indeed he brought away gold and ready coine, and much o. ther goods that were profitable; but for images and tables, he left them standing in their places. speaking a thing of great note. Let vs leaue the TARENTINEs their gods offended with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, faying, that by this act he had purchased Rome great malice & hate. First, because he did not only leade men prisoners in his tri. umph, but the gods also: and secondly, because he had filled the people full of prittle prattle, and idle curiofitie, spending all the whole day in gazing, and wondering at the excellencie of the workemen, and of the works; where before they would fall to their labour, or else they went the wars, not being acquainted with curiofitie, nor idle life, as Euripides faid, speaking of Herculer.

had taught the ROMAINES to effective the wonderful works of GRECE, which they knew not before. But at his returne out of Sicile, his enemies procuted, that his honour of triumph was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to do in Sicilb, and that the war was not altogether ended, and fearing besides lest a third triumph would make him too much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honor of the great triumph in the mountaine of ALBA only and of the litle triumph, in the city of ROME. This maner of lientratinto tle triumph is called in Greek Enan, and the Romaine's call it Onatie. And this difference there is betweene them: that in the Ouation triumph, the party to whom it is granted, doth not enter into the city vpon a triumphing charior drawne with foure horses, nor doth cary any lawrelt vpon his head in token of triumph, nor hath any trumpets or hornes blown before him, but doth march on foot with a paire of flippers on his feete, having flutes and howbowes playing before him, and wearing a garland of firre tree vpon his head: so as this maner of entries nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasant then fearefull sight. Whereby it plainely appeareth, that these two kindes of entries they granted to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victoric, were distinguished in the old time, rather by themanner, then by the greatnesse of their doings. For fuch as had ouercome their enemies by great flaughter and bloudy battels, they did make their entrie with pompe of triumph, that was altogether martiall and terrible, followed with their fouldiers arined, and crowned with lawrell garlands, as their custome was in mustering their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary fide that without any exploit of arms returned home with victory, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law granted them the honour of Onation triumph, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an instrument of pleasure belonging to peace, and the firretree is a tree confecrated to Venus, which goddeffe, about all gods and goddeffes doth most detest warres. This fecond kind of entrie was called ouation, not as many GRECIANS have taken it, coming of this word Enan, which is a voice and fong of ioy, although they did vse also to accompany the The facility. GRECIANS that would have fetched the derivation of this word, from an old common cucustomes of Rome) one or divers oxen; where at the second triumph called the Ouation, he

In wicked practifes be simple was to see, But be exceld in vertuous deeds, and feates that worthy be. Notwithstanding, Marcellus did glory amongst the GRECIANS themselves: saying that he Captaines making their entrie in this fort, crying, and finging Euan: but there were certaine frome they had: and were of opinion befides, that part of this honour did appertaine to god Bacchus, whose furname we call Enius, and sometimes Triambus, Howbeit this is not the true derivation of the name, but after this fort. At the great triumph and entry made, the captaine or generall that triumpheth as a Conqueror, did offer and facrifife (by the old orders and ancient only facrififed a mutton, which the Romain Bs call in their tongue ouem, and there of it was called Ouasion. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the law-maker of the ROMAINE lawes and cultomes, and the law-maker of the LACED EMONIANS: how each of the was contrary to the other, in appointing the facrifices for victory. For at Sparta, the captaine

He being chosen Consul the fourth time, his enemies and cuil willers did stirre vp the Syracus and against him, and persuaded them to complaine to The Syrathe Senate of him, that he had cruelly and vncourteoufly vied them, contrary to the ancient cofam acleague and alliances made long before with the Romaines. Marcellus being facrificing one day cufe Marinthe Capitoll, while the Senate were fet in counfell, the Syracvsans deputies came before

obedience of the Romains: and those he wan againe with a great provision of corne and month he found in the, besides 3000. souldiers Hannibal left in garrison there, whom he took prisoners: Hannibal after that, having flaine the Viceconfull Cnew Fuluius in Apvlia, with eleven Tribu. ni militum (to wit, Colonels, every one having the charge of a 1000. footmen, and overthrown the greatest part of his armic: Marcellus wrote letters to Rome, hoping to comfort the Senate & people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant the he would drive Hannibal out of App. LIA. Whethe Romains had read his letters, they were nothing the more coforted, but rather (as Ling writeth) more afraid & discouraged: because they doubted the danger to come wold be greater then the losse past, taking Marcellus to be a far greater & better General, then euer was Fuluius. Neuerthelesse, Marcellus performing the contents of his letters written to Rome, drane Hannibal out of APVLIA, and made him retire into LVCANIA. And Marcellus finding him in that country, by a city called Numistron, lodged upon hils, & in place of strength and aduan tage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the first that presented his enemy battel. Hannibal on the other fide, came down into the valley, and they joyned battell. which was fo cruelly fought, and fo long time, as it could not be differred who had the better. For the battel being begun at nine of the clocke in the morning, twas darke night ere they game ouer. The next morning by peepe of day, Marcellus fet his men againe in battell ray, in the mid. dest of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the field, and challenged Hannibal, to proue who should have the field, but Hannibal refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus there. by had good leifure left him to ftrip his flain enemies, & alfo to bury his own fouldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemy by the foot, who laid many ambushes for him, but he could neuer trap him in any: and in every incounter or skirmish they had together Marcellus had euer the better, which wan him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to chuse new Consuls, the Senatethought good to send rather for the other Consulthat was in Sicile, then to remove Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hannibal. So when the other Confull was come to Rome, the Senate commanded him to name Quintus Fuluing Dicator, because the Dicator was neither chosen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Prators, in open assembly of the people, nameth such a one Distator as he liketh futor Pera- of. Wherefore it feemeth, that this word Dictator, came vponthat word, naming: for, Dicere in the ROMAINE tong, fignifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dichtor, because he commandeth of himselfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, & the voices of the people; and this feemeth to be true, because the commandements of the Senate of Rome are called Edicta, which the Greecians call Diatagmata. Now the other Confull and copanion of Marcellus being come out of Sicile, he would need sname another Dictator then him whom the Senate offered him: and because he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do he stole away one night, and returned again into Sicile. Herupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fulnius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their leters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, & authorized the peoples electio. So he himself was chofen again Proconful for the next yeare following: in the which he having conferred with Fabius Maximus about the wars, they were agreed, that Fabius should proue if he could win the cities TARENTYM againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time should keepe Hannibal occupied, that he might not come to aid it. This resolution being taken betweene them, Marcellus went to meet Hannibal by the city of CANNVSIVM: who as he still changed and shifted lodging, because he would not come to the battell against his will, found Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Insomuch as Hannibal remouing thus his campe, Marcellus plied him fo one day with continuall alarums & skirmishes, that he brought him to a battel that held all day long till night, & compelled them both to leaue off till the next morning where Marcellus shewed again in field by breakeof the day, in battel ray. Wherat Hanibal being in a maruellous rage, he called his foldiers together & made an oration to the, earnestly moving the once again to fight with Marcellus, if everthey had heretofore fought for his fake. You fee, faid he, that having fought fo many battels, & gotte fuch victories as we have done, we canot yet take breath as we wold, nor be in quiet, how much focuer we win, if we drive not away yonder fellow Marcellus. Whe Hannibal had ended his oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, heled the onto the battel: where Marcellus, to no purpose, & out of time, would needs shew Hannibal a stratageme of war, that turned to himselfe the worst. For Marcellus perceiuing the right wing of his army distressed, made one of his legions that was set in ray in the rereward of his hoast, to march to the front of his battel, to helpe those that needed aid. But this remouing of the legion, troubled them that fought, & gaue the enemies the victo- Marcellut ry; who flue that day two thousand seuen hundred of the Romain Bs. So, when Marcellus was ouer branch come againe into his campe, he straight called his fouldiers before him, to whom he spake in this unbarren by maner: That he faw a great deale of armour, and bodies of men, but he could fee no ROMAINS. The ROMAINES hearing him fay to, befought him to pardon the fault they had committed. hard wards Marcellus answered, he would never pardon them, so long as they were overcome: but whe shey ouercame again, he was content to remital. So the next morning he agreed to bring them again to fight with the enemie, that fuch as were at Rom & should rather heare newes of their victorie. then of their running away. When he had faid, he appointed they should give those bands that first turned their backes to Hannibal, barly for wheate. So as though many of them were in great danger of their lives, for the fore wounds they had received in the battell: yet there was not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieue the then the grieuous wounds they had. The next morning betimes was fet out of the Generals tent, the coat armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary figne of battel. & the bands that had received dishonor the day before, were placed atheir owne request in the front of the battel. The other Captaines besides, that were not ourthrowne, did leade their bands also to the field, and did fet them in battel ray. Hannibal hearing of that cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that cannot be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune for he is the only odde man, that never giveth rest to his enimies, when he hath overcome Marcellee. him, nortaketh any for himfelfe when he is ouercome. We shall neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I fee, fith shame, whether he win or lose, doth stil prouoke him to be bolder and valianter. After orations made of both fides, both armies marched forwards to joyne battell. The Romains being as strong as the Carthaginians, Hannibal put his Elephants in the voward and front of his battell, and commanded his men to drive the vpon the Romains and fo mibal and they did. Which in deed did somewhat trouble and disorder the first rankes of the Romains: The worst, vntill fuch time as Flauius Tribune of the fouldiers, tooke an enfigne in his hands, and marched at of Fla before the beafts, and gaue the first of them such a thrust with the point of his ensigne, that he was reflected made her turne back. The first beast being turned back thus, ran vponthe second that followed turn. her, and the second made the third go backe also, and so from one to another, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiuing that, commanded his horfemen to fet vpon the enemies with all the fury they could in that place where he faw them somewhat troubled with these beasts, that turmed backe againe upon them; and that they should drive them further in among st them. Which they did, and gaue io hot a charge vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their "idors of backes and run away, and they purfued them still, killing them downe right, even to their camp side:where was the greatest slaughter of all, by reason their Elephantes that were wounded, fell downe starke dead within the gate of their camp. And they fay, of the CARTHAGINIANS there were flaine at this battel, about eight thousand, and of the Romains only three thousand; howbeitall the rest of them for the most part were very fore hurt. Which fel out very well for Hannibal, that he might march away at his pleasure, as he did that night, & got him away far off fro Marcellus, as knowing he was not in state to follow him over sodainly, because of the great number of hurt men in his camp; and fo by small journies he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in Hamiltal garrifon althe Sommer, in the citic of SINVESSE, to heale the wounds of his fore mangled foldiers. Hannibal having now gotten himselfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, and having his corn Siarmy free to ferue him as he thought good he burned and destroyed all ITALY where he went, and flood no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill spoken of at Rome, and caused his enemies to take hold of fuch a matter against him for they straight raised Publius Bibulus Tri- P Bibulus bune to accuse him, who was a hot harebraine man, but very cloquent, and could deliuer his 17thune of mind very wel. So this Bibulus called the people of to counfel, & told the there, that they must needs call home Marcellus, & apppoint fome other to take the charge of the army: for as for him, Marcellus, faid he because he hath fought a litle with Hannibal (and as a man might say, wrestled a litle with him)he is now gotten to the bathes to folace him felf. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieuze nants in the camp, & went himfelf to Rome, to answer to y vntrue accusations laid against him and there he perceived at his comming how they intended to profecute the matter against him vpo these informatios. So a day of hearing was appointed for his matter, & the parties came be. Chron Flat fore the people affebled in coucel, in the great lifts or shew place, called Circus Flaminius, to give minus, iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, fitting in his chaire, laid open his accufation with great circumstance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had told his tale, answered him in a few words, and very discreetly, onely touching his purgation. But the noble and chiefe men of the citie rose vp and spake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainly that they did Marcellus wrone. to reckon worse of his valiantnesse, then their enemy did and to judge of him as a coward, confi dering Hannibal onely fled from him, of all other captaines, and would by no means fight with himmeuer refusing to fight with any other whatsocuer. These perswasions tooke such effect, as where Marcellus accuser looked for his condemnation, Marcellus to the contrary, was not onely cleared of his accusation, but furthermore, they chose him Consull again the fift time. So being entred into his office, he wet first into THVSCAN: where visiting y good cities one after another. and quieting the he pacified a great fedition in the country, when they were all ready to rife. rebel. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to confecrate the temple of honor & vertue, which Thetemples he had built with the spoiles he got in the wars of Sicile. But y Priests were against it, saying, of bonor two gods might not be in one church. Thereupon he built another temple, and joyned it to the first, being very angry the Priests denied so his consecration; and he did take it for an euill token. besides divers others signes in the element that afterwards appeared, & troubled him much. For there were many temples set on fire with lightning at one time: & the rats & mice did gnaw the gold that was in the chappell of Inpiter Capitoline. And it is reported also, that an oxe did speake and a child came out of the head of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Priests & Soochsayers, sacrificing to the gods, to withdraw the enil from them these sinistertokens did threaten: they could neuer find any fauourable fignes in their facrifices. Whereupon they fought to keep Marcellus still at Rome, who had a maruellous earnest desire to be gone with speed to the wars: for neuer man longed for any thing so much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hannibal. In somuch he neuer dreamed other thing in the night, nor spake of any matter elsein the day to his friends & copanions, nor prayed to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hannibal in the field and I thinke he would willingly have fought a private combat with him, in some walled city or inclosed lists for the combat. And had it not bin that he had already won himselfe a great fame, & shewed himselfe to the world (by fundry great proofes and experience of his doings) a graue, skilfull, and valiant captaine as any man of his time: I would haue faid it had bin a pang of youth, and a more ambitious defire, then became a man of his age, who was threefcore yeares old at that time, when they made him Confull againe the fift time. Neuertheles, after he had ended al his propitiatory facrifices, & purifications, such as the soothfayers had appointed, he departed from Rome with his fellow Conful Quintus Chrispinus tothe wars. He found Hamibal lying betweene the cities of BANCIA, and VENOVSA, and foughtall nus couful, the means he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. Howbeit Hannibal being aducrtised by spials, that the Consuls set an army to besiege the city of the Localans furnamed Epizephyrians (as you wold fay) the occidetals, because the Grecians in respect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he laid an ambush for them that went, vnder the hill of PETELIVM, which was directly in their way, where he flue about two thousand flue hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did fet Marcellus on fire, and make him more defirous of battell: whereupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his enemie. Between their two camps there was a prety litle hil, strong of situation, a wild thing ouergrown with wood: and there was high hillockes, from whence they might difcerne a great way, both the one and the others camps, and at the foot of the same ran prety springs: insomuch as the Ro-MAINES Wondred, that Hannibal coming thither first, did not take that place, but had left itto his enemies. Howbeit Hannibal was craftic enough, leaving it of purpole for as it was commodious to lodge his campe, so it served his turne better for an ambush. So he filled the wood, the hollow places, & the vallies thereabout, with store of shot and spearemen, assuring himself that the place would intice the Romaines thither: and indeed he geffed rightly, for foit fell out. Straight there flue a rumour abroade in the Romaine's campe, that there was a paffing placeto bodge in, and euery man tooke vpon him like a skilful fouldier, to tell what vantage they should haue vpontheir enemies by taking that place, and specially if they did lodge there, or otherwise built a fort vponit. Whereupon Marcellus determined togo fee the place himselfe, taking a few horsemen with him. Notwithstanding, before he would take horse, he called for his soothsayer to facrifise to the gods. The first beast that was facrifised, the Soothiaver shewed Marcellus the liver of it without a head. The second beast facrificed, had a faire great head of a liver, and all the other parts were also found, & very new; that by them it appeared all the feare of the first signes and tokens were taken away. Yet the foothfayers on the other fide faid, it did make them worfe afraid then before for these so fauourable and luckie tokens of the sacrifice, following immedially after the first foule and naughty signes, made them doubt them much, by reason of so frange and fodaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus faith:

So Marcellus tooke his horse, with Quintus Chrispinus his fellow Confull, and his son one of the Tribunes of the foldiers, having only two hundred & twenty horsemen with him, of the which chrispinus there was not one Romain a among the but all were Thy's can's fauing forty Fregellani- file come ANS, who from the beginning of these warres, had alwaies she wed themselves very faithfull and Marcellee. louing to Marcellus. The hill we spake of before, being thicke covered with wood & bushes, the enemies had fet a skout to watch on the top of it, to give warning if they faw any coming towards it. The ROMAINE'S could not fee him, and he on the other fide might fee cuen into their campe, and perceive what was done: as he did advertise those at that time that lay in ambush for Marcellus coming : and they fuffered him to passe on, vntill he came directly against them. Then they shewed upon the sodain, and compassing in Marcellus, they both shot & strake at him, fome following them that fled, &other fighting with the forty FREGELIANIANS which only flucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithstanding the Thyscans were sled) vpon the first crie they hard, to defend the two Consuls, wntill such time as the consuls Chrispinus hauing two wounds on his body with a dart, did turne his horfe to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus fuch a fore blow with a speare having a broad iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left aliue, being but a few in number, secing Marcellus flaine, left him lying on the ground, and tooke his sonne away with them, that was very fore hurt, and by the swiftnesse of their horses recoursed their camp, & saued themselves, ambufo at At this ouerthrow, there were not flaine aboue forty men, and flue and twenty taken prisoners, the bill of of which fine of them were the Confuls forgeant, & their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horesemen. Within few dayes after, the other Consul Crispinus died also of his hurts, which was such a misfortune, as never came before to the Romaines, that both factings their Consuls were flaine at one battel. Now Hannibal made no great reckoning of all that were wus flaine. flaine, or taken at this field: but when he hard that Marcellus felfe was flaine at this ouerthrow, he went himself straight to the place to see him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, fanding hard by it, and confidering his strength, his stature, and countenance, having taken fulf view of all the parts of him, he spake no proud words against him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as fome other would have done, that had flaine fo valiant and dangerous an enemie: but wondering how he came to be flaine fo strangely there, he tooke of his ring from one of his fingers that fealed his letters, and giving his body buriall according to his estate, made it to be honourably burnt, and then put all his bones and ashes into a filuer pot, on which he himfelfepura crowne of gold, and fent it vnto Marcellus fonne. It fortuned to, that certaine light horsemen of the NVMIDIANS met with them that caried this silver pot, & would have taken it Marcellus from them by force, but they frood to it, and would not part withall, and fo fighting and striuing forced by together for it, the bones and ashes were scattered all about. Hannibal hearing this, said to them Hannibal. that were about him: See, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So he punished the NVMIDIANS, & cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perswaded himself it was the will of their gods he should die so strangely, & that his body should have no burial. Cornelius Nepos, & Valerius Maximus write it thus but Liny and Augustus Cafar fay, that the pot was caried vnto his fonne, and honorably buried. Marcellus did confectate many monuments in divers pla-Marcellus CCS, befides those at Rome. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for yong mento exercise them- monuments selves in. In the Ile of Samothracia, in the temples of the gods called Cabires; many images and tables he brought from Swacvsa. And in the Ile of Lindos, in the temple of Minerua, where among other, there is a statue of his, and this Epigramme grauen under it, as Posidonius the Philosopher writeth:

O thou my friend (I fay) which passes forth by me, Of Claudius Marcellus bere, the image mayft thou fee: Whose family at Rome, was of the noblest name. Seventimes he Consull chosen was, in which he overcame Great numbers infinite, (in open field and fight) Of such as sought his countries spoile, and put them all to flight.

The Author of this Epigramme reckoneth the two times of his being Viceconfull, for two whole Confulships: but his posteritie continued alwayes in great honour, vnto Marcellus the fonne of Octania, (Augustus Casars fister) and of Caius Marcellus. He died a yong man, being A. dilis of Rome, and maried vnto Iulia, Augustus daughter, with whom he lived no long time. But to honour the memorie of him, Octania his mother built the Library, and Augustus Casar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and Library.

Pelopidas and Marcello acts in warres.

Hese are the greatest things and best worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings; and for their maners and natural conditions otherwise, they were all one, because they were bothwa. liant, painful, & noble minded: sauing that this difference onely was betweene them : that Marcellus in many cities he tooke by affault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much bloud: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas cotrarily did neuer putany to the sword they ouercame, neitherdid they take away the liberty from any city they took:as it is thought the THEBANS would not have handled the ORCHAMENIANS fo cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had bene present. Now for their acts, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of service that Marcellus did, with so small a company of horsemenas he took with him, to ouerthrow fo great a company of horsemen and footmen both, of the GAVLEstathing that neuer Generall but himselfe did, and specially that slue with his own hands in the field the Generall of his enemies: which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto; for he feeking to kill Alexane der the tyrant of PHERES, was flaine first himselfe, and suffered that, which he defired to have done to another. And yet for that service may be objected, the battels of Levetres, and of TEGYRA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambush or secret practise done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he flue the tyrants that kept THERE's inbondage. For that was as notable a policie and sodaine an enterprise stolen vpon, as none was ener greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hannibal, who was a dreadfull & aviolent enemie: fo were the THEBANS also at that very time with the LACED EMONIANS, who notwithstanding were ouercome of Pelopidas, at the battels of TEGYRA, and of LEVETRES. Where is Marcellus did neuer fo much as once ouercome Hannibal, as Polybius writeth, bur remained vnconquered alwaies, vntil that Scipio ouercame him in battell. Notwithstanding, we do giue best credit to the reports of Casar, Livie, Cornelins, Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GRECIANS: Who write that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hannibals companies, howbeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to speake of, and it seemeth rather, it was through some mockery or deceit of that African then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter and worthy much commendation, that the Romains were brought to that courage, as they durst abide to fight with the Carthaginians, after so many great ouerthrowes, and having so many Generals of their armies slaine in battell, and the whole Empire of Rome being in so great danger of vtter destruction. For it was Marcellus only of all other Generals, that put Marcellus the Romaines in heart againe, after so great and long a feare throughly rooted in them: and incouraged the fouldiers also to long to fight with their enemie, and not only to hope, but to affure themselues of victory. For, where by reason of their continual losses and fearefull ouerthrowes they had, they thought themselves happy men to escape Hamibals hands by running away: he taught them to be ashamed to flie like cowards, to confesse they were in distresse, to retire, and leave the field, before they had ouercome their enemies. And where Pelopidas was neuer ouercome in battell being Generall, and Marcellus did ouercome more then any General in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, shold compare with the good hap of the other that was never overcome. It is true that Marcellus took the city of Syracus a; and Pelopidas failed of taking the city of Sparta: but yet do I thinke that it was more valiantly done of Pelopidas to come so neare Sparta as he did & that he was the first that passed the river of Evroras with an army, which never enemy did before him, then it was of Marcellus to win all Sicile. Vnleffe some peraduenture wil say againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas act, as also in the victorie of Levetres: whereas no man living can challenge any part of glory in the doings of Marcellus: for he tooke Syracysa, being only General aione, and didouerthrow the GAVIBs without his fellow Confull, & fought with Hannibal, without any mans helpe or incouragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the manner of wars the Romain Bs vsed then, and that trained his souldiers that they durft fight with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the nothing other, & the strangeneise of either of their deathes doth grieue me maruellously as I do greatly wonder also, how Hannibal in so many battels as he fought (which are innumerable) could albement wayes scape vnhurt. I cannot but greatly commend also the valiantnesse of one Chrysantas, The vall. whom Xexophon speaketh of in his books of the institution of Cyrus, saying that he having lift vp antessearch his fivord in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, & hearing the trumpet found the retraite, obtained of Cherles he softly retired, and would not firike him. How beit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused:

for helider that he was very hors and desirous of harroll his answers horsent land in the seement a solution. for beside that he was very hote and desirous of battell, his anger was honourable and iust, and dir. moued him to seeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides saith:

The best that may betide, is when a captaine lines, And doth survive the victories, which he with force atchines: But if he needs must fall, then let him valiantly

For so becommeth his death famous, and not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he faw his victory ended, in the death of the tyrant : otherwise he hardly should have found so noblean occasion to have shewed his valiantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and having no cause or heate of choler (which puttern all men valiant in fight besides themselues, that they know not what they do)did rashly & vnaduisedly, thrust himselse into the middest of the danger, where he died not as a General, but as a light horsman and skote (abandoning his three triumphes, his fine Confulships, and his spoiles and tokens of triumph, which he had gotten of kings with his owne hands) among venturous Spaniards and Nv-MIDIANS, that fold their bloud and lives for pay viito the CARTHAGINIANS: so that I imagine they were angry with the selues (as a man would say) for so great & happy victory, to have slaine Plutare in the second state of the second state amongst Fre Gellanian skouts, and light horsemen, the noblestand worthiest person of the grees speech gree speech Romaines. I would no man should thinke I speake this in reproch of the memory of these two and indeed famous men, but as a griefe only of them and their valiantnesse; which they employed so, as they went of blemished all their other vertues, by vndiscreete hazarding of their persons and lines without mountain.

cause, as if they would and should have died for themselves, and not rather for their countrey and friends. And also when they were dead. Pelopidas was buried by the allies and confederates. of the city of THEBES, for whose cause he was flaine; and Marcellus in like manner, by the enecellus fune rais felues that had flaine him. And fure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondred at: That the enemy himselfe should honour his valiantnesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the office of friendship performed by a thankfull friend. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honour his dead enemy, then the admiration of his worthinesse: and the friend sheweth friendship many times, rather for respect of the benefits he hath received, then for the love he beareth to his vertue.

chides, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goods and wealth they diverfly write of him. For some say, he lived poorely all the dayes of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reason of their pouerty, liued vnmaried many yeares after their fathers death. And many of the oldest writers do confirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary: that he knew certainelands Aristides had in the village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Aristides lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to flew that he was well to liue, and that his house was rich & wealthy, he bringeth forth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare Mayor or Prouost of ATHENS, whom they called Archon Eponymos, because the yeare tooke the name of him that had it yearely. And they say, he came to it by drawing of the beane, according to the ancient vie of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their election of the faid office: in which election none were admitted to draw the beane, but such as were highest set in their subsidie bookes, according to the value and rate of their goods, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosiomedimnes, as you would fay, those that might dispend five hundred bushels of wheate by the yeare, & vpwards. Secondly, he alledgeth he was banished by the Ostracismon, which banisheth the Nobility & great rich men onely: whom the common people enuie, because of their greatnesse; and neuer dealth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes, is, that he lest of his gift, three sooted flooles in the temple of Bacchus, which those do commonly offer vp, as have won the victory in comedies, tragedies, or other such like pastimes, where they themselues had borne the charge. And those three footed stooles remaine there yet, which they say were given by Aristides and haue this inscription vpon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Aristides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archestratus the Poet taught them to play his comedies. The last reason, though it seeme likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whom euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes lived in great pouertie) and Plato the Philosopher, tooke vpon them to defray the charges of games that were of no finall expence: the one having borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the dance of the children which danced in a round at ATHENS: towards the furnishing of which charges Dion the Syracus an gaue Plato mony, and Pelopidas also gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not spoken that vertuous men should alwayes refuse the gifts of their Good men friends, and that they might not in some fort accept their friends courtesie offered them; but because they should thinke it vncomely and dishonourable for them, to take any thing to enrich themselves or to space and hoordyn. Howheir where there is care honorable. The after a sort. themselues, or to spare and hoord vp. Howbeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike shew to be made, not tending to their private benefite: in such a case they should not refuse their friends louing offer and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius saith, the three footed stoole was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panatius declareth plainely, that Demetrius was deceiued by the semblance of the name. For fince the time of the wars of y MEDES, vnto the beginning of the war of Peloponnesus, in all the registers and records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common playes, there were found but two men bearing name of Aristides that obtained victory; and neither of them both was sonne vnto Lysimachus, whom we write of at this present. For the one is expresly named the son of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the same Aristides we now speake of as appeareth easily by the writing and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we have vied in GRECE ever fince Euclides time. Moreoner it is easie to be knowne, by the name of the Poet Archistrains that is adioyning to it: for there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the wars of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of Peloponnesvs, many do put him in for an Author and maker of rimes and fongs that were fung in common dances. Yet for all Panatius objections, the matter is to be better looked into, and confidered of. But for the Ostracismon banishment, it is true, that fuch as were great men in estimation about the comon people, either in same, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were subject vnto this banishment. For Damon himselfe, being Pericles schoolemaster, was banished, only because the common people thought him too wise. Moreouer, Idomaneus writeth, that Aristides was their prouost for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by casse be voice of the ATHENIANS that chose him. And if he were prouost fince the journey of PLA- was to TERS, as Demetries writeth, it is likely inough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable service, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defend Aristides, but also Socrates pouertie, as if it were a foule vice and reproch to be poore. For he writeth, that he had not only a house of his own, but also threescore and ten minas at vsurie, which Criton gaue him interest for. But now to our story againe. Aristides was poore. Clifthenes very friend, he that restored the gouernement at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty tyrants, and did reverence Lycurgus the Law-maker of the LACED EMONIANS for his lawes, aboue all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauoured the state of Aristocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and hauethe soueraignitie. How beit he euer had Themistocles (Neocles sonne) his continual aduersarie, as taking part with the contrary, and defending the popular state of gouernment. Some say, that being schollers, and brought vp together, they were specified. euer contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were it in sport, or in matter of carnest:and euer after, men beganne to see the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrarie affections. For Themistocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and subtill, and would venture on any thing vpon light occasion. Aristides contrariwise was very quiet, temperate, constant and maruellous well staied, who would for no respect be drawne away from equity and instice, neither would lie, flatter, nor abuse any body, though it were but in sport. Notwithstanding Ari- eles dispofus of CHIO writeth, that their malice beganne first of light loue, and that it grew to greatnesse frience by processe of time betweenethem: (for saith he) both the one and the other of them fell in nature.

love with Stefileus, borne in the He of CAOs. This fond light love of theirs, fell not eafily from them, nor the enuy they conceived one against another, but cotinued against each other in matters of state: such were their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themistocles sought the way to winne friends, by whose meanes he came to great preferment in short time, and had made himselfe very strong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall: The gods forbid (quoth he) I should euer occupie the place of a gouernour, where my friends should not find more fauour then strangers, that do me no pleasure. But Aristides taking another course by himselfe, would not stand upon his friends in generacment. First, because he would do no man wrong with pleasuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requests. Secondly, because he faw many rulers and men of authority bold to do iniustice and manifest wrong, bearing themselues vpon their friends: but he carried this opi. nion, that no honest man or good citizen, should trust to any bolstering of friends, but to his owne instand veright doings. Notwithstanding, Aristides perceiving that Themistocles did rashly alter many things, and euer encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings, he was enforced sometime to crosse Themissocles againe, and to speake against that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but most to hinder his credite and authority, which increased still through the peoples fauour and goodwils towards him: thinking it better by contrarying him a little to difappoint sometime a thing that might have fallen out well for the common-wealth, rather then by giving him the head, to fuffer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themistocles having preferred a matter very profitable for the common-wealth, Aristides was so much against it, as Themistocles purpose took no place. Moreouer Aristides was so earnest against him, that when the counsell brake vp after Themistocles motion was rejected, he spake it openly before them all: that the common wealth of Athens would neuer prosper vntill they both were laid in Barathrum, which was a prifon or hole, wherin they put all theeues and condemned men, Another time, Arilides moved a matter to the people, which diverse were against, but yet it went with him. And when the Judge or Prefident of the counsell did put it to the people, to know their allowance of it: Arifides perceiving by the arguments made against it, that the mat. ter he preferred was hurtful to the comon-wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not have it passe. Many times also Ariflides spake by other men, when he would have a thing go forward, for feare left Themistocles spire towards him, would hinder the benefite of the common-wealth. They found him very constant and resolute in matters of state, what socier happened; which wan him great commendation. For he was neuer the prouder for any honour they gaue him, nor thought himselfe disgraced for any ouerthrow he received: being alwayes of this mind, that it was the duty of an honest citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to do his countrey scruice, without respect and hope of reward of money, or for honour and glorie. Therefore when certaine verfes were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of Aschilus made in commendation of the ancient foothfayer Amphiaraus, to this effect:

He will not onely feeme, a just man by his face, But inst indeed he will be found, and vertue still embrace With all his thought and foule, from whence there may proceed Grane counsels, for to beautifie his countries crowne indeed.

All the people straight cast their eyes vpon Aristides, as vpon him, that in truth aboue all other most described the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so stout and resolute, not only to resist fauour & friendship, but to reject hate and anger also. For in case of justice, neither could friendfhip make him go awry for his friends fake; nor enuy could moue him to do iniustice, to his very enemy. For proofe hereof it is written, that he had an enemy of his in suite of law, and did profecute it to judgement; infomuch as after the plaint was read, the Judges were fo angry with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would have give fentence against him. But Arifides rifing from his place, went and kneeled at the Iudges feete with the offender his enemie, and befought them to give him leave to speake, to instiffe and defend his cause, according to the course of law. Another time he being Judge betweene two private menthat pleaded before him, one of them faid vnto him: Aristides, this fellow mine aduersary here, hath done you great iniury. My friend (quoth Aristides againe) I pray thee tell me only the iniury he hath done thee, for I am Judge here to do thee right, and nor my selfe. Moreouer, he being chosen high treasurer of all the revenues of ATHENS, diddeclare that all the officers before him, Arifide & other his late predeceffours, had greatly robbed and spoiled the common treasure, but speci- the for ally Themistocles: who was a wife man, and of great indgement, but yet somewhat light fin-treasurer. gered. Therefore when Aristides was to give vp his account, Themissocies and many other suborned by him, were against him, and accused him for abusing his office, and followed him so hard, that through their practife they condemned him, as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the noblest driffides citizens feeing what iniury they offered Arifides, tooke his caufe in hand, and found meanes to accepted and procure the people not only to release the fine imposed you him, but to restore him againe to condemned, his office of high treasurer for the yeare following in the which he seemed to repent his former biroffice. ftraightnesse in gouernment the yeare before, & dealt more fauourably with those he had to do with, and would not examine enery thing fo straightly as he did before. Wherupon such as were fed, and he theeues and stealers of the treasure of the comon-wealth, did maruellously praise and like him, made treasure and became futers for him to continue in the office. But when the day of election came, that the furer again. ATHENIANS would chuse him againe, Aristides selfe reproued them, and said: When I distides faithfully discharged the duty of mine office committed to me by you, I then received shame openly reand reproch at your hands: and now that I have diffembled, not feeming to feethe thefts and elofetheurs robberies done vpon your treasure, ye claw me, and say I am an honest man, and a good citizen. in the com-But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more ashamed of the honour you do me and deternow, then I was of the fine you did set voon me, when you condemned me the last yeare: and I feelb their am foryto speake it, that you should thinke it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, then Praise to preferue the common-wealth. After he had spoken these words, and had bewrayed the common thefts the officers of the city did commit, he stopped the theeues mouthes that so highly praifed and commended him for so honest a man: but yet of the noble and honest citizens he was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of Persia, was come with all his nauy to go aland about Marathon, in the countrey of Artica, vpon pretence (as he faid) to be reuenged only of the ATHENIANS, that had burnt the city of SARDIS, but indeed of mind to conquer all GRECE, and to destroy the whole country before him: the Athenians chose ten captaines to go to the warres among whom Miltiades was the chiefest man of authority. But Aristides drew very neare him in reputation and credite, be- chiefe of cause he did very good service in obtaining the victory, specially when he agreed with Miltia- the ten cepdes in counsell, to give battell vpon the barbarous people: and also when he willingly gave taines that Miltiades the whole rule and order of the army. For every one of the ten captaines did by turnes gainft Da. leade the whole army for one whole day; and when Aristides turne came about, he gaue his this the preferment thereof vnto Militades, teaching his other companions, that it was no shame, but Persons honour for them to be ruled by the wifest. Thus by his example he appealed all strife that might Lieutenans haue growne among them, and perswaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counfell, that had best experience in the war. And so he did much advance Miltiades honor. For after that Arifides had once yeelded his authority vnto him, euery one of the rest did the like when it came to their turne; and fothey all fummitted themselues vnto the rule and leading. But on the day of the battel, the place where the Athenians were most combred, was in the middest of the battell, where they had set the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend altheir force, & made their greatest fight in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles & Aristides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the tribe Leontites, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one another: so as the barbarous people at the last being ouerthrowne, they made them flie, and drauethem to their ships. But when they were imbarked and gone, the captaines of the ATHE- victorie. NIANS perceiuing they made not towards the Iles, which was their direct course to returne into of the Per-As 1A, but that they were driven backe by storme of wind and pyrries of the sea, towards the coast of ATTICA & the city of ATHENS, fearing lest they might find ATHENS vnfurnished for defence, and might fet vpon it: they thereupon fent away prefently nine tribes that marched thither with fuch speed, as they came to ATHENS the very same day, and left dristides in the campe at Marathon, with histribe and countreymen, to looke to the prisoners and spoile they had won of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceived the opinion they had of his wif-

had taken of theirs: he was not fo couetous as once to touch them, nor to fuffer any other to meddle with the vnleffe by stealth some prouided for themselves. As amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres priefts, called Dadouchos, as you would fay, the torch-bearer, (for in the The wieled fecret facrifices of Geres, his office was to hold the torch) whom when one of the barbarous people faw, and how he wore a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke him for some king, and falling on his knees at his feet, kitfed his hand, and shewed him great store of gold he had, hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a most cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth took away the gold and killed the poore foule that had flewed him the place because he should not tell it to others. Hereof it cometh, that the comicall Poet do call those that came of him in mockerie. Laccoplutes, as made rich by a ditch because of the gold that Callias found in it. Immediatly after this battell, Arifides was chosen prouoft of ATHENS for the yeare; albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a little before his death, after the journey of PLATERS. For in their Chronicles, where they fet in order their prouofts of ATHENS for the yeare, fince Xanthippides time, there appeared no one name of Ariftides in that yeare that Mardonius the king of Persians Lieutenant was ouerthrowne by Platæes, which was many yeares after: but contrariwife, they find Ariftides enrolled among the prouofts immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did most commend Aristidee instice, before all his other vertues and qualities; because that vertue is most common and in vie in our life, and deliucreth most benefite to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man obtained the worthieft name that one could have to be called by the whole city, a just man. This furname was neuer defired of kings, princes, nor of tyrants, but they alwaies delighted to be fur. named fome Poliorcetes, to fay, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to fay, lightning or terrible other Nicanores, to fay fubduers: and fome other, Ati and Hieracles, to fay, Eagles or Faulcons, or fuch like birds that prey: defiring rather (as it should appeare by those surnames) the praise and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that rifeth by vertue and goodnesse. Yet not with standing, God whom they defire most to be likened to, doth excellall humane nature in three seuerall things: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the most honourable & precious thing. For as the naturall Philosophers reason. all the four elements & Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and so are force and power. carth-quakes, lightning, terrible fromes, running rivers, and inundations of waters; but as for iustice and equity, no man is partaker of them, saue onely God by meanes of reason and ynderstanding. Therefore, because men commonly have three sundry affections of the gods: the first. that they thinke them bleffed; the fecond, that they feare them; the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleffed, for the eternity and immortalitie of their godbead: that they feare them, because of their omnipotency and power; and that they love and worship them, for their iustice and equitie. And yet not with standing, of those three, men do couet immortality, which no flesh can attaine vnto: and also power, which dependeth most vpon fortune; and in the meane time they leave vertue alone, whereof the gods of their goodneffe have made vs capable. But here they flew themselves fooles. For Iultice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, seeme divine and celestiall: where without instice, and dealing vniuftly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the world. But now againe to driftides. This surname of a just man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwards it turned him to greatill will, and specially by Themistocles practife: who gaue it out euery where, that Aristides had ouerthrowne all iustice, because by consent of the parties he was euer chosen Arbitrator to end all controuersies; and thatby this meanes he secretly had procured the absolute power of a king, not needing any gard or soldiers about him. The people .moreouer being grown very diffolute & licencious, by reason of the victory of Marathon, and feeking to have all things paffe by them and their authority, began now to mislike, and to be greatly offended, that any private man should go before the rest in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all shires of ATTICA into the city of ATHENS, and sobanished Aristides with the Ostracismon: disguising the enuy they bare to his glory with the name with the O- of feare of tyranny. For this maner of banishment called offracismon, or Exostracismon, wasno ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to give it an honest cloke, they efileoftea. faid it was onely a pulling downe and tying fhort of too much greatnesse and authority, exceeding far the matter and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwife, then a gentle meane to qualifie the peoples enuy against some private person: which enuy bred no malice to him whose greatnesse did offend them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for ten yeares. But afterwards when by practife, this Ofracismon banishment was laid upon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished, they never Hyperbolus after vsed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way it shall not be amisse to tell you here, why the last man and wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefest men of A. banished THENS at that time, and they both were ever at square together, a common thing among st great Office is the control of the con men. They perceiving now by the peoples affembling, that they went about to execute the O- The case fracismon, were maruellously affraid it was meant to banish one of them: wherefore they spake of Haperbook luckanish. together, and made both their followers friends with each other, and ioyned them in one tribe ment together, infomuch, when the most voices of the people were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they found it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to fee the Ostracismon fo embased and scorned, that they never after would vie it againe, and so lestit off for euer. But briefly to let you vnderstand what the oftracismon was, and after what sort they vsed it: ye are to know, that at a certain day appointed, euery citizen caried a great shell in his hand, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would have banished, and brought it into Ofracisacertaine place railed about with woodden barres in the market place. Then, when every man had brought in his shell, the magistrates and officers of the city did count and tell the number of them: for if there were leffe then 6000 citizens, that had thus brought these shels together, the Ostracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart enery mans name written in these shels: and whose name they found written by most citizens, they proclaimed him by found of trumper, a banished man for ten yeares, during which time nor withstanding, the party did enioy al his goods. Now every man writing thus his name in a shel, whom they would have banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the countrey (very simple) that could neither write nor reade, who came to Aristides (being the first man he met with) and gave him his shell, praying him to write Aristides name vpon it. He being abashed withall, did aske the countrey man, if Arillides had euer done him any displeasure. No, said the country man, he neuer did me hurr, nor I know him not but it grieues me to heare euery man call him a just man. Arifides hea- fort, to ring him fay so, gaue him no answer, but wrote his own name vponthe shell, and deliuered it a- prayhimto game to the country man. But as he went his way out of the city, he lift vp his hands to heauen, fides name and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, befeeching the gods that the ATHENI- init. ANS might neuer haue such troubles in hand, as they should be compelled tocall for Aristides againe. Notwithstanding, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of PERSIA came with his Aribides army through the countries of THESSALY and BOEOTIA, & entred into the heart of the country of Attica, the Athenians renoking the law of their of tracifmon, called home again eall those they had banished, and specially, because they were affraid Aristides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example should move many other to do the like; wherin they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man; for before that he was called home, he continually translled vp and downe, perswading and incouraging the GRECIANS to maintaine and defend their liberty. After that law was repealed by proclamation, & that Themistocles was chosen the only Lieutenant general of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aid and affift him in althings. as well with his trauell, as also with his counsell; and thereby wan his encmies great honour, because it stood vpon the safety and preservation of his countrey. For when Euribiades, Generall of the army of the GRECIANS, had determined to for sake the He of SALAMINA, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and lad enuironed the Iles all about, and the mouth of the arme of the straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in: Aristides departing out of Egina with a maruellous boldnesse, ventured through the middest of all the barbarous ships and sleete, and by good hap got in the night into Themistocles tent, and callinghim out, spake with him there in this fort: The mistocles, if we be both wife, it is high time we should now leave off this vaine enuy and spire we deslides haue long time borne each other, and that we should enter into another fort of enuy more ho- acts and nourable and profitable for vs both: I meane, which of vs two should do his best endeauour to faue GRECE: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counfelling you the best, and executing your commandement: considering you are the man alone that will roundliest come vnto the point that is best which is in my opinion, that we should should hazard battell by sea within the straight of SALAMINA, and that assoone as might be possible. But if our friends and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is faid, that the fea both before and behind vs. & round about vs, is coursed all ouer with their ships, so as they that would not before, shall now be compelled of force, and in fpight of their hearts, to fight and bestirre them like men: because they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to estape, nor to fic Whereunto Themistocles answered I am fory, Aristides, that herein your honesty appeareth greater then mine: but fince it is fo, that you have deferued the honor in beginning, and procuring fuch an honourable and commendable strife betweene vs. I will henceforth indeauour my felfe to exceed you in continuing this your defire. After which answer, he told Ariftides, how be purposed to mocke the barbarous king, and praied him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his deuice, and to perswade him that there was no other way to saue GRECE, but to fight by sea; for Eurybiades gaue more credit to Ariftides perswasions, then he did to Themistocles words for when all the captaines were called to councell, to determine whether they should give battell, or nor one Cleocritus Corint Hian faid to Themisocles, that his counsel did not like Aristides at allasi feemed, because he spake neuer a word to it being present. Aristides answered him straight, that he vtterly mistooke him. For (quoth he) if I did not thinke his counfell good, I would not hold my peace as I do; but now I am mute, not for any goodwill I beare him, but because I find his counfell wife and found, While the captaines of the GRECIANS were reasoning in this fort, Arifida sceing PSYTTALEA (a litle Iland before SALAMINA within the straight) full of men of warren their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valiantest and lustiest fouldiers he had of all his countrey men, into the least foystes or pinnaces he had among all his galleys: and went with them. and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he found there, and put them to the fword enery man, taking the chiefest of them only prisoners: among which were three sons of Sandauce, the kings fifter, whom he fent vnto Themistocles. These three Lords were all slainby the commandement of Euphrantidas the foothfayer, and facrififed to Bacchus Omestes, as to fav. the cruell Bacchus, and cater of raw flesh, and all vpon an Oracle they had received. That done, Aristides dispersed his souldiers about the Ile, to receive all such as were by fortune of war, or of the fea, cast into the Ilandito the end that no enemy of theirs shold scape their hands, nor any of his friends should perish. For the greatest fleete of all their ships, & the sharpest encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Hand: and therefore the tokens of triumph were fet there, After the battell was won. Themistocles to feele Ariftides opinion, faid vnto him: We have done good peece of service, but yet there is another behind of greater importance, & that is this: We must bring all Asia into Evrope, which we may casily do, if we saile with all speed to the ftraight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Arifides cried out, Stay there, neuer speake of that: but I pray you let vs rather seeke all the waies ween, how to drive this barbarous king out of GRECE, left if we keepe him in still with so great anaimy (and he shall see no way before him to escape out) we drive him then to fight like a desperate man, and perill our felues, we cannot tell to what. When Themistocles had heard his opinion, he fecretly fent the Eunuke Arnaces his prisoner, vnto king Xerxes, to aduertise him fro him, thathe had altered the GRECIANS purpose, which was fully bent to have broken up the bridge helad made at the straight of Hellespont to passe over his army and that he was the willinger to let him understand it, that he might the better prouide for the safety of his person. King Xerxus being netled with this aduertifement, tooke straight his journey, and with all speed went to recouer the straight of Helles PONT, & left Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in GRECE, with three hundred thousand of the best souldiers of his army. This Mardonius was maruellously dreaded of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he had by land, and he didthreaten them also by his letters he wrote vnto them: You have (said he) with your ships by sea, o. uercome men acquainted to fight by land, and that neuer handled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fields of BOEOTIA, are very faire and large for horsemen and some men to make proofe of their valiantnesse, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the king his mafters commandement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build vp their city againe, to give them a great penfion, and furthermore to make them Lords of all GRECE, so they would give over, and leave off these warres. The Laced Amonians being forthwith advertised of his letters written to the Athenians, and fearing left they would have bene perfwaded by them: fent their Ambaffadours with all fpeed to Athens, to pray them to fend their wives and children vnto Sparta, and also to offer them victuals, to relieue their poore old people, because of the great scarcity that was at A-THENS, for that their city was burnt and razed, and all their country besides destroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS having heard the offers of the Ambassadors of LACEDE. Mon, made the a maruellous answer through Aristides cousel, & this it was: That they bare with The mobile the barbarous people; though they thought all things were to be fold for gold & filuer, because Athenians. they efteemed nothing more precious nor better in this world, then to be rich and wealthy; but on the other fide, they were greatly offended with the LACED EMONIANS, that they onely regarded the present pouerty, and necessity of the Athenians, and did forget their vertue and noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preservation of GRECE, by offering them victuals to line withall. The people approuing this answer, Ariftides then caused the Ambassadours of Spartatocome to the assembly, and commanded them to tell the La-CED EMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the gold aboue, or under the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any fumme of money or reward, to leave the defence of the liberty of GRECE. And to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he shewed the Sunne, and faid vnto him: So long as yonder Sunne keepeth his course about the world, so long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies vnto the Persians; because they have spoiled and destroyed all their country, and have defiled and burnt the temples of their gods. Besides, he willed that the pricits, by commandement of the people, should excommunicate and curse him that would procure them to fend vnto the Persians to make peace with them, and to breake their league and alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hercupon, when Mardonius came againe the second time to ouerrun the country of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS got them againe into the lleof Salamina, and then they fent Aristides Ambassadour vnto the LACED AMONIANS. He sharpely tookethem vp, and reproued their sloth & negligence, because they had againe fortaken ATHENS, and left it to the spoile of the barbarous people: & prayed them yet they would looke to faue the rest of GRECE. The Ephori(which were certaine officers that ruled all things within the city of Sparta) when they had heard Ariftides persuasions, straight tooke order for aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their folemne feasts they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they fentour five thousand citizens born in Sparta, into the field, al proper men & valiant soldiers. enery one of them carying with him feuen Ilotes (which are the country men and flaues in the country of Laced Emonia) not making the Ambassadors of Athens print to it at al. Wherfore Aristides came againe another time into their counsell, to coplaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and faid he dreamed, or else he mocked them: for their army which they had sent against the strangers (for so they called the Persians) was already at the city of O-RESTION in ARCADIA. Aristides hearing their answer, replied, that they were to blame to mock them in that fort, to fend away their men fo fecretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was notime for them now to go about to deceive their friends, but their enemies rather. Idomineus in his ftory reporteth the matter thus in every point: notwithstanding, in the decree that was made to fend Ambassadours to Sparta, Aristides is not named for Ambassadour, but there are other appointed : as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Mironides. Afterwards Ariftides was cho- Anilides fenby voices of the people, Lieutenant generall of the army of ATHENS; in this warre against Lieutenant the Persians, and went vnto the campe of the Grecians by the city of Plates, with the 4the. eightthousand footemen well armed and appointed. There he found king Pausanias the onely mians a Generall of all the whole power and army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the force of Sparta: and there came daily into his campe one after another, a maruellous great multitude of other GRECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incamped all Paulanta along the river of Asopvs: but because their campe stretched out a marvellous way in length, Lacedemon they were not intrenched at al, but had only fortified a peece of ground foure square with a wal General of about, which was ten furlongs on every fide, to place all their cariage and chiefest things in. And for the Grand the fact has been supposed by the fact has for the GRECIANS againe, the foothfayer Tifamenus, borne in the city of Elide, had told Pausand all the GRECIA'NS together, that they should have the victory, so they did not assault oracles of atall, but only defend. And Aristides, that had sent to the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the the victorio name of § ATHENIANS, had answer: They should ouercome their enemies, so they did sacrifise of Planes, Nymphes Sphragitides, and also vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Damocrates Haplion, Action, and Polyidus; and fo that they did hazard battel also within their own territories and in the plaine of Geres Eleusinian, and of Proserpina. This Oracle troubled Aristides marvel lously, because the demy gods whom they had commandement to do sacrifice vnto, were the founders and ancestors of the PLAT EIANS: and the caue of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the tops of the mount Cirh Eron, looking towards the West, where the Sunne settethin Somer. They say there was an Oracle there in old time, whose spirit possessed many inhabitants thereabouts, & bestraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nimi pholepti, as who would fay, taken with the Nymphes. And againe, to tell the ATHENIANS they should have the victory, so they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and within their owne teritory: it was even to fend them backe againe into the country of ATTICA. drilli-Arymnellus des being thus perplexed, Arimnestus captaine of the PLATEIANS, had fuch a vision in the night in his sleepe. He thought, that Iupiter the fauiour did appeare vnto him, and asked him whatthe GRECIANS intended to do: and that he answered: My Lord, we must to morrow remoueour campe into the territories of ELEVSIN, & there we wil fight with the barbarous people, accor. ding to the comandement the Oracle of Apollo hath given vs. Then that Impiter replied that they were greatly deceived: for all that Apollo had declared by his Oracle was meant within theter. ritories of the Plat Elans, and that they should find it true, if they considered it well. Arimu. fus having plainly feene this vision in his sleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he straight fent for the oldest citizens, and considering with them where this place should be, he found at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHERON, by the city of Nysia, there was an old temple they called the temple of Geres Eleusinian, and of her daughter Proferpina. When he heard them fay fo, he went straight and told Arifides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to fet an army in battell ray, that had but few horsemen: for that the foot of mount CITHERON did let the horsemen, they could not go to the place where the temple stood, and where the plaine and valley did end: befides also, that the chappell of Androcrates was even in that place. which was all hidden with thicke wood round about it. And because they should lacke nothing to hinder the expresse commandement of the Oracle for hope of victorie, the PLATEIANS (through Arimnestus counsell and advice) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLAT ÆE's should be taken away towards ATHEN'S side, & that the land therof shold beginn The magnaclearely vnto the ATHENIANS, because they should fight with the barbarous people in ther the Plataiowne land, for the defence and preservation of GRECE, according to the commandement of Alexander the Oracle. This noble gift and present of the PLAT ELANS was so famous, as many yeares as ter, king Alexander the great having conquered the Empire of Asia, built vp the wals again of the city of PLATÆBs, and when he had done, made a herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympical, that Alexander had done the PLATEIAN's that honor and dignitie, for a memoral their noble and honour of their magnanimitie; because in the warre against the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally giuen away their land vnto the Athenians, for the fafety of the Grecians: and had shewed themselues of a noble courage also, and very willing to defend the state of GRECE. Now when the army of the GRECIANS came to be fet in order of battell, therefella strife between the Athenians & the Thegeates, because the Athenians would need (according to their old custome) have the left wing of the battel if the LACED EMONIANS had the right wing: and the TEGBATES on the contrary part, would have the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous acts & notable service of their ancestors in former wars, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Aristides stept betweene them, and toldthem, that it was notime now to contend with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valiantnesses and as for you, my Lords of Sparta (faid he) and you also my masters of Grece: we tell you that the place neither giveth nor taketh vertue away, and we do affure you that wher foeuer you place vs, we will so defend and keepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemish the honour we have won in former foughten battels and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quartell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to brag of our anceftors doings, but to fnew our felues valiant in defence of all GRECE. For this battell will make good proofe of all the GRECIANS, how much estimation energy city, energy captaine, and particular person will deserve for his part. When Aristides had spoken, the captaines and all other of

of the battell. But by this meanes all GRECE flood in maruellous garboile at that time, and the fate of the ATHENIAN'S specially in great danger. For a number of the noblest citizens of A-THENS, and that brought great substance with them to the wars, being now at low state, and in nouerty, their goods being fpent and gone, and feeing themselves discountenanced, not bearing that rule and authoritie in the commonwealth they were wont to do, because other were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the cities they gathered together, and met at a house Through in the city of PLAT ÆES, and there conspired to overthrow the authority of the people at A- ray of the THENS: and if they could not obtain their purpose, then that they would rather lose all, and rich nobleherray their country vnto the barbarous people. While these things were practised in the camp there many being of the confpiracy, Arilides came to an inckling of it, and was maruelloufly affraid. breaufe of the time: wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter, being of fuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vider stand the whole conspiracy, little knowing what anumber might be drawn into this treason, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather respected that which was just, then what was profitable for the time. So he caused eight persons onely of the great number to be apprehended, & of these eight, the two first whom they would have indited as principals, and were most to be burdened for the conspiracy, Assistances of the town of LAMPRA & Exelias of the towne of Acharna, they found meanes to flie out of the camp and to fauethemselves. And for the other, Arilides set them at liberty, and gaue them occasion that were not discourred, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: saying, that the battel should be their judge, where they shold purge themselves of all accusations laid against them, and show the world also, that they neuer had any other intention but honest & good, towards their country. Mardonius, to proue the courage of the GRECIANS, had fent all his horsemen (wherein he was farre stronger then the GRECIANS) to skirmish with them. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITH ERON, in strong places and full of stones, saving the three thousand MEGARI- Mount ci-ANS, that camped in the plaine; by reason whereof, they were fore troubled & hurt, by the hors. theren. men of the barbarous people that fet vpon them on every fide, for they might charge them where they would. In fo much, in the end, perceiving they alone could no longer refift the force offogreat a multitude of the barbarous people, they fent with all speed possible to Paulanias, to prayhim to fend them prefent aide. Paulanias hearing this newes, and feeing in his owne fight the campe of the MEGARIANS almost covered with shot and darts which the barbarous peoplethrew at them, and that they were compelled to fland close together in a litle corner: he wist notwhat to do. For togothither in person with the LACED EMONIANS that were footemen heavy armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them. So he proved to put some ambitious desire & enuy of honor, among the private captaines & generals of the army of the other GR E-CIANS, which were then about him: to fee if he could moue any mans courage and defire, to offer himselfe willingly to aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe cares, but dristides who promifed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the field (one of the valiant of taptaines that forued under him) with his company of 300 chosen men, and certain shot mingled amongst them. These souldiers were ready in a moment, & marchedstraight in battel ray, a great pace towards ý barbarous people. Massfius, that was General of the horfmen of the Persians, a goodly tall man, perceiving their coming towards him; tur- Goment of medhis horse, and galloped to them. The ATHENIANS tarried him, and kept their ground, and the horse the encounter was very hote, because both the one and the other side did the best they could at Persians. this first onser to put the rest of the battell in icopardy: and they fought so long, that Massistins horsewas shot through the body with an arrow, that put him to such paine as he neuer left flinging, til he cast his master on the ground, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not rife againe, as wel for the weight of his armor, as for that the ATHENIAN'S came so fodainly vpon him. And not with standing there were many about him to hew him in peeces, yet they could find no way how to kil him, he was so throughly armed & loden with gold, copper, and iron, not only you his body and his head, but also on his legs and armes: until at the length there was one that thrust y head of his dartthrough his beuer, & fokilled him. The Persians Mafiling perceiving that, fled immediatly, & forfooke the body of their General. Shortly after it appea- flaine by enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous people made for the loss of Massisius. For

his deathdid so grieve them, that they polled themselves, they clipped off their horseand movles haires, and filled besides all the field thereabouts with pitifull cries & shreekes, as those that had lost the valiantest and chiefest man of authority of all their camp, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this first skirmish, both the one and the other side kept their campe. and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the foothfayers did promife both fides the victorie, as much the Persians, as the Grecians, fo they did but only defend and con. trariwise, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowne, that did affault. But Mardonius finding vi. ctuals waxed fcant, and that they were stored but for few dayes, and moreover how the GRE CIANS daily grew stronger by continual repaire to their camp, the longer he delayed; in the end he resolued to tarry no longer, but to passe the river As opvs the next morning by breake of the day, and suddenly to set vpon the GRECIANS. So he gaue the captaines warning thenioh before what they should do, because every man should be ready. But about midnight there came a horseman without any noise at all, so neere to the Grecians campe, that he spaketo the watch, and told them he would speake with Aristides Generall of the ATHENIANS, Aris flides was called for ftraight, and when he came to him, the horseman said vnto Aristides; Jam Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great goodwill I beare you, haue put my king of Ma- felf in the greatest danger that may be, to come at this present time to aduertise you, that to mor. row morning Mardonius will give you battell: because your enemies sudden coming vponyou nealeth the should not make you affraid, being suddenly charged, and should not hinder also your valifecret counant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight, but onely scarcity of victuals that forceth him to do it, confidering that the Prognosticators are all against it that he should give you battel, both by reason of the ill tokens of their facrifices, as also by the answers of their Oracles, which hath put all the army in a maruellous seare, & stand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at a venture, or els if he wil needs lie still to be starued to death for very famine. After king Alexander had imparted this fecret to Arifides, he prayed him to keepe it to himselse, and to remember it in time to come. Aristides answered him then that it was no reason he should keepe a matter of so great importance as that from Paulanius, who was the Liuetenant generall of their whole army; notwithstanding, he promised him he wouldtell it no man else before the battel, and that if the gods gaue the GRECIANS the victorie, he didasfure him, they should all acknowledge his great fauour and goodwill shewed vnto them. After they had talked thus together, king Alexander left him, and returned backe againe : and Arillides also went immediatly to Paulanias tent, and told him the talke king Alexander and he hadto. gether. Thereupon the private captaines were fent for straight to councell, and there order was ginen, that cuery man should have his bands ready, for they should fight in the morning. So Paufanias atthat time (as Herodotus writeth) faid vnto Ariftides, that he would remoue the A-THENIANS from the left to the right wing, because they should have the Persians them-selves right before them, and that they should fight so much the lustier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also because they had ouercome them before in the first encounter; and that himself would take the left wing of the battel, where he should encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS fide. But when all the other private captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderstood it, they were maruellous angry with Pausauias, and said he did them wrong, and had no reason to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, & onely to remoue them, as if they were flaues, to be appointed at his plea. fure, now on the one fide, then on the other, & to fet them in fight with the valiantest foldiers they had of all their enemies. Then faid Aristides to them, that they knew not what they faid, and how before they misliked, and did strine with the TEGEATES, onely for having the left wing of the battell; and when it was granted, they thought themselves greatly honoured that they were preferred beforethem, by order of the captaines: and now where the LACED EMO-NIANS were willing of themselues to give them the place of the right wing, and did in manner offer them the preheminence of the whole army: they do not thankfully take the honor offered them, nor yet do reckon of the vantage and benefit given them to fight against the Persians felues, their ancient enemies, and not against their naturall countreymen anciently descended of them. When Arifides had vsed all these perswasions vnto them, they were very welcontented to change place with the LACED ÆMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one another, and to tell them that the Persians that came against them, had no them, had no better hearts nor weapons, then those whom they before had ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For faid they, they have the same bowes, the same rich imbrodered gownes, the same golden chaines and carcanets of womanish persons, hanging on their cowardlybodies & faint hearts: where we have also the same weapons & bodies we had, and our hearts more lively and couragious then before, through the fundry victories we have fince gotten of them. Further, we have this advantage more: that we do not fight as our other confederates the GRECIANS do, for our city and country only, but also to continue the fame and renown of our former noble fernice, which we wan at the journeys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the end, the world should not thinke that the glory of these triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto Fortund; but vnto the courage and worthinesse of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to change the order of their battell in haft. The THERANS on the other side that tooke part with Mardonius, receiving intelligence of the altering of their battell, by traytors that ranne betweene both campes, they straightfold Mardonius of the Theofit. He thereupon did suddenly also change the order of his battell, and placed the right wing of the Persians against the left wing of his enemies: either because he was affraid of the A-THENIANS, or elle for greater glory that he had a defire to fight with the LACED EMONI-ANS, and commanded the GRECIANS that tooke his part, that they should fight against the ATHERIANS. This alteration was fo openly done, that every man might fee it: whereupon Paulanias removed the LACED EMONIANS againe, and fet them in the right wing. Mardonius feeingthat, remoued the Persians againe from the right wing, and brought them to the left wing (where they were before) against the LACED #MONIANS: and thus they consumed all that day in changing their men too and fro. So the captaines of the GRECIANS fate in counfell at night, and there they agreed, that they must needs remoue their campe, and lodge in some other place where they might have water at commandement : because their enemies did contimally trouble and spoile that water they had about them, with their horses. Now when night came, the captaines would have marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the people went very ill willing, and they had much ado to keepe them together. For they were no sooner out of the trenches & fortifications of their campe, but the most part of them ran to the city of PLAT ÆES, and were maruelloufly out of order, differfing themfelues here and there, and fet vp their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that taried behind, but the LACED EMONIANS onely, and that was against their wils: for one of their captaines called Imompharetus, a maruellous The stubhardie man, that feared no danger, and longed fore for battell, he was in fuch a rage with these trifling delayes that he crycd it out in the camp, that this remouing was a goodly running away, pharetus and fware he would not from thence, but would there tary Mardonius coming with his com- Captains of pany. Panfanius went to him, and told him he must do that the other GRECIANS had consented demonians. to in counfell, by most voices. But Amompharetus tooke a great stone in his hands, and threw it downe at Paulaneas feete, and told him, There is the figne I give to conclude battell, and I paffe not for all your cowardly conclusions. Amompharetus stubburnnesse did so amaze Pausanias, that hewas at his wits end. So he fent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwards on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might go together, and therwithall made the rest of his men to march towards the city of PLATÆES, supposing thereby to have drawne Amompharetus to haue followed him, or else to let him remaine alone behind. But in trifling his, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderstanding that the GRECIANS did for sake their first lodging, he made his The battell army presently march in battell ray to set upon the Laced Emonians. So the barbarous peo. of the Green ple made great shoutes and cries, northinking to go fight, but to sacke and spoile the GRECIstans, with:

ANS should be saided the said beautiful beautifu ANS flying away, as indeed they did little better. For, Paufanias seeing the countenance of his enemics, made his enfignes to fray, and commanded enery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to give the GRECIANS the fignall of the battell, either for the anger he took against Amompharetus, or for the fudden onset of the enemies, which made them that they came not in straight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begun, but stragling in small companies, some here, and somethere. In the meane time, Paulanias was busic in facrificing to the gods, and seeing that the first facrifices were not acceptable unto them, by the Soothsayers observations they made, he commanded the Spartans to throw their targets at their feete, and not to stirre out of their places, but onely to do as he bade them, without refifting their exemies. had given this straight order, he went againe & did sacrifice, when the horsemen of the enemies wereat hand, and that their arrowes flew amongst the thickest of the LACED EMONIANS, and did hurt diverse of them, & specially poore Callicrates among the rest, that was one of the good. flainewith- lieft men in all the GRECIANS hoaft and army. He having his deaths wound with an arrow out fighting before he gaue up the ghost, said, His death did not grieve him, because he came out of his country to die for the defence of GRECE: but it grieued him to die fo cowardly, having giuen the enemy neuer a blow. His death was maruellous lamentable, and the constancie of the Span TAN'S wonderfull: for they neuer stirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to de. fend themselues against their enemies that came vpon them, but suffered theselues to be thrust through with arrowes, and flaine in the field, looking for the houre the gods would appoint them, and that their captaines would command them to fight. Some write also, that as Paulanias was at his prayers, and doing facrifice vnto the gods a litle behind the battel, certaine of the Ly. DIAN'S came vpon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his facrifice; and that Pansanias, and those that were about him (having no other weapons in their hands) draue them away with force of staues and whips. In memory whereof, they say there is a solemne procession keptat Sparta on that day, which they call the Lydian's procession, where they whip and beate yong boyes about the altar. Then was Paulanias in great distresse, to see the priests offer sacrifice vpon facrifice, and that not one of them pleased the gods: at the last he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holding vp his hands, befought Iuno Citharon, and all the other gods (patrons and protectours of the country of the Plat Etans) that if it were not the will of the gods the GRECIANS should have the victory yet that the conquerors at the least should buy their deaths dearely and that they should find they fought against valiant men and worth fouldiers, Paulanias had no sooner ended his prayer, but the sacrifices fell out very fauourable. in so much as the Priests and Soothsayers came to promise him victory. Thereupon, he straight gaue commandement to march toward the enemy, which flew from man to man incomi nearly that they should march. So as he that had seene the squadron of the LACED EMONI-ANS, would have faid it had bene like the body of a fierce beaft raifing vp the briftles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people faw they should have hot battell, and that they should meete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the Persian fashion, & bestowed their arrowes lustily vpon the Laced A. MONIANS, but they keeping close together, and couering themselues with their shields, marched on still vponthem, vntil they came to ioyne with the enemy so lustily, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thrusts and blowes of the pikes & speares vpon their breasts, & ouerhwart their faces, that they flue many of them, & laid them on the ground. For all that, they died not cowardly, but tooke the LACED EMONIANS pikes & speares in their bare hands, and breake them in two by strength of their armes; and then they quickly plucktout their cimiters and axes, and lustily laid about them, and wrung the LACED EMONIANS shields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now whilest the Laced Emonians were builly fighting with the barbarous people, the Atheni-ANS flood fill imbattelled farre off, and kept their ground. But when they law the LACED #NO. NIANS tary folong, and that they came not, & heard a maruellous noise of men as thoughthey were fighting, and befides that there came a speedy messenger vnto them sent from Paulanias, to let them understand they were fighting: then they marched with all speed they could to helpe them. But as they were coming on a great pace ouer the plaine, vnto that part where they heard the noise, the GRECIANS that were on Mardonius side came against them. Aristides seeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his company, and cried out as loud as he could for life, and conjured the GREGIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GRECE, to leave off these warres, and not to trouble the Athenians that were going to helpe them that ventured their liues, to defend the commonwealth and fafety of all GRECE. But when he faw they would needs fight for any request and conjuration he could vie, and that they came still vpon them, bending themselues to give charge; then he stayed his going to relieve the LACEDA. MONIANS, and was compelled to make head against those that set vpon him & his company, they being about fifty thousand men; of the which, the most part notwithstanding went their waies, and left the army, specially when they understood the Persians were ouerthrown and fled. The furie of the battell and cruellest fight (as they fay) was where the THEBANS were because the Nobility & chiefest men of the country sought very carnestly for the Persians, but the people refused, being led by a smal number of the Nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACED EMONIANS being the first that ouerthrew § Persians, and made them flie: & they flue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a stone one Mardonius Arimnestus a Spartan gaue him vpon his head, rightly as the Oracle of Amphiaraus had prophecied before vnto him. For Mardonius before the battell had fent thither a Lydian, & a Cari- aspartan AN vnto the Oracle of Throphonius, of the which the prophet made answer vnto y CARIAN, in with ablow the Cartan tongue: and the man of Lydia lay within the fan Guary of Amphiaraus, where he thought in his dream that one of the priests of the temple willed him to go out of the place hewas in and he denying it, the priest took a great stone and threw it at his head, and so thought he was flaine with the blow. And thus it is written. And furthermore, the LACEDEMONIANS did chase the Persians flying into their fortifications they had in a wood: and the Athenia ANS also shortly after ouerthrew the THERANS, whereof they slue in the field three hundred of the noblest and chiefest of them. For even as the Theban's began to turne tails, newes came vnto the Athenians, that the Persians had intrenched the felues within their fort & strength in the wood, where the Laced Emonians did befiege them. The Athenians fuffered the GRECIANS that fled to faue themselves, and they went to helpe the LACED AMONIANS, to take the fort of the barbarous people: who went before but flenderly about it, because they had no experience to make an affault, nor force vpon a wall. But so some as the Athenians came in tothem, they straight tooke it by assault, and made great slaughter of the Persians and barbarous people. For of three hundred thousand fighting menthat Mardonius had in his campe, there were faued onely but forty thousand led vnder ArtabaZus: and of the GRECIANS side there dred and were not flaine aboue thirteene hundred and threescore in all; amongst which also there were streescore two and fiftie Athenians, all of the tribe of Antides, the which had done more valiantly that day, then any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the Antides made a solemne facrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order Athensand given them by the Oracle of Apollo, to give them thankes for this victorie. Of the LACEDE. MONIANS there died fourescore and cleuen: and of the TEGEATES fixteene. But I maruell He- intresser rodotus faith, that none but these people onely fought in that iourney against the barbarous na. tion, and no other GRECIANS befides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues also do shew that it was a generall victory and exploit of all the GRECIANS together. And moreouer, if there had bene but these three people onely that had fought against them, and that all the resthad stood and looked on, and done nothing: sure there had bene no such Epigram as this, engrauer upon the altar or tombe that was fet up in the place of the battell:

When the victorious Greekes, had driven out of their land The Persians by force of armes, which long did them withstand, They built to mighty love, this holy altar here, And made it common for all Greece, as plainely may appeare, In guerdon of the good, which he did them restore, In gwerdon of their liberty, which lik'd them enermore.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Eadronion, that is, about the moneth of July, or after the Bororians account, the fixe and twentieth of the moneth they call Panemus, on which day there is kept a common affembly of the estates of GRECE, in the citie of PLATÆES, where the PLATÆIANS make a folemne facrifice vnto Inpiter, protectour of their liberty, to give him thankes alwayes for this victory. It is no maruell that there was fuch difference then betwixt the moneths and dayes, confidering that euen now when Astronomie is more perfectly vnderstood then it was then, some do yet beginne and end their moneths at one day, and some at another. After this great battell and overthrow of the barbarous people, there arose a great strife betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACED #-Monians, touching the reward and honour of the victorie. For the ATHENIANS would not give place vnto the Laced Amonians, nor fuffer them to fet vp any tokens or fignes Athenians of triumph. Whereupon the GRECIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occafion they had almost spoiled one another: had not Aristides through his wisdome and wise perswafions, staied and quieted the other captaines his companions, and specially one Leocrates of the viand Asyronides, whom he wan with fuch different and gentle words, that they were contented there.

to referre it wholly vnto the arbiterment and judgement of the other people of GRECE. Sothe GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuersies. In this councell holden there, Theogiton a captaine of the MEGARIANS, faid for his opinion, that tonuoide the ciuill warre might grow betweene the GRECIANS vpon this quarrell: he thoughtir more requisite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victory vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleacritus Corinthian, seeming to every manthere that he would have requested this honour for the citie of CORINTH, being indeed the third city in estimation of all GRECE, vnto SPARTA and ATHENS: howbeir he made an oration in commendation of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruellously liked. and well thought of by enery man: for his opinion went flatly with the PLATEIANS, that to end this strife, they should give the honour of this victory vnto the city of Plat ÆES, and fo would neither of both parties be angry that they should be honoured. Vpon his words ristides first agreed on the Athenians behalfe, and then Pausanias for the LACED EMO. NIANS, That the PLAT ÆIANS should haue the reward. Now they both being agreed, before the spoile was divided betweenethem, they set aside fourescore talents that were given to the PLAT EIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image. and set out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDE. MONIANS notwithstanding, did set vp their tokens of victorie by themselues, and the A-THENIANS theirs also by themselves. So they sending vnto the Oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do facrifice: Apollo answered them that, they should build up an altarunto Inpiter, protectiour of their liberty; howbeit that they should put no facrifice vpon it, vntill they had first put out all the fire through the whole country, because it had bene polluted and defiled by the barbarous people; and then, that they should fetch pure and cleane fire at the common altar, whereon they do facrifice vnto A. pollo Pythias, in the citie of DELPHES. This answer being delinered, the great Lords and officers of GRECE went through all the countrey to put out the fire enery where. And there was a man of the same city of PLAT ÆE's at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered himselfe, and promised he would bring them fire from the temple of Apollo Pythias, withall possible speed that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he had sprinkled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and went in that manner to take fire from the altar of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him againe as fust as he could runne for life, vnto the city of PLATÆES, and came thither before the Sunne was fet, having come & gone that day a thousand furlongs. But after he had saluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fire he brought, he fell downe dead at their feet, and gaue up the ghost. The PLAT EIAN's lift him vp starke dead, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renowne: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

Engraved heere doth lye, Euchidas speedy man, Who in one day both too and fro, to Delphes lightly ranne: Enenfrom this selfe same place, which thou doest here behold, such haste, post haste, he (wiftly made; thereof thou maist be bold.

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other hold opinion she was the daughter of Hercules, and Myrto the Nymph Menetius daughter, and Patroclus fifter, that died a virgin, and was honored afterwards as a goddeffe of the Boe otians, and of the LOCRIANS. For in all their cities and townes in open places, they finde an altar and image dedicated vnto her and all that are maried, do facrifice to her vpon that altar. Afterwards there A General was a generall councell holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Arillides made a mocompetbal tion, that all the cities of GRECE should yearely send their deputies at a certaine day appointed, vnto the citie of Play ÆEs, there to make their prayers and facrifices vnto the gods: and that from five yeares, to five yeares, they should celebrate common games, that should be called the games of liberty: and that they shold also leavie through all the provinces of GRECE, for maintenance of the warres against the Persians and barbarous people, ten thousand footemen, a thousand horsemen, and a sleete of an hundred saile. Also that the Plat Eians thenceforth should be taken for deuout and holy men, and that no man should be so hardy as to hurt or offend them; and that they should onely tend the facrifices vnto the gods, for the health and prosperity of GRECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and manner aforefaid, and the PLAT EIANS bound themselves yearely to keep solemne facrifices and aniversaries for the soules of the Grecians that were flaine in their teritories, fighting for defence of facrifice the liberty of the GRECIANS. And this they observe yet vnto this day in this fort. The fixteenth day of the moneth of Memasterion (which the Bo E OTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the the Platei moneth of Ianuary) they go a procession, and before the procession goeth a trumpetter that ans pearely foundeth the alarum. Then there follow certaine chariots loden with branches of firre tree, and Gredans with nofegayes and garlands of triumph: then a blacke bull, and certaine yong gentlemen noble that were men fonnes, that cary great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, fuch as they vieto faint at powre vpon the graues of dead men for propitiatory oblations; and other yong boyes free of Platet. borne, that carry oiles, perfumes, and other sweete odours in viall glasses: for no seruant or bondinan may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this mystery, for that they whose memory they honor, died all fighting for defence of the liberty of GRECE. After all this shew, followeth the prouost of the PLAT ÆIANS for that time being, last of all who may not al the rest of the yeare besides so much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coare, and holderh a funerall pot in one of his hands, which hetaketh in the towne-house, and a naked sword in the other hand, and so goeth through the city in this fort after all the pompe aforesaid, vnto the Church-yard where all their granes be that were flaine at that battell. So when he cometh thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the same he washeth the fouresquare pillars and images that stand voon those tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles and sweete sauours: afterwards, he facrificeth a bull, and layeth him vpon a heape of wood hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men-and making certaine prayers and petitions vnto Inpiter and Merturie, gods of the earth, he doth folemnly inuite the foules of those valiant men that died fighting for the liberty of GRECE, vnto the feast of the funerall facrifice. Then he taking a cup full of wine in his hand, and spilling it all vpon their tombes, he speaketh these words aloud: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in defence of the liberty of GRBCE. This folemne ceremony and aniuerfarie, the PLAT ÆIANS do duely obserue vnto this present day. Now whenthe ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Aristides perceining the people were bent to stablish a popular state, where the people might beare the whole rule and authority, judging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noble service and valiant courage they had shewed in this warre: and confidering also that they would hardly be Arifides brought to like of any other gouernement, being yet in armes, and very frout, by reason of the preservesh famous victories they had obtained: he caused a law to be made, that all authority of gouernementshould runne in equality among the citizens, and that thence foorth all burgesses (as well a wicked poore as rich) should be chosen by voices of the people, and promoted to offices within the city. And moreouer, when Themistocles told in open assembly, that he had athing in his head would be greatly to the profit and commodity of the state, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for diverse respects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Aristides onely, and to take his aduice in it, to know whether it was meete to be done, or not. Then Themistocles told him secretly missocles betweene them, that he thought to fet the arcenall on fire, where all the GRECIANS ships lay: alledging, that by this meanes the ATHENIANS shold be the greatest me of power in al GRECE. of the A-Aristides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the people againe, and told the themians. whole councell openly, that nothing could be more profitable indeed for the whole commonwealth, and withall more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. generals of When the people heard Aristides answer, they willed Themistocles to let his device alone the Ather whether the Aristides are the Aristides and the much did they still a still against the Aristides are still as a stainst the Aristides are still as a stain as a stain are still as a stain are sta whatsoeuer it were: so great insticers were the Athenians, and so much did they trust A. the barba, ristides wisdome and equity besides. So they made Aristides afterwards Generall of the armie rom pape. of the Athenians together with Cimon, and fent them to make warre against the barbatous people. LACED EMONIANS in GRECE, not by force of armes, nor by flips, not by numbers of horfes but onely by his graue and wife gouernment. For if the inflice and vertue of Arifides, and the mildnesse and curtesse of Cimon made the government of the ATHENIANS to be liked of and accepted of althe other people of GRECE: the conetous field, pride and fiercenesse of Paulanias made it much more to be defired. For Paulanias never spake vnto the other captaines of the peo. ple, allies, and confederates, but it was euer in choler, and he was too sharpe with them: and for the poore private fouldiers, he would caufe them to be cruelly whipped for every finall of fence, or elfe make them stand a whole day together on their feete, laying a heavy iron anker vpontheir shoulders. No man durst goe forrage, neither for straw, nor reedes to make their couches of, nor durst water their horse before the Spartans: for he had set skouts for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Ariftides thought to have spoken to him, and to have told him fornething, he frowned vpon him: and faid he had no lev. fureto speake with him now, and so would not heare him: whereupon the captaines of the other GRECIANS, and specially those of CHIO, of SAMOS, & of LESBOS, did afterwards follow Arie. fides, and persuaded him to take youn him the charge & authority to command the other peo. ple of GRECE, and to take into his protection the allies and confederates of the same, who long fithens wished to renolt from the gouernement of the LACED ÆMONIANS, and onely to sub. mit themselves ynto the Athenians. Aristides answered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they faid, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the Athenians might have good ground and assurance of their vindoubted sidelity and good feruice, they should deliuer them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some samous act attempted against the LACED EMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst ne. uer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Vliades SAMIAN, and Antagoras of CHIO hearing him fay fo, both captaines of galleys confedered together: they wet one day to fet vpon the Admirall galley of Panfanias, hard by BIZANTIVM, the one of the one fide of her, and the other on the other fide, as she was rowing before all the sleete. Paulanias feeing them, stood vp straightin a maruellous rage against them, & threatned them that before it were long he would make them know they had bene better to have affaulted their owne naturall country, then to have fetypon him as they had done. But they answered him, and bad him get him away quickly if he were wife, and let him thanke Fortune hardly, that granted the GRECIANS victory at the battell of PLAT ÆB s vnder his leading and that it was nothing else but the onely reverence and respectof the fames that had made the GRECIANS hold their hands till now from giving him that inft punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserved. So the end was, they left the LACED EMONI. ANS, and flucke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherein was eafily differed the great courage and Wonderfull magnanimity of the LACED &MONIANS. For when they faw their captaines were marred and corrupted, through the ouer great authority and liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commandement over the other GRECIANS, and did no more fend their captaines to be Generals of the whole army of GRECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they shold be obcdient, and in enery point observe the discipline and law of their country, then if they had bene otherwise the onely rulers and Lords over the whole country. Now at what time the La-CED ÆMONIANS did commandall GRECE, as Lords, the cities and people of GRECE did pay a certaine film of money, towards defraying of the charges of the warres against the barbarous people. But after that their feigniority and rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented araxe should be leauied, and that every city should be reasonably sessed, according to their wealth and ability because every city might know what they should pay. And for this purpose, they prayed the Athenians they wold appoint Arifides to take order for it, vnto whom did fesse they gave full power and authority to taxe and sesse every city indifferently, considering the greatnes of the territory, & the reuenues of the same, as every one was reasonably able to beare it. But if Aristides were poore when he entred into that great charge & office of authority, wherein all GR ECE in maner did refer themselves vnto his discretion; he came out of that office more poore, and had made his affesticment and taxation not onely justly and truly, but also so indifferently according vnto every mans ability, that there was no man could find fault with his doings. And like as the ancient men in old time did celebrate and fing out the bleffednesse of those that lived vnder the reigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: even so did the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwards honour the affestement made by aristides calling it the fortunat & bleffed time of GRECE, and specially, when shortly after it did double. and treble on the sudden. For the taxe Aristides made, came to about sourch undred and threefcoretalents, and Pericles raised it almost vnto a third part. For Thucydides writeth, that at the beginning of the warres of Peloponnesus, the Athenians leavied fixe hundred talents vearely upon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the oratours & counsellors for matters of state, did raise it vp higher by little and litle, vntill it mounted to the summe of thirteene hundred talents. And this was not because the warres did rise to so great a charge, by reafon of the length of the same, and of the losses the Athenians had received: but for that they did accustomethe people to make distributions of money by hand vnto enery citizen, to make them fet vp games, and make goodly images, and to build vp sumptuous temples. Thus was Ariflides therefore iustly honored, praised and esteemed about all others, for this iust imposition of taxes, fauing onely of Themistocles: who went up and downe fleering at the matter, faying it was nomeete praise for an honest man, but rather for a coffer well barred with iron, where a man might fafely lay vp his gold & filter. This he spake to be even with Aristides, which was nothing toward the space that the like the sharpe gird Aristides gaue him openly, when Themstooles talking with him, told him it misecles was an excellent thing for a captaine to be able to know, and to preuent the counsels and doings and stiffiof the enemies : And so it is, said Aristides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honest thing, and meete for a worthy Generall of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Arifides made all the other people of GRECE to fweare, that they would truly keepe the articles of the alliance, and he himselfe as Generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their oaths in the name of the Athenians: and so pronouncing execrations and curses against them that should breake the league and oath taken, he threw iron wedges red hot into the fea, and prayed the gods todestroy them even so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstanding, afterwards (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteration in the state, and that the ATHENIANS were forced torule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the danger & burthen of periury and execration, and that they should not let for fearether of to do any thing what foeuer they thought meete or necessary. To conclude, Theophrastus writerh, that Arillides was not onely a perfect, an honest, and inst man, in private matters betwixt party and party: but in matters of state, and concerning the commonweale, he did many things oftentimes according to the necessity of the time, and troubles of the city, wherein violence and iniuflice was to bevsed. As when the question was asked in open councell, to know whether they mighttake away the gold & filuer, that was left in the Ile of DELOS fafely laid vp in the temple necessities of of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres against the barbarous people, and to bring it fro thence vnto Ar HENS, vpo the motion of the Samians, although it was directly against the articles of the alliance, made and fworne among all the GRECIANS: Aristides opinion being afked in the fame, he answered it was not iust, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his city to rule and command many thousands of people, yet was he still poore for all that, and till his dying day he gloried rather to be praifed for his pouerty, then for all the fa- Arifides mous victories & battels he had won and that plainly appeared thus. Callias Ceres torch-bearer, gloried in was his peared binforce who through enemies camero be accused and stood in hazard of life is happeners. was his neare kinfman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stood in hazard of life so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accusers very faintly, and to litle purpose, vttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other bymatters, left the chiefe matter, and spake thus to the Judgesmy Lords, you all know Arifides the fon of Lysimachus, and you are not ignorant also that his vertue hath made him more estecmed, then any man else is, or can be, in all GRECE. How thinke ye doth he liue at home, when yousee him abroad vp and downe the city, in a threed-bare gowne all to be tattered. Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all see quake for very cold, being so ill arraied and clothed. And yet M. Calls as here his cosin germaine the richest citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable, that notwithstanding Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authority among you, he suffered him and his poore wife & children ready to beg & starue for any helpe he giueth him. Callias perceiuing the ludges more angry with him for that, then for any matter else he was accused of: he prayed Aristides might be fent for, and willed him to tell truly whether he had not offered him good round fums of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it, which he euer refused, and answered him alwayes, That he could better boast of his pouerty, then himselfe could of his riches:

(which he faid many did vse ill, and few could vse them well) and that it was a hard thing to find one man of a noble mind, that could away with pourty, and that fuch onely might be ashamed of pouerty, as were poore against their wils. So Aristides confirmed all he spake to be true: & c. uery man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Aristides, then rich as Callias. This tale is writtethus by Aschines the Socratian philosopher: & Plate reporteth of him also, that not with standing there were many other famous and noble men of ATHENS, yet he gaue Aristides praise aboue them all. For others, said he: (as Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles) have beautified the city with stately porches, & sumptuous buildings of gold and filuer, and with store of other fine superfluous deuices: but Aristides, was onely he, that vertuoufly disposed himselfe and all his doings, to the furtherance of the state and common weale. His inffice and good nature appeared plainly in his doings, and behauiour towards Themistocles. For though Themistocles was cuer against Aristides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practife he was banished from ATHENS: ver when Themistocles was accused oftreason to the state, having diverse sharpe enemies against him. as Cimon, Alemaon, with diverse other, Aristides sought not revenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither spake nor did any thing against him at that time to hurt him : neither did he reioyce to fee his enemie in mifery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his profperity. And touching driftides death, some write that he died in the realme of Pontvs, being fent thither about matters of the state: and other thinke he died an old man in the citie of A. THENS, greatly honoured and beloued of all the citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN writeth of his death in this fort: After that Themistecles (saith he) was fled, the people of ATHENE became very stubburne and infolent; wherupon, many lewd men grew to be comon appeachers and accusers of the noble men and chiefest citizens, and to stirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people against them, who were waxen proud by reason of their prosperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Among the rest, Aristides was condemned for extortion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, vpon one Diophantes accusation, of the village of AMPHITROPE who burthened him, that he tooke money of the Ionians, to make the annual tribute ceffe which they payed vnto ATHENS: and so Craterus faith, that because Aristides was not able to pay the fine they fet vpo his head (which was fine Minas) he was driven to for fake ATHENS. & to get him into Ion 1A, where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he writeth as his pleading his fentence and condemnation, or any decree pal. fed against him, although he vsed great diligence else in collecting all such matters, and vouching his authors. Furthermore, all other writers that have specially noted the faults & offences committed by the people of ATHENS in former times against their captaines and governours: they do declare Themistocles exile, Miltiades captiuity that died in prison, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that flue himselfe in the pulpit for orations, when he saw he was condemned: and tell diverse such stories, adding too also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no matter of mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh of Moreouer, Arifides tombe is to be seene arthis day vpon the hauen of Phalervs, which was set vp for himat the charge of y common wealth, as it is reported, because he died so poore a man, as they found nothing in his houseto bury him with. Other go further, and say that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the commonwealth, & that the city gaue enery one of them three thousand Drachmas: and his sonne Lysimachus, a hundred Minas of silver, anda hundred Iugera; and at Alcibrades request, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him source Drachmas a day besides, of ordinary allowance, Furthermore, when this Lysimachus died, helest aliue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Callifthenes writeth, as much prouision to line withal, as they gave to any that wanthe Olympian games. And sithence, Demetrius PHALERIAN, Hyeronimus RHODIAN, Aristoxenus the Musitian, and Aristotlethe Philosopher, at the least if the booke intituled of Nobility be any of Aristotles works: all these agree together, that one Myrto, Aristides daughters daughter, was maried to the wife Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (hauing a wife already) because she was a poore widow, and could not be maried for her pouerty, having much ado to line. Yet Panatius doth write against him, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well he had feene one Lysimachus, Arifides sonnes sonne, or his daughters sonne, that was very poore, and lived of that he could get to interprete dreames, by certaine tables, wherein was written the artto interprete the fignification of dreames; and that he kept commonly about the temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, vnto whom, together with his morher and his fifter, he faid he had caused the people to give them a Triobulum apeece, every day towards their living. It is very true that the selfe same Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the state of Athens, ordained that his mother and fister should have each of them a Drachma by the day to find them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new nor strange thing, that the people of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe and to relieve the The Albert women that dwelt in the city: confidering that in times past, Aristogicon having a litle daughter manuem. in the Ile of Lemnos, in very hard and poore estate, and that could not be bestowed in mariage their libra for her pouerty, they caused her to be brought to Athens, and maried her in one of the no- rally. blest houses of the city, & made her a joynter besides in the village of Potamos. Which great courtesicand humanity of theirs, hath euer descrued great fame and commendation, and yet continueth euen vitill this day, in that noble city of ATHENS, in the mouth of euery manthere.

ARCVS Cate and his ancestors, were (as they fay) of the city of Thys-CVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and dealt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt and lived in the countrey of the Sa-BYNES, vpon certaine land his father left him. And thoughto many his ancestors were knowne to haue bene obscure: yet he himselfe did highly commend his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and faying he was a fouldier, and had ferued valiantly in the field. And he telleth also of another Gato that was his great grandfather, who for his valiant service had bene of rewarded of the Generals, with such honorable gifts, as the Romaine's diduse to give unto them that had done some samous act in any battell: and how that he having lost fine horses of service in the warres, the value of the same was restored to him againe in mony of the common treasure, because he had shewed himselse trusty and valiant for the common wealth. And where they had a common speech at Rome, to call them vpftarts that were no gentlemen borne, but did rife by vertue: it fortuned Cate to be cate called called one of them. And for his part he did confesse it, that he was the first of his house that an applare, euer had honour, and office of state; but by reason of the noble acts and good service of his and ceftors he maintained he was very ancient. He was called at the beginning after his third name Priscus: but afterwards by reason of his great wisedome and experience, he was surnamed Cate. because the Romain Bs call a wife man, and him that hath feene much, Cato. He was somewhat giuen to be red-faced, and had a paire of staring eyes in his head, as this mantelleth vs, that for ill tion of this will wrote these verses of him after his death:

Pluto (the god) which rules the Furies infernall, Will not receive the damned ghost, of Porcius in his ball. His fawcy coppered no fe, and fierie staring eyes, His common flanderous tales, which be did in this world deuife. Made Pluto stand in dread, that he would brawle in hell,

Although his bones were drie and dead; on earth he was so fell. Furthermore, touching the disposition of his body, he was maruellous strong and lustic, and all because he did vse to labour and toile euen from his youth, and live sparingly, as one that was cuer brought vp in the warres from his youth: fo that he was of a very good conflictution, both for strength of body, and for health. As for vtterance, he esteemed it as a second body, and most necessary gift, not only to make men honest, but also as a thing very requisit for a manthat should beare sway and authority in the common wealth. He practised to speake well in litlevillages neare home, whither he went many times to pleade mens causes in courts judiciall, that would retaine him of counfell: fo as in short time he became a perfect pleader, and had tongue at will, and in processe of time became an excellent Orator. After he was thus well known, they estent ora that were familiar with him, began to perceive a grave manner and behaviour in his life, and a certaine noble mind in him, worthy to be employed in matters of state and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For healid not onely refule to take fees for his pleading, and following the causes he maintained : but furthermore made no reckoning of theestimation he wan by that manner and practife; as though that was not the onely marke he florat. But his defire reached further, rather to win himfelfe fame by feruice in the warres, and by valiant fighting with his enemy, then with fuch a quiet and pleafing manner of life. Infomuch as when he was but a young stripling in manner, he had many cuts voon his breast, which he had received in diverse battels and encounters against the enemies. For he himselfe writeth, thathe was but seuenteene yeares old, when he went first vntothe warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe prosperity, when he spoiled and destroyed all ITALY. So when he came to sight he would firike luftily, and neuer firre footenor give backe, and would looke cruelly vponhis enemie, and threaten him with a fearefull and terrible voice, which he vied himfelf, and wifely taught other alfo to vie the like for fuch countenances, faid he many times do feare the enemis more then the fword ye offer them. When he went any journey, he cuer marched on foote and caried his armor vpon his backe, & had a man waiting on him that caried his victuals with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they fay) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or supper, but did helpe to dresse it himselse for the most part, if he had any leisure, when he had done the dutie of a private fouldier in fortifying the campe, or fuch other needfull businesse. All the while he was abroad in feruice in the wars, he neuer dranke other then cleane water, vnlesse it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a little vineger: but if he faw he nius cui sus were weake, he wold then drinka litle wine. Now it fortuned that Manius Cirius the Romaine who had triumphed thrife, had a prety house & land hard by Cato, where he kept in times past, bing Gen. which Guo for a while would visite off. And he confidering how little land he had to his house, & what a little house he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondred with himselfe what manner of man Curius had bene, that having bene the greatest man of Rome in his time, and hauing subdued the mightiest nations and people of all ITALY, and driven king Pyrrus also out of the same yet himself with his owne hands did manure that litle patch of ground, and dwell info poore & finall a farme. Whither notwithstanding after his three triumphs, the SAMNITES fent their Ambassadors to visite him, who found him by the fires side seething of parseneps, and presented him a maruellous deale of gold, from their state and communalty, But Curius returned them again with their gold, and told them, that fuch as were contented with that fupper, had no need of gold nor filuer; and that for his part, hethought it greater honor to command them that had gold, then to haue it himselfe. Cate remembring these things to himselfe, went home againe, and began to thinke upon his house, of his liuing, of his family and servants, and also of his expences, and to cut off all superfluous charges, and fell himselfe to labour with his owne hands, morethen euer he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTYM againe, Cate served vnder him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the Pythagorian Philosopher, in whom he took maruellous de- 200 stribes light to heare him talke of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that the Extre Plate did, by calling him the sweete poyson and chiefest baite to allure men to ill: and saying that Thiefest the body was the first plague vnto the soule, and that her onely health, remedie, and purgation phersones flood vpon rules of reason, good examples and contemplations, that drive sinfull thoughts and shooting. carnall pleasures of the body, farre off from her. Cato moreouer gaue himselfe much to sobriety Platoes and temperance, and framed himselfe to be content with litle. They say he fell in his very old of this weight of the same of t age to the studie, of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited some Catolearwhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his matter, and also to be eloquent; ned the which plainly appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, and flories tongue in taken out of the Greeke authors; and many of his sentences and morals, his adages and quicke his olige. answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now there was a noble man of Rome at Construction that time, one of great authority, & a deepe wife man befides, who could eafily differne buds of by Domovertue sprouting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable disposition to "themselse." helpe forward, and to advance fuch: his name was Valerius Flaccus, a necrencighbour vnto Cato, greece. who was informed by his feruants of Catoes strange life., how he would be doing in his ground Flactors with his owne hands: and how he would be gone enery day betimes in the morning to little vil- grave wife lagesthereabours, to pleade mens causes that prayed his counsell, and that when he had done he Gateet would come home againe: & if it were in Winter, that he would but cast a litle coat on his shoul- strange life, ders, and being Sommer he wold go out bare-necked to the wast, to work in his ground among his seruants and other workmen; and would besides, sit & cate with them together at one boord, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him alfo a world of fuch maners and fashions he vfed, that shewed him to be a maruellous plaine man, without pride, & of a good nature. The they told him what notable wife fayings and grave fentences they heard him fpeake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceining he was of a very good nature, and well given, and that he was a good graffe to be let in a better ground, he per swaded him to come to Rome, and to practife there in the affembly of the people, in the common causes and affaires of the comonweale. Cate followed his counsell, who having bin no long practifer among them, did grow cate goath straight into great estimation, and wan him many friends, by reason of the causes he tooke in to Reme by hand to defend and was the better preferred and taken allo, by meanes of the special fauour and Valerius countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For first of all, by voice of the people he was chosen Tribune of the fouldiers (to fay, colonell of a thouland footmen) & afterwards was made treasurer: Calechofen and so went forwards, and grew to so great credite and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus milium. companion in the chiefest offices of state, being chosen Consult with him, and then Censor. But cancer of to begin withall, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, about all the Senators of Rome, free in the and gaue himselfe to follow him altogether: and not so much for the credit & estimation Fabius Cato follow Maximus was of (who therein excelled all the Romaines of that time) as for the modesty and ed Fabrus discreet gouernment he saw in him, whom he determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour &example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and cuill will of Scipio the Great, who did catossemus Ariue arthar present being but a yong man, with the authority and greatnes of Fabius Maximus, lation with as onethat seemed to enuy his rising & greatnesse. For Cato being sent treasurer with Scipio, when Scipiothe he underrook the journy into A and or and perceiping Scipiothe hountiful nature & disposition Great. he vndertook the journy into Africk e, and perceiving Scipioes bountiful nature, & disposition to large gifts without meane to the fouldiers: he told him plainely one day, that he did not fo much hurt the commonwealth in wasting their treasure, as he did great harme in changing the treasurer ancient manner of their auncestours: who vsed their souldiers to be contented with litle, but he taught them to spend their superfluous mony (al necessaries provided for) in vaine toics & trifles can, reproto scrue their pleasure. Scipio made him answer, he would have no treasurer should controll him uddim in this fort, northat should looke so narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the for his wars, with full failes as it were, and that he would (and did also determine) to make the state prinicto all his doings, but not to the mony he spent. Cato hearing this answer, returned with speed

out of Sicila vnto Rome, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio fpeni infinitely, and that he tended playes, comedies, and wreftlings, as if he had not benefent to make warres, inuafions, and attempts upon their enemies. Vpon this complaint the Senate and pointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to go and fee if their informations were true: and finding them so, that they should bring him backe againe to Rom B. But Scipio shewed farre other. wife to the commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparent victory, through the necessary preparation and prouision he had made for the warres; and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great businesse, and was at any leafure, he would be privately merrie with his friends: and though he was liberall to his fouldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his dutie and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke shipping, and failed towards AFRICKE, whither he was sent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increased still in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, fo that diverfe called him the Demofthenes of Rome: howbeit the manner of his life was in more estimation then his cloquence. For all the youth of Rome did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of words, and one enused another which of them should come nearest: but few of them would file their hands with any labour as their forefathers did, & made a light supper and dinner without fire or pronisson. or would be content with a meane gown, and a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honourable to defie fancies and pleasures, then to have and enjoy them. Because the state was waxen now of such power and wealth, as it could no more retaine the ancient discipline, and for mer aufterity & straightnesse of lifeit vsed:but by reason of the largenesse of their dominion and scigniority, at the numbers of people and nations that were become their subjects, it was even forced to receive a medley of fundry countrey fashions, examples, and maners. This was a cause. why in reason mendid so greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they saw other straight wearied with paines and labour tenderly brought vp like pulers; and Cato on the other fide neuer ouer. come, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coueted honor. nor in his age also when he was gray headed and bald, after his Confulship and triumph: but like a conquerour that had gotten the maistery, he would neuer give over labor even vnto his dying day. For he writerh himselfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backethat cost him aboue 100 pence, and that his hinds and workemen alwayes drunke no worfe wine, when he was Confull and Generall of the army, then he did himselfe; and that his cater neuer bestowed in meatefor his supper, aboue thirty Aises of Romain money, and yet he said it was because he might be the stronger, and apter to do service in the wars for his country & the common wealth. He said furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that died, he had a peece of tapeftry by him with a deepe border, which they called them the BABYLONIAN border, and he caused it straight to be fold: and that of all his houses he had abroad in the country, he had not one wall plasfered, nor rough cast. Moreouer he would say, he never bought bondman or slave dearer, then a thoufand fine hundred pence, as one that fought not for fine made men and goodly perforages, but frong fellowes that could away with paines, as carters, horse-keepers, neat-heards, & suchlike and againe he would fell them when they were old, because he would not keepe them when they could do no feruice. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a man bought any thing deare, that was for litle purpose; yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to beflow so little, for that which needed not. He wold have men purchase houses, that had more store of arable land and pasture, the of fine hortyards or gardens. Some fay, he did thus for very misery and couetousnesse: other thinke, and tooke it that he lived so sparingly, to move others by his example to cut off all superfluity and waste. Neuerthelesse, to sell slaues in that fort, or to turne them out of doores when you have had the service of all their youth, & that they are grownold, Gentlenesse as you vie brute beaftes that have ferued whilest they may for age : me thinkes that must needes proceed of too seuere and greedy a nature, that hath no longer regard or consideration of humanity, then whilest one is able to do another good. For we see, gent kenesse goeth further then inflice. For nature teacheth vs to vse instice onely to them, but gentlenesse sometimes is shewed vnto bruite beasts: and that cometh from the very fountaine and spring of all courtesseand humanity, which should never dry vp in any man living. For to fay truly, to keep cast horses spoiled in our feruice, and dogs also, not only when they are whelpes, but when they be old, be even tokens of loue and kindnes. As the ATHENIANS made a law, when they builded their teple called Hecatompedon: that they should suffer the moyles and mulets that did service in their cariages about the building of the same, to graze every where, without let or trouble of any man. And they fay there was one of their moiles thus turned at liberty, that came her felfe to the place to labour, going before all the other draught beafts that drew vp carts loden towards the caftell. and kept them company, as though she feemed to encourage the rest to draw; which the people liked fo well in the poore beaft, that they appointed she should be keept whilst she lived, at the charge of the town. And yet at this present are the graues of Cimons mares to be seene, that wan him thrice together the prize of the horse race at the games Olimpian, and they are hard by the grave of Cimon himselfe. We heare of diverse also that had buried their dogsthey brought up in their house, or that waited on them: as among other, old Xanthippus buried his dog in the top of a Xanthippu cliffe, which is called the dogs pit til this day. For when the people of ATHENS did for like their days least the dogs pit til this day. For when the people of ATHENS did for like their days like their day city at the coming downe of the king Xerxes, this dog followed his mafter, fwimming in the fea by his galleys fide, from the firme land, vnto the He of Salamina. And there is no reason, to be igalvse lining and sensible things, as we would vse an old shoo or a rag, to cast it out vpon the dunghill when we have worn it, and can serve vs no longer. For if it were for no respect else, but to vie sheurto sa vs alwaies to humanity, we must ever shew our selves kind and gentle, even in such small points lamina, and of pitie. And as for me, I could neuer find in my heart to fell my draught Oxe that had ploughed belanded. my land a long time, because he could plough no longer for age: and much lesse my slaue, to sell him for a little money, out of the countrey where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life, wher with he was best acquainted, & then specially, when he shall be as vnprofitable for the buyer, as also for the seller. But Cato on the other side gloried, that he left his horse in Spaine he had served on in the warres during his Consulship, because he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing him home by feainto ITALIE. Now a queftionmight bemade of this, and probable reason of either side, whether this was noblenesse or aniggardlinesse in him: but otherwise to say truly, he was a man of a wonderfull abstinence. For when he was Generall of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three bushels of wheate carees amoneth of the commonwealth, for himselfe and his whole family and but a bushel and a halfe life. of barly a day, to keepe his horse and other beasts for his cariage. On a time when he was Precede to Calo Precede to the common wealth, for himselfe and but a bushel and a halfe life. tor, the gouernement of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot: and where the other Prætors be- tor insarforchim had put the countrey to exceeding great charge, to furnish them with tents, bedding, clothes, and fuch like stuffe, and burthened them also with a maruellous traine of servants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expense in feasting and banqueting of them: Cato in contrary manner brought downcall that excesse and superfluitie, vntoa maruellous neare and vncredible fauing. For when he went to visite the cities, he came on foote to them, and did not put them to a peny charge for himselfe; and had onely one officer or bailiffe nearinesse. of the state that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine in bis cirto the gods in his facrifices. But though he came thus fimply to the fubiects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed himselfe seuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iu- catees Gflice and spared no man, in any commandement of service for the state, and commmonwealth: werity. for he was therein so precise, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the Sardinians vnder his gouernement, both to loue and feare the Empire of Rome, more then euer they had before: as appeareth plainely by the manner both of his spea- causes king and writing: because it was pleasant and yet graue: sweete and fearefull:merry and seucre, speech and sententious and yet familiar, such as is meete to be spoken. And he was to be compared vnto Socrates: who (as Plato faith) at the first fight was a plaine simple manto them that knew him The praise but outwardly, or else a pleasant taunter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and of socrates, found him throughly, they saw he was full of graue sentences, goodly examples, and wife perfwafions, that he could make men water their plants that heard him, &leade them as he would by the care. Therefore I cannot fee any reason that moues men to say, Cate had Lysias grace and vttcrance. Notwithstanding, let vs referre it to their judgements that make profession to difcerne Oratours graces and stiles: for my part I shall content my selfeto write at this present, only certaine of his notable fayings and fentences, perswading my self that mens maners are better discerned by their words, then by their lookes, and so do many minke. On a time seeking to diffwade the people of Rome, which would needes make a thankefull distribution of corne vnto enery citizen, to no purpose, he beganne to make an oration with this presace. It is a hard catter say thing (my Lords of Romb) to bring the belly by persuasions to reason, that hath no cares.

And another time, reprouing the ill gouernment of the city of Rome, he faid it was a hard thing to keepe vp that state, where a litle fish was fould dearer then an Oxe. He said also that the Ro-MAINES were like a flocke of sheepe: for faith he, as enery Weather when he is alone, doth nor obey the shepheard, but when they are altogether they one follow another for loue of the formost even so are you for when you are together, you are all contented to be led by the noses by a fuch, whose counsell not a man alone of you would vie in any private cause of your owne. And talking another time of the authoritie the women of Rome had over their husbands, he faid to ther men commanded their wives, and we command men, and our wives command vs. But this last of all he borrowed of Themistocles pleasant sayings. For his sonne making him do many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day: The ATHENIANS command all GRECE, I command the ATHENIANS, you command me, and your sonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vse the liberty he hath with some better discretion, soole and affe as he is fithence he can do more by that power and authoritie, then all the GRECIANS besides. He faid also that the people of Rome did not only delight in diverse forts of purple, but likewisein dinerse fores of exercises. For said he, as dinerse comonly die that colour they see best esteemed and is most pleasant to the eye:euen so the lusty youthes of Rome do frame themselues to such exercife, as they fee your felues most like and best esteeme. He continually aduised the Ro-MAINES, that if their power and greatnesse came by their vertue and temperance, they should take heed they became no changelings, nor waxe worfe; and if they came to that greatneffe by vice and violence, that then they should change to better, for by that meanes he knew very well they had attained to great honour and dignity. Again he told them, that fuch as fued ambitious. ly to beare office in the commonwealth, and were common futers for them, did feeme to beafraid to lofe their way, and therefore would be fure to have others and fergeants before them to shew them the way, left they should lose themselves in the city. He did reprove them also, that often chose one man to continue one office stills for it seemeth, saith he, either that you passe not much for your officers, or that you have not many choice men you think worthy for the office. There was an enemy of his that led a maruellous wicked and an abhominable life, of whom he was wont to fay, that when his mother prayed vnto the gods that she might leaue her some behind her, the did not thinke to pray, but to curfe: meaning to have him live for a plague to the world. And to another also that had vnthriftily fold his lands which his father had left him lying upon the sea fide, he pointed unto them with his finger, & made as though he wondred how he came to be fo great aman, that he was stronger then the sea: for that which the sea hardly cofumeth and eateth out by litle and litle a long time, he had confumed it all at a clappe. Another time, when king Eumenes was come to Rome, the Senate entertained him maruellous honourably, and the nobleft citizens did ftriue, enuying one another, who should welcome him best. But Cato in contrary maner shewed plainely, that he did suspect all this feasting and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friends told him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes company, that is so good a Prince, and loues the Romains so wel: Yea, faid he, let it be fo, but for all that, a king is no better then a rauening beaft that lives of the prey: neither was there euer any king so happie, that deserved to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themistocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylear, surnamed Barca. They say his enemies did malice him, because he vsed commonly to rise before day, and did forget his owne businesse to follow matters of state. And he affirmed that he had rather lose the reward of his well doing, then not to be punished for doing of euill: and that he would be are with all other offending ignorantly, but not with himselfe. The ROMAINES, having chosen on a time three punifb kins. Ambailadors to fend into the Realme of BYTHINIA, one of them having the goute in his feet, the other his head full of cuts and great gashes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, faid, the Romains fent an Ambaffade that had neither feet, head nor *heart. Scipio fued once to Cate at Polybius request about those that were banished from Achaia. The matter was argued afterwards in the Senate, and there fellout divers opinions about it. Some would have had the seasof them restored to their countrey and goods againe to ther were wholly against it. So Catorising reason was vp at the last, said vnto them: It seemes we have little else to do when we stand beating of our braines all day, disputing about these old GRECIANS, whether the ROMAINES or the ACHA-IANS shall burie them: In the end, the Senate tooke order they should be restored vnto their country againe. Wherupon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the banished men whom they had restored by their order, might enjoy their former estates and honours in Acharasthey had at the time of their banishment; but before he would moue the suite vinto the Senate, he would feele Catoes opinion first, what he thought of it. Who answered him, fmiling: Me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlyffes, that when he had teaped out of Cyclops caue the Giant, he would needs go thither againe, to fetch his hat and girdle he had left behind him there. He faith alfo, that wife men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wife men. For wife men faith he, do fee the faults fooles commit, and can wifely avoide them; but fooles never studie to follow the example of wife mens doings. He said also that he ever liked voung men better that blushed, then those that ever looked whitely: and that he would not have Blushing in him for a fouldier, that wags his hand as he goeth, remoues his feete when he fighteth, and row- Joing men teth and snorteth louder in his sleepe, then when he cryeth out to his enemie. Another time when he would taunt a maruellous fat man: See, faith he, what good can such a body do to the commonwealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was given to pleasure, and defired to be great with him: My friend said Cate, as refufine his acquaintance: I cannot live with him that hath better judgement in the palate of his mouth, then in his heart. This was also his faying, that the foule of a louer, lived in anothers bodie. And that in al his life time he repented him of three things. The first was, if that he euer told live is in fecret to any woman: the fecond, that ever he went by water, when he might have gone by land: arothers the third, that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he faw a vicious oldman, he would fay to reproue him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not befides with your vice. And to a feditious Tribune of the people that was suspected to be a poy foner, and would needs paffe fome wicked law by voice of the people, he would fave O yong man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drinke the drugges thou giuest, or to receive the lawes thou offerest. Another time, being reuiled by one that led a lewd and naughtie life: Go thy way, faid he, I am no man to foold with thee; for thou art fo yfed to reuile, and to be reuiled, that it is not dainty to thec: but for my felfe, I neuer vieto heare foolding, and much leffe delight to fcold. These behis wife sayings we find written of him, whereby we may the easilier confecture his manners and nature. Now when he was chosen Confull with his friend Valerius Cato and Flaceus, the government of Spaine fell to his lot, that is on this fide of the river of Beris. So Flaceus Cato having subdued many people by force of armes, & won others also by friendly means: fodainly there came a maruellous great army of y barbarus people, against him, & had enuironed carres do. him io, as he was in maruellous danger, either ihamefully to be taken prisoner, or to be flaine in Spaine. the field. Wherefore he fent prefently vnto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbors vnto the marches where he was. Thefe CELTIBERIAN s did aske him two hundred talents to come and helpe him: but the Romain's that were about him, could not abide to hire the barbarous peopleto defend them. Then Cato told them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonor vnto them. For said he, if the field be ours, then we shall pay their wages we promifed, with the spoile and money of our enemies; and if we lose it, then our selucs and they lyeby it, being left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the end he wan the battell, after a sore conflict, and after that time he had maruellous good fortunc. For Polybius writeth, that all the wals of the cities that were on this fide the river of Bæris, were by his commandement razed in one day, which were many and full of good fouldiers. Himfelfe writeth, that he tooke moe cities in Spaine, then he remained there dayes: and it is no vaine boaft, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of them. Now, though the fouldiers ynder him had gotten well in this journey, and were rich, yet he caused a pound weight of filuer to be giuen to euery fouldier besides: saying he liked it better that many should returne home with filuer in their purses, then a few of them with gold onely. But for himselfe he affirmed: that of Catonab. all the spoile gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, saving that which he took in meate finence and drinke. And yet faid he, I speake it not to reproue them that grow rich by such spoiles: from poile but because I would contend in vertue rather with the best, then in money with the richest, or in concroufnesse with the most anaritious. For not onely he himselfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his Officers also vnder him kept the same course. In this Spanish iourney, he had fine of his fernants with him, whereof one of them called Paccus, brought three young boyes that were taken in the warres, when the spoile was fould to them that would give most. So Cato knew it. But Paccus being affraid to come neare his mafter, hanged himfelfe: and then

Cato fold the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treasurie chests of sauine at Rome. Now while cato was in Spaine, scipio the Great that was his enemie, and fought twist cate to hinder the course of his prosperity, and to have the honour of conquering all the rest of SPAINE, he made all the friends he could to the people, to be chosen in Catoes place. He was no sooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible speede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authority ceaffe the fooner. Cato hearing of his haftie coming, tooke onely fine enfignes of footemen, and fine hundred horsemen to attend vpon him home: with the which, in his journy homeward, he ouercame a people in Spaine called the Lacetant-ANS, and tooke fixe hundred traitours also that were fled from the Romaine's campe to their enemies, and did put to death enery mothers child of them. Scipio storming at that, faid Cata did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, faid: It was the right way to bring Rome to flourish, when noble borne citizens would not suffer meane borne men, and vpstarts as himselse was, to go before them in honour: and on the other side when meane borne men would contend in vertue, with those that were of noblest race, and farre about them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to Rome, the Senate commanded that nothing should be changed nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilest he was in his office. So that the gouernement for which Scipio made such earnest sute in Spaine, was a greater disgrace vnto him then it was vnto Cato: because he passed all his time and office in peace, having no occasion of feredhim to do any notable feruice worthy memoric. Furthermore, Catoafter he had beene Confull, and had granted to him the honour to triumph, did not as many others do, that feele not after vertue, but onely for worldly honour and dignitie: who, when they have bene called to the highest offices of state, as to be Consuls, and have also granted them the honour to triumph, do then leave to deale any more in matters of state; and dispose themselves to live merily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themselues any more. Now Cato farre otherwise behaued himselfe; for he would neuer leaucto exercise vertue, but began afresh, as if he had bene a yong nouice in the world, and as one greedy of honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their causes for them that required his counsell, and go with his friends also into the warres: as he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Confull, and was one of the Lieutenants at the conquest of the country of THRACE, and vnto the provinces adioyning to the riner of DANVBY vpon those marches. After that, he was in GRECE also, Co-Ionell of a thousand footemen, under Manius Aquilius, against king Antiochus surnamed the Great, who made the Romaines fo much affraid of him, as ever they were of enemy, but Hannibal. For, when he had conquered all the regions and provinces of Asia, which Seleucus Nicanor enjoyed before, and had subdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was so proud hearted, as he would needs have wars with the Romains, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest shew and pretence of warres, faying it was to fet the GRECIANS at liberty, who had no cause thereof, confidering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philip, and of the Macedonians, through the goodnes of the Romaines. Notwithstanding, he came out of Asia into Grece with a maruellous great army, and all Grece was straight inarmes and in wonderfull danger, because of the great promises and large hopes the governours of diuerfe cities (whom the king had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto him. Whereupon Manius dispatched Ambassadours vntothecity, and sent Titus Quintus Flaminius among others, who kept the greatest part of the people from rebelling (that were easily drawn to giue care to this innouation) as we have expressed more amply in his life: And caso being sent Ambassadour also, perswaded the Corinthians, those of Patras, and the Ægians, and made them sticke still to the Romain es, and continued a long time at Athens. Some say they find an oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their auncestours: wherein he said, he tooke great pleasure to see ATHENS, for the beauty and statelinesse of the citie. But this is false: for he spake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he could have vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had bene disposed but he did like the lawes and customes of his own country, and the Komaine tongue fo well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Posthumius Albinus, who wrote an history in the Greek tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the tongue: Marie faid Ca- cate mare to, he had descrued pardon indeede, if he had beene forced to have written his storie in the miss albi-Greeke tongue, by order of the states of GRECE, called the councel of the Amphictyons. They fav the ATHENIAN'S wondered to heare his ready tongue. For what he had vitered quickly in maint for few words vino the interpreter, the interpreter was driven to deliver them againe with great fortein the circumstances & many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS Words Greeke lay all in their lippes, and the Romaines words in their heads. Now king Antiochus kept all King Antithe straights and narrow passages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary orbus army, way and entrie into GRECE) and had fortified them aswell with an army that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as also with walls and trenches he had made by hand, besides the naturall strength and fortification of the mount it selfe in sundry places : and so he determined to remainethere, trusting to his ownestrength and fortifications aforesaid, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The ROMAINS also they dispaired vtterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cate remembring with himselfe the compasse the Persi- caron do-ANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GRECE, he departed one night from the campe with part of the army: to prove if he could find the very compasse about, the barbaother. rous people had made before. But as they climed up the mountaine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken in the countrey, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruellous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore souldiers were in maruellous ill taking. Cato seeing the danger they were brought into by this lewd guide, commanded all his fouldiers not to stir a foote from thence, and to tarrie him there : and in the meane time he went himselfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him, (a lustie man, and nimble to clime vponthe rockes) and so went forward at aduenture, taking extreme and vncredible paines, and in much danger of his life, grabbling all night in the darke without Moone light, through wild Oliue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whither they went) vntill they stumbled at the length vpon a litle path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they fet vp certaine markes and tokens, vpon the highest toppes of the rockes they could choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off vpon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had Monne done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the fouldiers, whom they led towards the marks call dro they had fet vp. vntill at the length they found their path-way againe, where they put their fouldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way failed them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater feare, not knowing they were so neare their enemies, as indeed they were. The day beganne to breake a litle, and one of them that marched foremost, thought he heard a noise, and that he faw the GREEKE's campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine fouldiers that kept watchthere. Whereupon Cato made them stay, and willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, because he had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a trice, to know his pleasure: so Cato said vnto them: My fellowes, I must have some of our enemies taken prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that paffage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they arecamped and armed, and after what fort they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke fouldiers. this feate standeth vpon swiftnesse and hardinesse to runne vpon them sodainely, as Lyons do, which being naked feare not to runne into the middest of any heard of searefull beasts. He had no sooner spoken these words, but the FIRMANIAN souldiers beganne to runne downe the The bildmountaines as they were, vpon those that kept the watch: and so fetting vpon them, they being medicand out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they semps of ftraight brought him vnto Cato, who by oth of the prisoner, was aduertised how that y strength Catoes soulof their enemies army was lodged about the person of the King, within the straight and valley of the said mountaine : and that the souldiers they saw, were sixe hundred Arollans, all braue wised of the fouldiers, whom they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer King freezib of Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making small account of the matter, as well for shus camp. their small number, as also for the ill order they kept: he made the trumpets sound straight, and his fouldiers to march in battell with great cryes, himselfe being the foremost man of all his troupe, with a fword drawne in his hand. But when the ATOLIANS faw them coming downe the rockes towards them, they began to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all diforder. Now Manius at the fame prefent also, gaue an affault vnto the walles and fortification the king had made ouerthwart the vallies and straights of the mountaines: at which affault king Antiochus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake fome of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine and anguish he felt, he turned his horse back, and got him behind the preasse. And then there were none of his army that made any more refistance, or that could abide the fiercenesse of the Romaines. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, because it was unpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high rockes on the one fide of them, and with bogges and deepe marishes on the other side, which they must needes fall into if their feete slipped, or were thrust forward by any: yetthey fell one vpon another in the straights, & ran so in heapes together, that they cast them. felues away, for feare of the ROMAINES Iwords that lighted vpon them in enery corner. And there Marcus Cato, that neuer made ceremonie or niceneffe to praise himselfe openly, nor reckened it any shame to do it, did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out vponall victoricand hing dmio- famous exploits: and so did fet it out with all the oftentation and brane words he could gine For he wrote with his owne hands; and fuch as faw him chafe and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driven to fay, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINES, but the ROMAINES bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Confull selfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hote with chasing of the enemie, and spakes. loude with great toy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of Rome could recopence Cato, for his valiant feruice that day. After this battell, the Confull Manius fent Cato to Rome. to be the messenger himselfe to report the newes of the victorie. So he imbarked incontinently, and had fuch a faire wind, that he pailed ouer the feas to Brindes without any danger, and went from thence vnto TARENTVM in one day, and from TARENTVM in foure dayes moreto Rome. And so he came to Rome in five dayes after his landing in ITALY, and made such speed that himselfe was indeed the first messenger that brought newes of the victory. Whereupon he filled all ROME with iou and facrifices, and made the ROMAINES fo proud, that euer after they thought themselves able men to conquer the world both by sea and land. And these bealt the martiall deedes and noble acts Cato did. But for his doings in civill policy and state, hesemed to be of his opinion : that to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good gouernour of the commonwealth could employ himselfe vnto: for he accused many, & subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, he did alwaies stirre vp some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobilitie, the greatnesse of his house, and the magnanimitic of his mind, passed not for any accufation they could lay against him: being out of all seare, they should be able to condemne him: and so he let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he joyned withother that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne brother, and followed the matter io fore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the common-wealth: who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people renoked his condemnation. It is faid that Cato coming through the market place one day, and meeting with a yong man by the way that had ouerthrowne his aduerfarie in suite, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemics to open shame & foile before the people, he embraced him with a good countenance, and faid vnto him: Oh my fonne, facrifices that good children should offer to their fachers soule, be not lambs nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free himselfe from danger, in administration of the commonwealth. For if they could catch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him: so as they fay he was accused almost fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of sourcescore yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: That it was a harder thing to give vp an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whom he liued. And yet was not this the last fute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was fourescore and tenne yeares of age, he accused Sernius Galba. And thus he lived as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, alwayes in continuall fuite and action. For when he wrestled with the first scipio the African about matters of flate and common wealth, he went on vnto the time of the fecond, that was adopted by the first Scipioes sonne, the naturall sonne of Paulus Amylius, who ouercame Perseus, king of MACEDON.

Forthermore, Marcus Cato ten yeares after his Confulship, sued to be Censor, which was in Rome the greatest office of dignitie that any citizen of Rome could attain evaco and as a man The dignite may fay, the roome of all glory and honor of their common wealth. For among other authoriand fices ties, the Cenfor had power to examine mens lives and manners, and to punish every offendor. she cooper. For the Romains were of that mind, that they would not have men marry, beget children, line prinately by themselues, and make feasts and bankets at their pleasure, but that they should stand in feare to be reproued and enquired of by the magistrate; and that it was not good to give every body liberty, to do what they would, following his owne lust and fancie. And they judging that mens naturall dispositions do appeare more in such things, then in all other things that are openly done at noone dayes, & in the fight of the world, vsed to choose two Censors, that were two Surneyors of maners, to feethat enery man behaued himfelfe vertuoufly, & gaue not themselues to pleasure, nor to breake the lawes and customes of the common welch. These officers confers were called in their tong, Cenfores, and alwayes of cultome, one of them was a PATRICIAN, and were chofen the other a commoner. These two had power and authority to disgrade a Knight, by taking away his horse, and to put any off the Senate, whom they saw line dissolutely and disorderly. It was their officealfo, to felfe and rate enery citizen according to the estimation of their goods; to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of enery man, & to keep books of them, besides many other prerogatives they had belonging to their office. Therfore whe Carocameto fue for this office among other, the chiefest Senators were all bent against him. Some of them for very enuy, The Senathinking it shame and dishonor to the Nobility, to suffer men that were meanely borne, and vp- tours and flarts (the first of their house and name, that cuer came to beare office in the state) to be called & Robinsia preferred yntotheir highest offices of state in all their comon wealth. Other also that were illiuers, and knowing that they had offended the lawes of their country, they feared his cruelty too Cattee fue. much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, having the law in his owne hands. So when they had consulted together about it, they did fet up septen competitors against him, who flattered the people with many faire words and promifes, as though they had need of magistrates to vse them gently, and to do things for to please them. But Cato contrariwise, shewing, no countenance that he would viethem gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning those that had lived naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they must reforme their citie, and perswaded the people not to choose the gentlest, but the sharpest Phistions: and that himselfe was such a one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaceus another, in whose company he hoped (they two being chose Censors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydraes heads) all vanitie and voluptuous pleasures, that were crept in amongst them: and that he saw well inough, how all the other futers fought the office by diffionest means, fearing such officers as they knew would deale instly and vprightly. Then did the people of R om E shew themselves nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refused not the sowernesse or seueritie of Cato, but rejected these meale-mouthed men, that feemed ready to please the people in all things: and thereupon chose Marcus Cato Cenfor, and Valerius Flaceus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had bene present officer, and no suter for the office, being in themselves to give it to whom they cannot set thought good. The first thing he did after he was stalled in his Censorship, was that he named cinhin Con Lucius Valerius Placeus his friend and fellow Cenfor with him, prince of the Senate: and among Cato put many other also whom he thrust out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Se-Lucius nate, that had bene Consull seuen yeares before, and was brother also vnto Titus Quintius Fla- Quintius minius that ouercame Philip king of Macedon in battell, which was greater glorie to him, of the So. then that he had bene Confull. But the cause why he put him off the Senate, was this: This Lu-nate. cius Quintius caried cucr with hima young boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credite vnto, as to any of his best familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a put Quin. time whilest Lucius Quintius was Consull and gouernor of a prouince, that he made a feast, time of the and this boy being fet at his table, hard by him, as his maner was, he began to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was pretily merrie; and foothing him, told him he loued him fo dearely, that vpon his departing from Rome, when y fword-players were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated swords, to shew the people passime, he came his way, & left the sight of that he neuer faw, that was very defirous to have feen a man killed. The this Lucius Quintius, to make him seethe like, said:care not for y sight thou hast lost, boy, for I wil let thee see as much

And when he had spoken these words, he commanded a prisoner condemned to die, to be fetched and brought into his hall before him, and the hang-man with his axe: which was forthwith done according to his commandement. Then asked he the boy, if he would ftraight fee the man killed: Yea fir faid the boy; and with that he bade the hang-man strike off his head. Most writers report this matter thus: And Cicero to confirme it also, wrote in his booke de Senecture, that the same was written in an oration Cato made before the people of Rome. Now Lucius Quintius being thus shamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus being of. fended withall, could not tell what to do, but befought the people that they would command Cato to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereupon Cato openly before the people, made recitall of all this feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not fo: Cate would have him fwome before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who faid he would not fweare. whereupon the people judged fraight that he deserved well that shame. So not long after certainegames being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond the ordinary place that was appointed for those that had bene Confuls, he went to fit aloofe offamongst the multitude. The people tooke pitie on him, and made such ado about him, as they forced him to rife, and to go fit among the other Senators that had bene Confuls: faluing the best they could, the shame and dishonour happened vnto so noble a house. Cate put out of the Senate also, one Manlius, who was in great towardlinesse to have bene made Confull the next yeare following, onely because he kissed his wifetoo louingly in the day time, and before his daughter: and reproouing him for it, he told him, his wife neuer kiffed him, but when it thun. dered. So when he was disposed to be merrie, he would say it was happy with him when Inpiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horse from him, that had triumphed for the victor rics he had wonne of the great King Antiochus: which wanne him much ill will, because it ap-Merry with peared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the African, that was dead. But the thing that most grieved the people, of all other extremities he vsed, was his putting downe of all feasts and vaine expenses. For a man to take it cleane away, and to beothundereth. penly scene in it, it was unpossible, because it was so common athing, and every man was given fo to it. Therefore Case to fetch it about indirectly, did praise every citizens goods, and rated their apparell, their coaches, their litters, their wives chaines and iewels, & al other move. ables and houshold stuffe, that had cost aboue a thousand five hundred Drachmes apeece, at ten times as much as they were worth to the end that fuch as had bestowed their mony in those curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were over valued at Moreover he ordained for every thousand Asses that those trifling things were praifed at the owners thereof should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasurie to the end that they who were grieved with this taxe, and saw other pay lesse subsidie (that were as much worth as themselves, by living without, such toyes) might call home them. felues againe: and lay afide fuch foolish brauery and finenesse. Notwithstanding Cato, was ennied euery way. First, of them that were contented to pay the taxe imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanitie: and next, of them also, that would rather reforme themselves, then pay the taxe. And somethinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goods then to let Superfluous them to make any shew of them: & they have a fond opinion besides, that their riches are better things rec-koned for feene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Whereat they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopus the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar friends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, and to make him grant it the fooner, told him it was a thing he might well spare, and di integer, did him no good: Mary faid he, all the goods I haue, are in fuch toyes as do me no good. So this couetous defire we have to be rich, cometh of no necessary defire in nature, but is bread in vs by a false opinion from the common fort. Now Cate caring least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and seucre. For he cut off the pipes and quils private men had made to conuey water into their houses and gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their common conduit heads, and did plucke downe also mens porches that were made before their doores into the streete, and brought downe the prises of common workes in the city, and moreouer raifed the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of most men. Wherefore Titus Flaminius, and certaine other being bentagainst him in open Senate, caused all Catees couenants and bargaines made with the mafter worke-man, for repairing and mending of the common buildings & holy places, to be made voide, as things greatly prejudiciall to the commonwealth. And they did also stirre vp the boldest & rashest of the Tribunes of the people against him, because they should accuse him vnto the people, and make request he might be condemned in the fumme of two talents. They did maruelloufly hinder also the building of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate house: which pallace was finished notwithstanding, and called after his name, Basilica Porcia: as who would Basilica fay, the pallace Percius the Cenfor built. Howbeit it seemed the people of Rome did greatly like Perciability by Cato. and commend his gouernement in the Cenforship: for they set up a statue of him in the temple Catesi. of the goddeffe of Health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nortriumph, but only ingrauedthis inscription word for word, to this effect by translation: For the honour of Marcus Cato in the temple of the the Censor: because he reformed the discipline of the common wealth of Rome (that was farre goddesses) out of order, and given to licencious life) by his wife precepts, good maners, and holy institutions. Indeed, before this image was fet vp for him, he was wont to mockeat them that delighted, getheondiand were defirous of fuch things: faying, they did not confider how they bragged in founders, painters, and image-makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for himselfe, the people did alwayes cary liuely images of him in their hearts, meaning the memorie of his life and doings. When some wondered why diverse meane men and vnknowne persons had images set vp of them, and there were none of him, he gaue them this answer: I had rather men should aske why Cato had no image fet vp for him, then why he had any . In the end, he would have no honest man Bould as abide to be praised, vnlesse his praise turned to the benefit of the common wealth: and yet was bide to be he one of them that would most praise himselfe. So that if any had done a fault, or stept awrie, praise but and show the praise himselfe. and that men had gone about to reproue them, he would fay they were not to be blamed, for the common. they were no Catoes that did offend. And fuch as counterfeited to follow any of his doings, and weath. came short of his manner, he called them left handed Catoes. He would say that in most dangeroustimes the Senate vsed to cast their eyes vpo him, as passengers on the sea do looke vpon the master of the ship in a storme : and that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other as by himselse. His authority was great in matters of state, for his wisedome, his cloquence, and great experience. Besides this commendation, they praised him for what cate agood father to his children, a good husband to his wife, and a good fauer for his profit: for he hims in was neuer carelesse of them, as things to be lightly passed on. And therefore me thinkes I must bus house, needs tell you by the way some part of his well doing, to follow our declaration of him. First of towards of all he maried a gentlewoman more noble then rich, knowing that either of both would make and chither proud and front enough: but yet he thought the nobler borne, would be the more ashamed dren. of diffhonefty, then the meaner borne: and therefore they would be more obedient to their thickends in all honeft management and reaferable ships to be the rehusbands, in all honest manner and reasonable things. Furthermore, he said: that he that beate blebenes his wife or his child, did commit as great a facriledge, as if he polluted or spoiled the holiest greatly things of the world : and he thought it a greater praise for a man to be a good husband then a tel wines. good Senatour. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of old So- Socrates crates, then his patience, in vfing his wife well, that was fuch a shrew, and his children that were fo hare-brained. After Catoes wife had brought him a fonne, he could not have fo carneft bearing businesse in hand, if it had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, to with the go hometo his house, about the time his wife did vnswaddle the young boy to wash and shift of his wife. him: for she gaueit sucke with her owne breasts, and many times would let the slaues chil- caton wife dren sucke of her also, because they might have a natural loue towards her sonne, having to be sume to be such as the sum of the sum sucked one milke, and bene brought vp together. When his sonne was come to age of discretion, and that he was able to learne any thing, Cato himselfe did teach him, notwithstanding he had a staue in his house called Chilo (a very honest man, and a good Grammarian) who this a did also teach many other: but as hesaid himselse, he did not like a saue should rebuke his Gramma. fonne, nor pull him by the cares, when peraduenture he was not apt to take very fodainely that """ was taught him: neither would he haue his sonne bound to a slaue for so great a matter as that, as to haue his learning of him. Wherefore he himfelfe taught him his grammer, the law,

358 and to exercise his body, not onely to throw a dart, to play at the sword, to vawt, to ride a horse brought op and to handle all forts of weapons, but also to fight with fifts, to abide cold and heate, and to fwim ouer a swift running river. He said moreover, that he wrote goodly histories in great letters with his owne hand, because his fon might learne in his fathers house the vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell the He said alfo, that he tooke as great heed of speaking any foule or vncomely words before his son, ashe would have done if he had bene before the Vestall Nunnes. He never was in the hot house with his sonne: for it was a common vse with the Romaines at that time, that the sonnes in law did not bathethemselues with their fathers in law, but were ashamed to see one another naked, But afterwards they having learned of the GREEKES to wash themselves naked with men, it tauoh themalfo to be naked in the bathe euen with their wines. There lacked no towardlinesse, nor good disposition in Catoes some, to frame himselfe vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himselfe willing to follow whatsoener his father trad taught him. Howbeit hewas fuch a weake puling, that he could not away with much hardnesse, and therefore his father was contented not to binde him to that straight and painefull life, which himselfe had kept. Yet he became valiant in the warres. For he fought maruellous stoutly in the battell, in which Perseus King of Macedon was overthrowne by Paulus Amylius: where his fword being striken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweater besides, he fell into a great sury, and prayed some of his friends to help him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemies in that place where his fword fell out of his hand, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them; and clearing the place, found it in #the end, but with much ado, being vnder such an heape of dead bodies and other weapons as well Romaines as Macedonians, one lying on another. Paulus Emplius the General hearing of this act of his, did highly commend the yong man. And at this day there is a letter ex. tant from Cato to his son, in the which he praiseth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the reconering of his fword againe. Afterwards, this Cato the yonger maried Tertia, one of Paulus Emylius daughters, and fifter vnto Scipio the fecond, and fo was matched in this noble house, not only for his owne vertues fake, but for respect of his fathers dignitie and authority: whereby the great care, paines, and study that Cato the father took in bringing vp his sonne, in vertue & learning, was honourably rewarded in the happy bestowing of his sonne. He euer had a great num. ber of young litle slaues which he bought, when any would fell their prisoners in the warres. He did chuse them thus young, because they were apt yet to learne any thing he would trainethem vnro, and that a man might breake them like young colts, or little whelpes. But none of themall, how many focuer he had, did euer go to any mans house, but when himselfe or his wifedid fend them. If any manaske them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or els they must sleepe for he loued them well that were fleepy, holding opinion that flaues that loued fleep were more tractable and willing to do any thing a man would fet them to, then those that were waking And because he thought that nothing did more prouoke slaues to mischiese and naughtinese, then lust and defire of women: he was contented his slaues might company with his bondwomen in his house, for a peece of mony he appointed them to pay, but with straight commandement befides, that none of them should deale with any other woman abroad. At the first when he gaue himselfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his feruants did about his person saying that it was a soule thing for a gentleman or nobleman, to fall out with his servants for his belly. Afterwards as he rose to better state, & grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or supper for any of his friends and familiars, they were no some gone, but he wold fcourge the with whips & leather thongs, that had not waited as they should haue done at the boord, or had forgotte any thing he would haue had done. He would euercraftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they should be friends, being euer icalous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deferued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to die, he would put him to deathbecations good fore them all: Howbeit in his later time he grew greedy, & gaue vp his tillage, saying that it was more pleasant then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his mony surely, and bring a certaine reuenue to his purse, he bestowed it vpon ponds, and naturall hote bathes, places sit for fullers craft; vpon medowes and pastures, vpon copises and young wood; and of all these he made a great and a more quiet reuenue yearely, which he would fay, Iupiter himselfe could not diminish. Furthermore he was a great vsurer, both by land and by sea: and the vsury he tooke cate by fea, was most extreme of all other, for he vsed it in this fort. He would have them to whom he great fish lent his mony vnto, that trafficked by sea, to have many partners, to the number of fifty; and that He tooke they should have so many ships. Then he would venture among them for a part onely, whereof Quintius his flaue whom he had manumiffed, was made his factor, and vied to faile and traf- 2007 to ficke with the merchants, to whom he had lent his mony out to viury. And thus he did not venture all the mony he lent, but a litle peece onely for his part, and got maruellous riches by his v. furic. Moreouer he lent money to any of his flaues, that would therewith buy other yong flaues, whom they taught and brought vpto do feruice, at Catoes charge and cost: and then they fold them againe at the yeares end, and some of them Cato kept for his owne service, and gave his saues as much for them as any other offered. Therefore to allure his son in like maner to make profit of his mony, he told him it was no wife mans part to diminish his substance, but rather the part of a widow. Yet this was a token of a most greedy couetous mind, that he durst affirme him to be divine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimony more then his father left him. Furthermore, when Case was growne very old, Carneades the ACADEMICK, and Diogenes the Stoicke, were fent from Athens as Ambassadors to Rome, to sue for a release of a fine of fine hundred talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS vpon a condemnation passed against them for a contempt of appearance, by the sentence of the Sieroni- carrendes ANS, at the fuite of y Oropians. Immediatly when the fetwo philosophers were arrived in the the Philosophers were arrived in the Philosophers w city of Rome, the yong gentlementhat were giuen to their books, did visit and welcome them, sophers sent and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: ambassas whose grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse then the same ranne of him, Rome, &specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not suppresse his praise. Rome straight was ful, as if a wind had blowne this rumor into enery mans eare:that there was a Grecian arrived, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence wold leade a man as he lift. There was no other talke a while through the whole citie, he had fo inflamed the yong gentlemens minds with loue and defire to be learned; that all other pleafures and delights were fet afide, and they disposed themselues to no other exercise, but to the study of Philosophie, as if some secret and divine inspiration from about had procured them to it. Wherof the Lords and Senators of Rome were glad; and reioyced much to feetheir youth fo well giuen to knowledge, and to the studie of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the companie of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from the beginning that yong menbegan to study the Greeke tongue, & that it grew in estimation in Rome, did dislike caso mission in Rome, did dislike ked the of infearing left the youth of Rome that were defirous of learning and cloquence, would viter- Grace ly giue ouer the honor and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he faw the estimation and same songwee. of thesetwo personages did increase more and more, and in such sort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefest of the Senate made sute to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the city by some honest meane and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambassadours were long there, and had not dispatch: considering also they were cunning men, and could easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might perswade them to determine some answer for them, and so to send them home againe to their schooles, to teach their children of GRECE, and to let alone the children of Rom B, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any private ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought but because he generally hated Philosophie, and of ambition despised the muses and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had said, the ancient Socrates was but a busie man, and a stirrer vp of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to vsurp tyranny and rule in his country: by peruerting and changing the manners and customes of the fame, and alluring the subjects thereof to a disliking of their lawes and ancient customes. And he laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the art of Eloquence: saying his schollers waxed old, and were still so long in learning, that they meant to vse their eloquence and pleade causes in another world before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his sonne from the study of the Greeke tongue, he said to him with a strained voice, and in a bigger found then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecie or inspiration)

306 that folong as the ROMAINE's disposed themselves to study the Greeke tongue, so long would they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proued his vaine words false and vntrue. For the city of Rome did neuer flourish so much, nor the Romaine Empire was ever fogreat. as at that time, when learning and the Greeke tongue most flourished. Howbeit Cato did nor onely hate the Philosophers of GRECE, but did mislike them also that professed phisicke in Rome. For he had either heard or read the answer Hippocrates made, when the King of PERSIA fent for him, and offered him agreat summe of gold and filuer, if he would come and serve him: who sware he would neuer serue the barbarous people that were naturall enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed it was an oath that all other Phisitions sware euer after: where fore he commanded his sonne to flie from them all alike, and said he had written a little booke of phisticke, with the which he did healethose of his house when they were sicke, and did keepe them in health, when they were whole. He neuer forbade them to eate, but did alwayes bring them vp with hearbs, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringdoues and hares: for fuch meates faid he, are good for the fick, and light of digestion, saving that they make them dreame & snort that eate them. He boasted also how with this maner of phisicke, he did alwayes keepe himselfe in health, & his family from ficknesse. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of for he buried both his wife and his sonne also. But he himselfe was of a strong nature, and a lust body, full of strength, & health, and lived long without sicknesses so that when he was a very old man and past mariage, he loued women well, and maried a yong maiden for that cause onely. After his first wife was dead, he maried his sonne vnto Paulus A Emylius daughter, the sister of Scipio, the second African. Cato himselfe being a widower, tooke paines with a prety yong maide that waited in his house, and came by stealth to his chamber: howbeit his haunt could not long continue secret in his house, and specially where there was a young gentlewoman ma. ried, but needs must be spied. So, one day when the young maid went somewhat boldly by the chamber of yong Cato, to go to his father, the yong man faid neuer a word at it: yet his father perceiued that he was fomewhat ashamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his sonne and daughter in law were angry with the matter, saying nothing to them of it, nor shewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the market place (as his maner was with a trainethat followed him, amongst whom was one Salonius that had bene his clearke, and waited upon him as the rest did. Cato calling him out aloud by his name, asked him if he had not yet bestowed his daughter. Salonius answered him, he had not yet beflowed her, nor would not before he made him privy to it. Then Cato told him againe: I have found out a husband for her, and a fonne in law for thee, and it will be no ill match for her vnlesse she mislike the age of the man; for indeed he is very old, but otherwise there is no fault in him. Salonius told him againe, that for that matter he referred all to him, and his daughter allo, praying him euen to make what match he thought good for her: for she was his humble servant, and relyed wholly vpon him, standing in need of his fauour and furtherance. Then can be. gan to discouer, and told him plainely he would willingly marrie her himselfe. Salonius therewith was abashed, because he thought Cato was too old to marriethen, and himselfe was no sit man to match in any honourable house, specially with a Consull, and one that had triumphed: howbeir in the end, when he saw Cato meant good earnest, he was very glad of the match, and fo with this talke they went on together to the market place, and agreed then vpon themariage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the fonne taking fome of his kinne and friends with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in anything, that for spite he should bring him a steppe-mother into his house. Then his father cried out, frer to his and faid: O my sonne, I pray thee say not so, I like well all thou doest, and I find no cause Senne of his fecond many to complaine of thee: but I doit, because I desire to have many children, and to leave many such like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some say that Pissfratus the tyrant of A-THENS, made such a like answer vnto the children of his first wife, which were mengrowne ed Salonius when he maried his second wife Timonassa, of the towne of Argos, of whom he had (as being are it is reported) lophon, and Thessalus. Butto return again to Cato, he had a sonne by his seguing a conduction of the state of cond wife, whomhe named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldest sonne died in his and had a office being Prætor, of whom he often speaketh in diuers of his bookes commending himfor a fon by her. very honest man. And they say, he tooke the death of him very patiently, and like a graue wise man, not leaving therfore to do any feruice or busines for the state, other wise then he did before

And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus furnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of gouernement and state, after they were waxen old. For hethought it a charge and dutie, whereunto every honest man whilest he lived was bound in al piety. Nor as Scipio African had done before him, who perceiving that the glory & fame of his doings did but purchase him the ill will of his citizens, he changed the rest of his life into quietnesse, and for sooke the city and all dealings in commonwealth, and went and dwelt in the countrey. But as there was one that told Dionysius the tyrant of Syraccys, as it is written, that ting and he could not dye more honorably, then to be buried in the tyranny: euen fo did Cato thinke, that Catouras honorably and then in Carolina Catouras hecould not waxe more honeftly old, then in feruing of the comonwealth unto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was defirous a litle to recreate and refresh himselse, he passed his time away in making of bookes, and looking vpon his husbandry in the countrey. This is the cause why he wrote so many kinds of bookes and stories. But his tillage and husbandry in the countrey, he did tend and follow in his youth, for his profite. For he faid he had but two forts of reuenue, tillage and sparing: but in age what soener he did in the countrey, it was all for pleafure, and to learne fomething euer of nature. For he hath written a book of the country life, and of tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe fruits: he would needs shew such fingularitie and skill in all things. When he was in his house in the country, he fared a litle better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and fuch as had land lying about him, to come and suppe with him, and he would be merry with them: for that his company was not onely pleasant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleasant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but alfoto the younger fort. For he had feene much, and had experience in many things, and vied fambul to old and the beauty of the head feene much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much, and had experience in many things, and vied to old and the beauty of the head feet had been much and the head feet had been head feet had been head feet had been head feet had been head f much pleasant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the boord one of the chiefest means young. to breed loue amongst men, and at his ownetable would alwayes praise good men and vertuous The table a citizens, but would fuffer no talke of enill men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is soprocure thought the last notable act and service he did in the common wealth, was the overthrow of live, and CARTHAGE: for indeed he that wan it & razed it vtterly, was Scipio the fecond, but it was chiefly through Catoes counsell and aduise, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CAR- be red. THAGINIANS, and chanced vpon this occasion. Cato was sent into Africk e to understand the cause and controuersie that was betweene the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinista, King of Nv- Cato au-MIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was fent thither because King Massinissa shorosihe had euer bene a friend vnto the Romaines, and for that the Carthaginians were become left war their confederates fince the last warres, in the which they were ouerthrowne by Scipio the first, against the who tooke for a fine of them a great part of their Empire, and imposed vpon them besides, a nian. great year cly tribute. Now when he was come into that country, he found not the city of Can-THAGE in misery, beggery, and out of heart, as the Romains supposed but full of lusty youths, very rich and wealthy, and great store of armour and munition in it for the wars, fo that by reafon of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high faile, and stooped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the Romains to leaue to vinderstand the controuersiesbetwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinisa, and ratherto provide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that hath euer bene an ancient enemie to the Romaines, and cuer fought to be reuenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now growneto that greatnes and courage in fo short time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the Romaines, ascuer they did before. Therfore fo foone as hereturned to Rome, he plainely told the Senate, that the losses and harmes the Cartha-GINIANS had received by the last wars they had with them, had not so much diminished their power and ftrength, as the same had shewed their owne folly and lacke of wisdome: for it was to be feared much, lest their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakned them for the wars. And that they made warres now with the NVMIDIANS, to exercise them only, meaning afterwards to war with themselues; and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission and stay of warres, only expecting time and oportunitie to breake with them againe. They fay moreouer, that befides the perswasions he vsed, he brought with him of purpose Africk e figs in his long sleeues, which he shooke out among st them in the Senate: & when the Senators maruelled to see so goodly faire greene figges, he said: The country that beareth them, is not about three dayes failing from Rome. But yet this is more strange which they report of him besides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was ever the one end of his tale: Me thinketh ftill Carthage would be vtterly destroyed. p_4 . blius Scipio Nassca, vsed cuer in like maner the contrarie speech: that he thought it meete CAR-THAGE should stand. This Publius Scipio saw, in my opinion, that the Romaines through their gainst Cates pride and infolencie were full of abfurdities, and caried themselves very high, by reason of their for the de . happy fixed the and victories and were so lostic minded that the Senare could hardly milest for the de happy successe and victories, and were so lostie minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them from of happy successe and victories, and were so lostie minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them and that by reason of their great authority, they imagined they might bring their citie to what height they would. Therfore he spake it that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a bridle, to raine in the insolencie of the people of Rom B, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS Were of no sufficient power to make wars with the Romaines, nor yetto ouercome them: and euen so were they not wholly to be despised, and not to be feared at all. Cato still replied to the contrary, that therin consisted the greatest danger of all: that a city which was ener of great force and power, and had bene punished for former warres and miserie, would alwayes haue an eye of reuenge to their enemies, and be much like a horse that had broken his haltar, that being vnbridled, would run vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor found aduice, so to suffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their strength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward danger, and the feare they stood in to lose their conquest:and specially, when they lest meanes within the citie selfe to fall still again to their former rebellion. And this is the cause why they suppose Cato was the occasion of the third and last war the Romaines had against the Carthaginians. But now when the warre was begun, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would fay, who it should be that shouldend thosewars. And it was Scipio the second, who being a young man at that time, had charge one ly as a Colonel ouer a thousand footmen: but in all battels, and wherefocuer there was wars, he shewed himselfe euer valiant and wise. Insomuch as newes being brought thereof continually vnto Rome, and Cato hearing them, spake (as they say) these two verses of Homer:

Which prophecie Scipio soone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreouer, the iffue Cato left behind him, was a sonne he had by his second wife: who was called (as we said before) Cato Sa-LONIAN, by reason of his mother, and a litle boy of his eldest son that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a sonne behind him that came to be Confull, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philosopher, one of the most vertuous men of his time.

300 W that we have let downe in writing, these notable and worthic driftides things of memorie: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life and carons of the other, perhaps the difference betweene the one and the other the com. will not casily be discerned, seeing there be so many similitudes and resemblances one of another. But if we come to compare them in cuery particularitie, as we would do Poets workes, or pictures drawne in tables: first, in this we shall find them much alike, that having had nothing else to preferre and commend them, but their onely vertue and wisedome, they have bene both governours in their common wealth, and hane thereby atchieued to great honour and estimation. But me thinkes when Aristides came to deale in matters of state, the common wealth and Seigniorie of ATHENS being then of nogical power, it was easie for him to aduance himselfe, because the other Gouernours and Captaines of his time, and that were competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authoritie. For the taxe of the richest persons then at ATHENS in reuenue, was but at five hundred bashels of corne and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni. The second taxe was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushels, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato coming out of a litle village from a rude countrey life, went at the first dash (as it were) to plunge himselfe into a bottomlesse sea of government in the common wealth of Rome: which was not ruled then by fuch gouernours and Captaines, as Curius Fabricius, and Ostilius were in old time. For the people of Rome did no more bestow their offices upon such meane labouring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke; but they would looke now vponthe nobilitic of their honfes, and upon their riches that gauethem most money, or sued earnestly to them for the office. And by reason of their great power and authority, they would be waited vpon and fued vnto, by those that sought to beare the honourable offices of the state and commonwealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to have Themistocles an adversary and competitor, being neither of noble house, nor greatly rich (for they fay, that all the goods his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fine hundred talents, when he began to deale in state) in respect as to contend for the chiefest place of honour and authority against Scipio African, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, having no other maintenance, nor helpe to trust vnto. but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnesse. Moreouer, Aristides at the battels of Marathon, and of Platzes, was but one of the ten captaines of the Athenians: where Cato was chosen one of two Confuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Cenfors, before seuen other that made suite for it, which were all men of great reputation in the city, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Arifides was never the chiefest in any victory. For arthe battell of Mararnon, Militades was the Generall; and at the battell of Salamina, Themistocles: and at the journey of Plat Els, king Pausaias as Herodotus faith, who writeth that he had a maruellous victory there. And there were that ftrined with Aristides for the second place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable valiant service at those battels. Now Cato was Generall himselfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthinesse and counsell, during the warre he made in Spaine while he was Confull. Afterwards also in the journey where king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, Cato being but a Colonell of athousand footmen, and serving vn. der another that was Confull, warme the honour of the victory, when he did fuddenly fet vpon Antiochus behind, whereas he looked only to defend himselfe before. And that victory without all doubt was one of the chiefest acts that ever Cato did, who drave As IA out of GRECE, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to passe afterwards into Asia. So then for the wars, neither the one for the other of them was euer ouercome in battell but in peace and civill governement Aristides was supplained by Themistocles, who by practise got him to be banished Athens for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greatest and noblest men of Rome that were in dipleasures histime, sworne enemies vnto him and having alwayes contended with them even to his last houre, he euer kept himfelfe on found ground, like a front champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foile. For he having accused many before the people, and many also accusing him, himself was neuer once condemned, but alwaies his tongue was the buckler and defence of his life and inno-The power cencie. Which was to him fo necessary a weapon, and with it he could helpe himselfe in fo great matters, that (in my opinion) it was the only cause why he neuer received dishonor, nor was vniustly condemned: rather then for any thing else he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truly, cloquence is a fingular gift, as Antipater witnesseth, in that he wrote of Ariffetle the Philosopher after his death faying that amongst many other singular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perfiwade what he lifted. Now there is a rule confessed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or know. Occomonia, ledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a citie: a part whereof is Occomomia, commonly called house-rule, considering that a city is no other, then an assembly of many housholds and houses together; and then is the city commonly strong and of power, when as therownes men and citizens are wife and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that banished gold and filter from LACED EMON, and coyned them mony of iron, that would be marred with fire and vinegar when it was hote, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that ever went before him, he did not only cut off all superfluousexpences that commonly waite upon riches, but did also provide that his people should lacke nothing necessary to line withall, fearing more to see a begger and needy person dwelling in hiscity, and enjoy the priviledges of the fame, then a proud man by reason of his riches. So me thinks, Cato was as good a father to his houshold, as he was a good governour to the commonwealth: for he did honeftly increase his goods, and did teach other also to do the same, by sauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof in his booke he wrote fundry good rules and precepts. Arefides contrariwife, made inflice odious and flanderous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans selfe that vsed instice. And yet Hesiodus the Poet, that commendeth instice so much, doth wishvs withall to be good husbands, reprouing floth and idleneffe, as the roote and original of all iniuftice. And therefore me thinkes Homer spake wisely when he said:

In times past, neither did I labour, carke nor care For businesse, for family, for food, nor yet for fare: But rather did delight, with hips the feaes to faile. To draw above, to fling a dart in wars, and to prenaile,

As giving vs to vnderstand, that instice and husbandry are two relatives, and necessarily linked one to the other: & that a man who hath no care of his ownethings nor house, doth live vniustly, and taketh from other men. For inflice is not like oyle, which Phisitions fay is very wholsome for mans body, if it be applied outwardly and in contrary maner very ill, if a man drinke it neither oughtainst man to profit strangers, & in the end not to care for himself nor his. Therefore me thinkes this governing vertue of Aristides had a fault in this respect, if it be true that most Authors write of him: that he had no care nor forecast with him to leave so much, as to marry his daughters withall, nor wherewith to bury himselfe. Where those of the house of Cato, continued Prætorsand Consuls of Rome, euen vnto the fourth descent. For his sons sonnes, and yet lower, his sonnes sons sons came to the greatest offices of dignitie in Rome. And Aristides, who was in his time the chiefest man of GRECE, left his posterity in so great pouerty, that some were whether compelled to become foothfayers (that interpret dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy thing. him. But to cotrary this, it might be faid pouerty of it felf, is neither ill nor dishonest: but where it groweth by idlenesse, carelesse life, vanity and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth vpon any man that is honest, & liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iust, valiant, wise, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great figne of a noble mind: for it is vnpoffible that man should do any great things, that had such a base mind as to thinke alwaies vpon trifles; and that he should releeue the poore greatly, that lacketh himselfe reliefe in many things. And fure, riches are not fo necessary for an honest man that will deale truely in the commonwealth, and gouernement; as is sufficiency: which being a contentation in it selfe, and desirous of no superfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the common wealth, that enioyeth the same. For God is he alone, who simply and absolutely hath no need of any thing at all: wherefore the chiefest vertue that can be in man, that cometh nearest vnto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to have need of least things. For like as a lustic body, and well complexioned, hath no need of superfluous fare and curious apparell: euen fo a cleane life, and found house, is kept with a litle charge; and so should the goods also be proportioned, according to vse and necessitie. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no defire to spend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do defire it, and dare not for niggardlinesse spend part of that he laboureth for, then he is miserable. Now would I aske Cato with a good will, if riches be made butto vsethem, why doe you boast then you have gotten much together, when a litle doth suffice your And if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you find, to drinke of the same tappe workmen & labourers do, not to care for purple died gownes, nor for houses with plastered walls: it followeth then that neither Aristides, nor Epaminodas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabritius, haue forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vie nor occupy. For it was to no purpole for a man that effected rootes and parsenips to be one of the best dishes in the world, and that did seeth them himselfe in his chimney, whilest his wife did bake his bread, to talke so much of an Asse, and to take paines to write, by what art and industrie a man might quickly inrich himself. For it is true, that sufficiencie and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is because it taketh from vs all defire of vnnecessary things, and maketh vs not to passe for them. And therefore we find that Arifides faid, when rich callias case was pleaded, that such as were poore against their wills, might well be ashamed of their pouerry; but such as were willingly poore, had good cause and might justly rejoyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Aristidespouerty proceeded of a base mind and slouthfulnes, since he might quickly have made himfelfe rich without any dishonestie at all, by taking onely the spoile of some one of the barbarous people whom he had ouercome, or any one of their tents. But enough for this matter, Furthermore, touching the victories and battels Cato had won, they did in maner litle helpe to increase avillides the Empire of Rom B: for it was already so great, as it could almost be no greater. But Aristides feets or cause did victories are the greatest conquest and noblest acts that the GRECIANS ever did in any wars: as most benethe journy of Marathon, the battel of Salamina, & the battel of Plat Hes. And yet there is no reasons a second of the salamine, is no reason to compare king Antiochus with king Xernes, northe wals of the townes of Spain B which Cato ouerthrew and razed, vnto fo many thousands of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrown and put to the fword by the GRECIANS, as well by land as by sea. In all which seruices, Aristides was the chiefest before all other, as touching his valiantnesse in fighting: not withstanding he gaue other y glory of it, that defired it more then himselfe, as he did easily leaue the gold & filuer vnto those that had more need of it then himself. Wherein he shewed himself of a nobler mind then all they did. Furthermore, for my part, I wil not reproue Catoes maner, to commend & extoll himselfso highly about all other, since he himself faith in an oration he made that to praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himself; but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect that desireth other should not praise him, then he that comonly doth vie to praise himfelfe. For not to be ambitious, is a great shew of humanitie, and necessary for him that will line amongst men of gouernment : and cuen so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuicynto him that is infected withall. Of the which Ariflides was cleare, and Caro farre gone in it. For A. ristides did helpe Themistocles his chiefest enemie, in all his noblest acts, and did serue him (asa man would fay) like a private fouldier that guarded his person, when Themsseeles was Generall being the onely instrument and meane of his glory: which was indeed the onely cause that the city of ATHENS was faued, and reftored again to her former good state. Cato contrariwise, cross fing Scipio in all his enterprises, thought to hinder his voyage and journey vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hannibal, who vntill that time was ener inuincible; and so in the end. continuing him still in icalousie with the state, and ever accusing of him, he never left him till he had driven him out of the citie, and caused his brother Lucius Scipie to be shamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperancy & modesty which Cato did euer commend so highly, Aristides truly kept them most fincerely. But Catoes second red for his wife, who maried a maid (that was neither fit for his dignitic and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a letcherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he cannot be excused with honestie, that being a man past mariage, brought his sonne that was maried; and his faire daughter in law, a step-mother into his house, and but a Clerks daughter, whose father did write for mony, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cate maried her to fatisfic his luft. or else for spite to be reuenged of his son, because his son could not abide his young filth he had before: either of these turneth stil to his shame, as well the effect as also the cause. Againe, the excuse he made to his sonne why he maried, was a lye. For if he had grounded his desire indeed, to have gotten other children, as he faid, that might be as honest men as his eldest sonne; then surely he had done well after the death of his first wife, if he had sought him another wife soone after, that had bene of an honest house; and not to have lyen with a young harlatry filth. till his fonne had spied him; and then when he saw it was knowne, to go and mary her.

and to make alliance with them, not because it was honourable for him to do it, but easiest tobe obtained.

BOOGN N thecitie of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caffander, one that was as nobly borne & of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time what soener. Not with standing, Fortune frowned on him in the end, infomuch as he was driven out of his country, & went to lie in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crauses, Philopamens father, a rare man, and nobly given Thilese in all things, and one that loued him also very well. Now so long as mem fa-Cransis lived, Cassander was so well vsed at his hands, that he could lack ther. nothing: and when he was departed this world, Caffander, to requite caffander, the love Crauss bare him in his life time, tooke his sonne into his charge, being an orphane, and Philere.

taught him, as Homer faid Achilles was brought vp by the old Phanix. So this child Philopamen misschooles prove to have noble conditions & increased always from an Achilles was brought vp by the old Phanix.

grew to haue noble conditions, & increased alwayes from good to better. Afterwards, when he came to grow to mans state, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke Ecdemus him into their gouernment. They were two Philosophers that had bene hearers of Arcesilaus, in and Demothe schoole of Academia, and afterwards employed all the Philosophie they had learned, vpon Philosophie their gouerning of the common welth, and dealing in matters of state, as much or more, then to shiling. any other men of their time. For they deliuered their city from the tyrannie of Aristodemus, who kept it in subjection, by corrupting those that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus also to drive thetyrant Nicecles, out of SICYONE. At y request of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with civil diffention & factions among them, they went vnto CYRENA, wherethey did reforme the state of the common wealth, and stablished good lawes for them. But for the selections, they reckoned the education and bringing vp of Philopamen, the chiefest act that ever they did indging that they had procured an vniuerfall good vnto all GR E C 1, to bring vpa man of fo noble a nature, in the rules & precepts of Philosophy. And to fay truly, GRECE did loue him paffingly wel, as the relation last valiant man she brought forth in her age, after so many great and famous ancient captaines: manthe last and did alwayes increase his power and authority, as his glory did also rife. Whereupon there formers was a Romaine, who to praise him the more, called him the last of the Grecians: meaning forest

And for that they report of his hostesse in the citie of MEGARA, who tooke him for a serning man; that was by reason of his courtesie, not standing vpon his reputation, and because he went plainly besides. For she understanding that the General of the Achaians came to Innethereal night, she bestirred her, and was very busie preparing for his supper, her husband peraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane feason came Philopamen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his back. The fimple woma feeing him no better apparelled, took him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and fo praied him to lend her his hand in the kitchin. He straight cast off his cloke, and began to fall to hew wood. So as Philopamen was busic about it, in cometh her husband, and finding him riving of wood: Ha ha ha, faid he, my Lord Philopemen, why what meaneth this? Truly nothing elfe, faid he in his DORICAN tongue, but that I am punished, because I am neither faire boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius faid one day vnto him, feeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philogamen, thou hast faire hands and good legs, but thou hast no belly for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Notwithstanding, I take it this iesting tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body, because he had both good horsemen and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. These ieasts, schollers have taken vp in schooles, of Philepainen. But now to descend to his nature and conditions: it feemeth that the ambition & defire he had to win honour in his doings, was not without some heatcand wilfulnesse. For, because he would altogether follow Epaminondas steps, he sliewed his hardinesse to enterprise any thing, his wisedome to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no mony could corrupt him: but in civill matters and controuerfies, he could hardly other whiles keep himself within y bounds of modestie, patience. and curtefie, but would often burst out into choler, and wilfulnesse. Wherefore it seemeth, that he was a better captaine for warres, then a wife gouernor for peace. And indeed, euen from his youth he euer loued foldiers & armes, and delighted maruellously in all martiall exercises in Philopa handling of his weapon well, riding of horses gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And because he men delighfeemed to have a naturall gift in wreftling, certain of his friends, & fuch as were careful of him. red in mar did wish him to giue himself most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made fuch profession, wold be no hinderance to their martial exercises. Answer was made him again. That the disposition of the person, & maner of life that wrestlers vsed, and such as followed like exercifes, was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a fouldier, and specially touching life and limme. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe themselues in good plight, by much fleeping, cating, and drinking, by labouring, and taking their case at certaine houres, by not misfing a iot of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to lose the force and strength of their bodie, if they did furfeit neuer so litle, or passed their ordinarie course and rule of diet: where fouldiers contrariwiseare vsedtoall change and diversitie of life; and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse and scarcitie, and to watch in the night without sleepe. Philopamen hearing this did not onely for fake those exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards being generall of an armie, he fought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wrestling and fuch kind of exercise, which made mens bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become wrefiling. fouldiers to fight in defence of their countrey, that otherwise would have bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his book and schoolemasters, and began to weare armour in inuations the Mantineans vsed to make vpon the Laced & Monians, to get fome spoile on a sodaine, or to destroy a part of their countrey: Philopamen then would ener be the foremost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leisure, he vied much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his bodie with toile and trauell, or else he would be digging of his grounds. For he had a faire mannor, not passing twentie furlongs out of the citie, whither he would walke comonly after dinner or supper and then when night came that it was bedtime, he would lie vpon some ill fauored mattresse, as the meanest labourer he had, & in the morning by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine-men to labour in his vineyard, or els with were em his plough-men to follow the plough, and sometimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his friends and other officers of the same. What soeuer he

or paying his poorecountry mens ranfome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goods and revenue, he fought only to increase them by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the inftest and best way of getting of goods. For he did not trifle therin, but imployed his whole care and studie vpon it, as one that thought it fit for every noble man & gentleman so to travel, Philopa. gonerne, and increase his owne, that he should have no occasion to couet or vsurpanother mans. men such He took no pleasure to heare all kind of matters, nor to reade all forts of books of Philosophy: and car but those onely that would teach him most to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to reade Homers workes, faming those places only that stirred vp mens hearts most vnto valiantnes. But of all other stories, he specially delighted to reade Enangelus bookes, which treated of the Pelopar discipline of warres, how to set battels, and declared the acts and gests of Alexander the Great: lights. faying, that men should ever bring words vnto deeds, vnlesse they would take them for vaine reade Efories, and things spoken, but not to profit by. For in his books of the seates of warre, and how books of the battels should be ordered, he was not only contented to see them drawn and set out in charts and discipline maps, but would also put them in execution, in the places themselues as they were set out. And therfore when the army marched in order of battel in the field, he would confider & fludy with himselfe, the sodaine cuents and reproches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they coming 'downe to the valley, orgoing out of a plaine, were to passe a riner or a ditch, or through some straight; also when he should spread out his armic, or else gather it narrow; and this he did not only forecast by himselse, but would also argue the same with the captaines that were about him. For Philopamen doubtleffe was one of the odde men of the world, that most esteemed the discipline of warre, and sometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the most large field & most fruit ful ground, that valiantnes could be exercised in: so that he despised and contemned althat were no foldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Gleonenes King of LACED AMON, came one night vpon the fodaine, and gaue an affault to the citic of LEGALIPOLIS, fo lustily that he draue backe the watch and got into the marketplace, and wanne it. Philopamen hearing of it, ran immediatly to the rescue. Neuerthelesse, though he fought very valiantly, and did like a noble fouldier, yet he could not repulse the mensued enemics, nor drive them out of the city: but by this meanes he got the citizens leifure, and fome the Meanes time to get them out of the town to faue themselves, staying those that followed them: & made from Close Change College Colleg Chomenes still waite vpon him, for hat in the end he, had much ado to faue himselfe, being the last mene. King manand very fore hurt, and his horse also slaine vnder him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being aducttiled that the MEGALIPOLITANS were gotte into the city of MESSINA, he fent vato the tolet men very them understand, that he was ready to deliuer them their city, lands, & goods, againe. But Philo- forthurs. pamen seeing his countrymen very glad of these newes, and that every man prepared to returne againe in halt, he staid them with these perswasions, shewing them that Cleomenes denice was. not to deliuer them their city, but rather to take them together with their city: for eleeing well inough, that he could not continue long there, to keep naked walles and empty houses, and that himselfein the end should be compelled to go his way. This perswasion staid the MEGALIPG-LITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occasion to burne and plucke downea great part of the city, and carried away a great fumme of money and a great spoile. Afterwards when king Anti- King Antigonus was come to aide the Achaias against Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of gonus came the mountaines of Sellasia, and kept all the passages, and wayes vnto them out of all those Actorians quarters: King Antigonus fet his army in battell hard by him, determining to fet vpon him, and grains todrine him thence if he could possibly. Philopamen was at that time amongst the horsinen with King of his citizens, who had the ILLYRIANS on the fide of them, being a great number of footmen and Lareda. excellent good fouldiers, which did shut in the taile of all the army. So they were commanded men. to fland ftil, & to keep their place, until fuch time as they did shew them a red coate of armes on the top of a pike, from the other wing of the battell, where the King himselfe stood in person. Notwithstanding this straight commandement, the captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to see if they could force the LACED EMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The Achaians contrariwife, kept their place and order, as they were commanded. Eudidas, Cleomenes brother, perceiuing how their enemies footmen were seuered from their horsmen, sodainly sent the lightest armed souldiers and lustiest fellowes he had in his bands, to Philope. giuea charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behind, to proue if they could make them turne their faces minifal in onthein, because they had no horsemen for their guard. This was done, and these light armed men did maruelloufly trouble and diforder the ILLYRIANS. Philopæmen perceiuing that, and ing closconsidering how these light armed men would be easily broken and driven back, since occasion weres. selfeenforced them to it: he went to tell the Kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes.

But when he saw he could not make them vnderstand it, and that they made no reckoning of his reasons, but tooke him of no skill, because he had not yet attained any credit or estimation to be judged a man that could inuent or execute any startegeme of warre, he went thither himselfe and tooke his citizens with him: and at his first coming, he so troubled these light armed men. that he made them flie, and flue a number of them. Moreouer, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them giue a lustic charge vpon the enemies; whilest they were thus troubled and out of order, he left his horse and marched on foot vp hill and down hill, in rough and stonie wayes, full of springs and quauemires, being heauily armed at all peeces as a manat armes, and fighting in this fort very painfully and vncafily, he had both his thighes past through with a dart, having a leather thong on the middest of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the flesh, yet was it a strong blow; for it pierced both thighes through and through, that the yron was feene on the other fide. Then was he fo cumbred with this blowas if he had bene shackled with irons on his fect, and knew not what to do: for the leather fastened in the middest of the dart, did grieve him maruellously, when they thought to have pulled the dart out of the place where it entred in, so as neuer a man about him durst fet his hands to it. Philopamen on the other fide, feeing the fight terrible on either fide, and would foone be ended; it fpited him to the guts, he would so faine have bene among them. So at the length he made such firugling, putting backe one thigh, and fetting forward another, that he knapped the staffe of the dartasunder, and made them pull out the two truncheons, the one on this side, and the otheron the other side. Then when he saw he was at liberty again, he took his sword in his hand, and ran through the midst of them that fought, vnto the foremost rankes, to meete with the enemies forhathe gaue his mena new courage, and did fet them on fire with enuy, to follow his valiantnesse. After the battel was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN captaines, to proue them; who moued the horsemen to denide themselues, and give the charge, before the signe that was commanded. They answered him, that they were forced to do it against their wils, becausea young Megalipolitan gentleman gaue acharge with his company, before the fignewas giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them the young gentleman played the part of a wife and valiant captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus testimony, gaue great reputation vino Philogemen, as we may eafily imagine. So King Antigonus maruelloufly intreated him he would ferue with him, and offered him aband of men at armes, and great entertainment, if he would go with him. But Philopamen refused his offer, and chiefly because he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commanded by any. Not with standing, because he could not be idle, he tooke sea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there was warres, only to continue himselsein exercise therof. So when he had serued a long time with the CR BTAN s, which were valiant soldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of war, and moreouer were men of a moderate& fpare diet: he returned home again to Achaia, with fo great credit and reputation of enery one that he was presently chosen General of all the horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found many horfmen very ill horfed, vpon litle iades, such as might be gotten cheapest, and that they vsed not to go themselves in person to the warrs, but did send other in their stead: and to Generalof be short, that they neither had hearts, nor experience of the wars, and all because the Generals and captaines of the people of the Achaias that serued before him, did take no heed to those matters, as fearing to offed any, because they had the greatest authority in their hands, to punish or reward whom they thought good. Philopamen fearing none of all these things, would leave no part of his charge and dutie vindone, but went himselse in person to all the cities, to perswade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horsed, and well armed, that they might win honour in the field, be able to defend themselves, & overthrow their enemies. And where perfwafion could do no good, there he would fet fines vpon their heads that fo refused, and did vse to muster them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turneying, and barriers, and one to fight with another, and at fuch times and places specially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the looking on: that in short space he made them very forward, proper, and ready horsemen, whose chiefest property is, to keepe their order and rankes in the battell. Soas when necessitie served for the whole company of horsemen to turne together, halfeturne, or whole turne, or elseuery man by himself: they were so throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe fet in battell ray, did seeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued so together, and withal focasily, and at all times, and so oft, as they should turne, on the one side, or on the other.

Now in agreat battel the Acharans had with the ÆTOLIANS, & the ELIANS, by the river of Lariffus, Demophantus Generall of the horsemen of the ATOLIAN'S, came from his company. fight with Philopame, who also made towards him, & gaue him first such ablow with his speare, that he strake him starke dead. When Demophantus fell to the ground, his souldiers fled by & by vpon it. This wan Philopamen great honour, who gaue no place to the yongest men in fighting rail years most valiantly with his own hands:nor to the oldest men in wisdome, for the wise leading of his the street armie. Indeed the first man that made the people of Achaia grow in power and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time Achaia was of smal reckoning, because y cities of the same stood devided betweene themselues, & Araius was the first manthat made them ioyne rogether, and stablished among them an honest civil government. Wherby it happened, that as we see in brooks status raiand rivers where any litle thing stoppeth & falleth to the bottome, which the course of the wa- fed Athaia terbringeth down the streams there the rest that followeth doth wis to the course of the water bringeth down the streame, there the rest that followeth doth vie to stay, and go no further: cuen so in the cities of GRECE that were in hard state, & sore weakened, by faction one against another, the Achaians were the first that staid themselves, and grew in amity one with the other, & afterwards drew on the rest of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederates. Some by helping & deliuering them from the oppression of tyrants, and winning other also by their peaceable government and good concord: they had a meaning in this wise to bring all the country of Peloponnesvs into one body & league. Neuertheleffe, while Ara- Philopatus lined, they depended most vpon the strength and power of the MACE DONIANS: first with men and flicking vnto king Ptolomy, and then vnto Antigonus, and last to Philip, who ruled in maner all the compared. flate of GRECE. But when Philopemen came to gouerne, and to be the chiefest man, the ACHAI-ANS being strong inoughto resist the strongest, would march then no more under any other bodies enfigne, nor would suffer any more strange gouernours or captaines ouer them. For Aratus Aratus (asir feemed) was somewhat too soft and cold for the wars, and therfore the most things he did, Refi maning were by gentle intraction by intelligences & by the Lines friendship with the most things he ware. were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, & by the kings friendships with whom he was great, as we have at large declared in his life. But Philopamen being a man of execution, hardy & valiant of person, & of very good fortune, in the first battel that ever he made, did maruellously increase the courage and hearts of the Achaians: because vnder his charge they cuer foiled their enemies, & alwayes had the vpper hand of them. The first thing Philopamen began withal at his Philopacoming, he changed the maner of setting of their tables, & their fashion of arming the sellies: for meachan-before they caried litle light targets, which because they were thin & narrow, did not couer half challenges. their bodies, &vsed speares far shorter then pikes, by reaso wherof they were very light, & good der and distoskirmishand fight afar off:but when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then had great ipline of them. As fourth and a february of their based of th vantage of them. As for the order of their battels, they knew not what it meant, nor to cast the. selues into a snaile or ring, but only vsed the square battell, nor yet gaue it any such front where the pikes of many rankes might push together, and where the fouldiers might stand so close, that their targets should touch one another, as they do in the squadron of the battell of the Ma-CEDONIANS: by reason whereof, they were soone broken and ouerthrowne. Philopamen reformed all this, perfwading them to vie the pike and shield, in stead of the litle target, speare, or bore-staffe, and to put good morrians or burganets on their heads, corsclets on their bodies, and good taffes and greaues to couer their thighes & legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not giving a foote of ground, as light armed men runne to and fro in a skirmish. And thus having perswaded and taught the yong men to arme themselves throughly, first he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had bene men that could not have bene overcomethen he turned all their vaine superfluous charge, into necessary and honest expences. But he could not possibly bring them altogether from their vaine and rich apparell they had of long timetaken vp, the one to exceed another: nor from their sumptuous furniture of houses, as in beds, hangings, curious seruiceat the table, and delicate kind of dishes. But to begin to withdraw this defire in them, which they had to be fine and delicate, in all superfluous & vnnecessaric things, and to like of things necessarie and profitable: he wished them to looke more nearest philepset to their ordinarie charges have the profitable and profitable a to their ordinarie charge about themselues, taking order as well for their apparell, as also for all curioftheir diet, and to spare in them, to come honourably armed to the field, for defence of their tie and countrey. Thereupon, if you had looked into the gold-smithes shoppes, ye should have fare into feene nothing else in their hands, but breaking and battering of pots of gold and filuer, to be brane and cast and molten downe againe, and then gilding of armours and targets, and silvering of bits.

In the shew-places for the running of horses, there was managing and breaking of yong horses. and young men exercifing armes. Womens hands also were full of morians and head peeces. whereto they tied goodly braue plumes of feathers of fundry colours, and were also full of im. brodered arming coates and caffocks, with curious and very rich workes. The fight of which brauery did heave vp their hearts, and made them gallant and lively: fo as enuy bred straight in them who should do best seruice, and no way spare for the warres. Indeed, sumptuousnesseand brauery in other fights, doth fecretly carry mens minds away, & allure them to feeke aftervani. ties, which makes them tender bodied, and womanish persons: because this sweet tickling and inticing of the outward sence, that is delighted therewith, doth straight melt and soften the strength and courage of the mind. But againe, the sumptuous cost bestowed vpon warlike surniture, doth incourage and make great a noble heart. Euen as Homer faith it did Achilles. when his mother brought him new armour and weapons she had caused Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who feeing them, could not tarrie, but was straight set on fire with defire to occupy them. So when Philopamen had brought the youth of Achaia to this good passe, to come thus brauely armed and furnished into the field, he began then to exercise them continually in armes: wherein they did not only shew themselues obedient to him but did moreouer striue one to excell another, and to do better then their fellowes. For they liked maruellous well the ordering of the battel he had taught the, because that standing so closetogether as they did, they thought furely they could hardly be ouerthrown. Thus by continuance oftime, being much vied to weare their armour, they found them a great deale easier and lighter then before, beside the pleasure they tooke to see their armour so braue, and so rich: insomuchas they longed for some occasion to trie them straight vpon their enemies. Now the Achains at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyrant of LACED EMON, who fought by all device he could with a great army, to become chiefe Lord of al the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the countrey of the MANTINEANS, Philapamen straight marched towards him with his army: so they met both not farre from the citie of Mantinea, where by and by they put themselues in order of battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of strangers to serue them, besides the whole force of their country; and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his strangers gaue such a lusty charge vpon certaine flingers and archers, being the forelorne hope whom Philopamen had put before the battell of the Achaians to begin the skirmish, that he overthrew them, and made them flie withall. But where he should have gone on directly against the Achaians that were ranged in battell ray, to have proved if he could have broken them, he was very buffe and earnest stil to follow the chase of them that first fled, & so came hard by the Acharans that stood sil in their battell, and kept their rankes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many menthought the Achaians were but cast away. But Philopæmen made as though it had bene nothing, and that he set light by it; and spying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the spurre, whom they had ouerthrowne, and staying so farre from the battell of their footmen, whom they had left naked, and the field open vpon them: he did not make to wards them to stay them, nor did striue to stop them that they should not follow those that sled, but suffered them to take their course. And when he saw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his men march vpon the LACED EMONIANS, whose sides were maked, having no horsemen to gard them: and so did set vpon them on the one side, and ranne so hastily on them to win one of their flankes, that he made them flie, and slue withall a great number of them. For it is faid, there were foure thousand LACED EMONIANS slaine in the field, because they had no man to leade them. And moreouer, they say they did not looke to fight, but fupposed rather they had wonne the field, when they saw Machanidas chasing stilthose vponthe spurre, whom he had ouerthrowne. After this Philopamen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chase with his strangers. But by chance there was a great broad ditchbetweenethem, so as both of them rode vpon the bankes side of the same, a great while together, one against another of them; the one side seeking some convenient place to get over and flie, and the other fide feeking meanes to keepe them from starting away. So to fee the one beforethe other in this fort, it appeared as they had bene wilde beafts brought to an extremitie, to defend themselues by force, from so fierce a hunter as Philopamen was. But whilest they were striuing thus, the tyrants horse that was lustie and couragious, and felt the force of his masters spurres pricking in his fides, that the bloud followed after, did venture to leape the ditch, coming to the bankes fide, flood vpon his hindmost legs, & aduanced forward with his foremost feete, to reach to the other side. Then Simmias and Polyanus, who were about Philopamen when he fought, ran thither straight to keepe him in with their borestaues that he should not leape the ditch. But Philogamen who was there before them, perceiving that the tyrants horse, by lifting vp his head fo high, did couer all his masters body: for sooke by and by his horse, & tooke his speare in both his hands, and thrust at the tyrant with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditch. In memory Philete. wherof, the Acharas that did highly efteeme this valiant act of his, and his wifedome alfo in Machange leading of the battell, did fet vp his image in braffe in the temple of Apollo in Delphes, in das. the forme he flue the tyrant. They fay, that at the affembly of the common games called Nemea, (which they folemnize in honour of Hercules, not farre from the citie of AR GOS) and not long after he had won this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the second time of the tribe of the Achaians,& being at good leasure also by reason of y feast; he first shewed at the Gre-CIANS that were come thither to fee the games & pastimes, his army ranged in order of battell, and made them fee how easily they remoued their places enery way, as necessity and occasion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their rankes, and that with a maruellous force and readinesse. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the Musicians play and fing to their instruments, who should win the best game, being accompanied with lustic young gentlemen apparelled in purple cloakes, & in skarlet coates & cassocks they wore vpon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well giuen & disposed who did greatly honor & reuerence their Captaine, & besides that shewed themselues inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable battels they had fought, in which they had cuer attained ŷ victory, & gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the Mulitian, singing certaine poems of Timotheus, called the Perfes, fell into these verses:

O Greekes, it is enembe, which your prosperitie Hath ginen to you; and therewith all a noble libertie.

When he had fiveetly fung out aloud these noble verses, passingly well made, the whole assembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to fee the games, cast all their eyes fraight vpon Philopamen, and clapped their hands one to another for ioy, because of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should soone recouer their ancient repuration; and fo imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy minds of their ancestours. And as young horses that do alwayes looke to be ridden by their ordinary riders, if any strangerget vp on their backes, do straight waxe strange to be handled, and make great ado: euen so when the Achaians came to any dangerous battell, their hearts were even done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopamen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they faw him, euer the whole army reioyced, and defired fraight to be at it, they had fuch confidence in his valiantnesse and good fortune: and truely not without cause. For of all men, their enemies did feare him most, and durst not stand before him; because they were afraid to heare his name onely, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip King of Mac & Don (imagining that if he should find meanes to dispatch Philopamen out of the way, how socuer it were, the A-CHAIANS Would straight take part againe with him) fent men secre.ly into the city of ARGOS, to kil him by treason: howbeit the practise was discouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the Grecians generally, and taken for a wicked and cowardly Prince. It fortuned oneday when the Bo Eotians layed fiege to the city of Megara, and thought certainely to haue won it at the first affault, thererose a rumor suddenly amongst them, that Philopamen came Theones, to aide the city, and was not farre from it with his army. But it was a false report. Notwithstan-name of ding, the Bo E OT IANS were fo scared, that for feare they left their scaling ladders behind them, Philopers which they had fet against the walles, to haue scaled the towne, and fled straight to saue themfelues. Another time, when Nabis the tyrant of LACED EMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had tians fire taken the city of MBSSINA vpon a fudden: Philopamen being then a private man, and having no for fearer charge of fouldiers, went vnto Lysippus Generall of the Achaians that yeare, to perfivade him that he would fend present aide vnto the of MESSINA. Lysppus told him, it was too late now to sedement gothither, and that it was but a lost towne, not to be holpen: considering the enemies were in it was the already. Philosophy and the control of the office of already. Philopamen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither himselfe with the Melfins. force of Messina onely, not flaying for the assembly of the Megalipolitans, that were in counsel about it, to give them commission by voyces of the people to take him with him; but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthiest of all other to command them. Now when he came nere vnto Messt N. R. Nebis hearing of his coming, durst not tarrie him, though he had his army within the city but stole out at another gate, and marched away in all the hast he could, thinking himselse a hanpy manif he could fo scape his hands, and retire with safety, as indeed he did. And thus was MESSINA by his meanes delinered fro captinity. All that we have written hitherto concernino Philopemen, falleth out doubtleffe to his great honour and glory: but afterwards he was greatly dispraised for a journey he made into CRETA, at the request of the GORTYNIAMS, who sented pray him to be their captaine, being fore troubled with warres at that time. Because Philogamen went then to serue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyrant Nabis had greatest wars with the MEGA-LIPOLITANS in their own coutry, they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flie the wars. or else that he sought honour out of season with forraine nations, when his poore citizens the inurmyinio MEGALIPOLITANS were in such distresse, that their countrey being lost and destroyed, there were driuento keepe them within their city, and to fow all their void grounds and fireets in the fame with corne, to fustaine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almost hardat their owne gates. And the rather, because himselfe making wars with the CRETANS, and seruing strangers beyond the sea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occasion to slander him that he fled, that he would not tarry to fight for defence of his own country. Againe, there were that faid, because the Achains didchuse other for their Generall, that he being a privat man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the Gorthnians, who had mar. nelloufly intreated him to take the charge; for he was a manthat could not abide to line idely. and that defired specially about all things to serue continually in the wars, and to put in practice his skill & discipline in the leading of an army. The words he spake one day of king Ptolomie do witnesse as much: for when there were some that praised king Ptolomie highly, saying thathe tray ned his army well, and that he fill continued his person in exercise of armes: It is not commendable for a king (faid he) of his yeares, to delight in training his men to exercise armes, but to do some act himselse in person. Well, in the end, the MEGALIPOLITANS tooke his absence in fuch euill part, that they thought it a peece of treason, and would needs have banished him, & put him from the freedome of the city: had not the ACHAIAN'S fent their Generall Arifaneus vnto them who would not fuffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although o therwise there was euer contention betweene them about matters of the commonwealth. Asterwards Philopamen perceiuing his countrymen made no more account of him, to spite them withall, he made divers small villages and cities rebell against them, and taught them to say, and to give it out, that they were not their subjects, neither paid them tribute fro the beginning and he made them stand to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the citie of MEGALIPO. LIS, before the counfell of the ACHAIANS. These things hapned shortly after. But whilesthe made wars in Creta for the Gortynians, he shewed not himselfa Peloponnesian, not like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open wars; but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vie their own policies, fine deuices, and ambushes against themselues. And made them know also, that all their crasts were but childish sports as it were, in respect of those that were deuifed, & put in execution, by a wife experienced captain, and skilful to fight a battell. So Philopemen, having wongreat fame by his acts done in CRETA, returned again to PELOPONNEsvs, where he found, that Philip king of Macedon had bin ouercome in battel, by T. Q. Flaminius; and that the Achaian's loyning with the Romains, did make war against the tyrant Nabis, against whom he was made General immediatly vpon his return, and gaue him battel by sea. In the which it feemed he fel into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the event of this battell falling out much worse with him then was looked for in respect of his former courage and valiantnes. But as for Epaminondas, some say he returned willingly out of Asia, & the Hes, without an/exploit don because he wold not have his courime stellhed with spoile by sea as fearing lest of valiant foldiers by land, they wold by litle & litle (as Plato faid) become diffolute mariners by ica. But Philopamen cotrariwife, prefuming on the skil he had to fet the battell in good order by lad, wold needs take vpo him to do the fame by fea. But he was taught to his coft to know what exercise & experiece meant, & how strong it makeththe that are practised in things. For he lost not only the battel by fea being ynskilful of that feruice; but he comitted besides a fouler error.

For he caused an old ship to be rigged, which had bin very good of service before, but not occupied in 40. yeares together; & embarked his countrymen into the same, which were all likely to perish, because the ship had diverse leakes, by fault of good calking. This overthrow made his enemies despisehim vtterly, perswading theselues he was fled for altogether, & had gine thesearoome: whereupon they laid fiege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopamen being advertised there. Noth beof, imbarked his men suddenly, and set vpon his enemies erethey wist it, or had any thought of its of g. his coming : and found them stragling vp and downe, without watch or guard, by reason of thinm. the victory they had lately won. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and set fire voon his enemies campe, and burnt it enery whit: and in this feare and hurly burly, flue a great number of them. Shortly after this stealing upon them, the tyrant Nabis also stole upon him againe vnwares, as he was to go through a maruellous ill and dangerous way: which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the first, thinking it unpossible for them that they could cuer scape that danger, confidering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopemen bethinking himselfe, and considering the nature and situation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainely then, that the chiefest point of a good fouldier and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, according to the time and situation of the place. For hedid but alter the forme of his battel a litle, and forced it according to the fituation of the place, wherin he was compassed: and by doing this without trouble or businesse, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in such fierce wise, that in a short time he put them all to flight. And when he perceived that they did not flie all introupes together towards theci- Philopæty, but scattering wise, abroad in the fields in enerry place, he cansed the trumpet to found the retraite. Then he commanded the chase to be followed no further, for that all the country thereabout was full of thicke woods and groues, very ill for horfemen; and also because there were of taceder many brooks; vallies and quantum which they should natio over he encoursed him Cilena. many brookes, vallies and quauemires, which they should passe ouer, he encamped himself prefently, being yet broad day. And fo, fearing left his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he fent a great number of Achaians, and laid them in ambush amongst the brookes and hils neare about it, which made great slaughter of Nabis fouldiers, because they came not altogether in troopes, but scatteringly one after another as they fled, one here another there, and fo fell into their enemies hands, as birds into the fowlers net. These acts made Philopemen singularly beloued of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honor in all their Theaters & comon affemblies. Whereat T. Q. Flaminius, of nature very ambi- Tim Quin tious & couctous of honor, did much repine, & was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Con-tius enuiful of Rome shold have place & honor among the Achaian's before a mean gentleman of Arpamen.

CARLA And be imposined behad deleveed better of all Garage them. CADIA. And he imagined he had deferued better of all GRECE, then Philopeme had confidering how by the only proclamatio of an herald, he had restored GRECE again to her ancient liberty, which before his coming was subject to king Philip, & vnto the MACEDONIANS, Afterwards, T. Quintius made peace with the tyrat Nabu, who was shortly after very traiterously slain by the Nabis slain ÆTOLIANS. Wherupon the city of Sparta grew to a tumult, & Philopamen straight taking the by the Æ. occasió, went thither with his army, & handled the matter so wisely, that partly for loue, & partly folians. by force, he wan the city, & ioyned it vnto the tribe of the Achaians. So was he maruelloufly comended & esteemed of the Achaians for this notable victory, to have wontheir tribe and comunalty fo famous a city, & fo great estimation. For the city of Sparta was no small increase of their power, being io yned as a meber of Achaia. Moreouer he wan by this meanes the loue & goodwil of althe honest men of LACED EMON, for the hope they had to find him a protector and defendor of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis house and goods were fold, as forfeited to the state: they resolved in their counsell to make him a present of the money thereof, which amounted to the fum of fixescore talents, and sent ambassadours purposely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopamen shewed himselfe plainely to be no counterfeit honest man, but agood man indeed. For first of all, there was not one of all the LACE BEMONIANS that durst men free prefume to offer him this mony, but every man was afraid to tell him of it: and every body that from every was appointed to do it, made some excuse or other for themselves. Notwithstanding, in the end towns. they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar friend, and also his hoft. And yet the fame Timelaus when he came vnto MEGALIPOLIS, and was lodged & entertained in Philopemes house, did so much reuerence him for his wise talke and conversation, for his moderate diet, & iust dealing with all menthat he saw there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to speake to him of the present he had brought him, but found some other occasion to excuse the cause of his coming vnto him: And being fent ynto him again the fecond time; he did euen as much as at the first time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the last to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good. will the city of Sparta did beare him. Philopamen became a glad manto heare it and when he had heard all he had to fay to him, he went himself vnto the city of Sparta. There he declared vnto the counfell, that it was not honest men and their good friends, they should seeke to winne and corrupt with money, confidering they might command their vertue vpon any occasion. without cost vnto them; but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by feditious orations in councell did mutine, and put a whole city in vprore: to the end that having their mouths stopped with gifts, they should trouble them the lesse in the comonwealth. For faid he, it is more necessary to stop your enemies mouths, & to fow up their lips from liberty of speaking, then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopamon against all couctous field of mony. Shortly after, the LACEDEMONIANS beginning to stir again, Diophanes (who was then general of the Achaians) being aduertised of it, began to prepare to punishthe. The LACEDEMONIANS on the other fide preparing for the wars, did fet all the country of PE. LOPONNESUS in armes. Hercupon Philopæmen fought to pacific Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the Romain as being at wars, together at that present time, and they both having puissant armies one against another in the middest of GRECE, it was meet for a good generall and wife governor, to have an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the fame, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his country at that instant, but there. ther to diffemble it, & not to feeme to heare any fault what foeuer they did. Diephanes would not be perswaded but entred the territories of LACEDEMON with a great army, & T. Quintius Flaminius with him and they together marched directly towards the city of Sparta. Philopamen was so mad with their doings, that he took vpon him an enterprise not very lawfull, nor altogether iustineuerthelesse his attempt proceeded of a noble mind & great courage. For he got into the city of Sparta, and being but a private person, kept out the generall of the Achaians, and the Conful of the Romains for entring the city; and when he had pacified all troubles and feditions in the fame, he deliuered it vp again as it was before, into the hands of the communalty of the Achaians. Neuertheles himselfe being afterwards general of the Achaians, did compel the LACED & MONIANS to receive those home again whom they had banished for certain faults. & did put 80 naturall borne citizens of Spart a vnto death, as Polybius writeth:or 350, as Arifucrates another historiographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and razed them to the ground, and took away the most part of their territories, and gaue them to the ME-GALIPOLITANS. All those whom the tyrants had made free denizers of Sparta, he compelled them to depart the country of LACEDEMON, and forced them to dwel in ACHAIA, three thoufand onely excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all those he sold for flaues, and with the money he made of them (to spite them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the city of ME GALIPOLIS, Yet furthermore to do the LACED EMONIANS all the mischiefehe could, and as it were, to treade them under the feete in their most grieuous miserie, he dida most cruell and vniust act toward them. For he compelled them to leauethe discipline and manner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of old time inftituted: and made them to follow the maner the ACHAIANS vsed in lieu of their old grounded countrey custome, because he faw they would neuer be humble minded, folong as they kept Lycurgus order and inflituion. Thus were they driven to put their heads in the coller, by the miferable mishap that befell them; and in all defpite, to fuffer Philopamen in this manner to cut afunder (as it were) the sinewes of their comonwealth. But afterwards they made fute to the Romains, that they might be suffered to enjoy their ancient discipline againe, which being granted them, they straight lest the maner of the Achaians, and did fet vp againe as much as was possible (after fo great miserie and corruption of their maners) their old ancient customes & orders of their country. Now about the time the wars began in GRECE betweene the ROMAINES and king Antiochus, Philopæmen was then a priuate man, and without any authority. He feeing that king Antiochus lay still in the city of CHALCES, and did nothing but feast and love, and had maried a young maid farre vnmeete for his yeares: & perceiuing that his Syrian souldiers wandred vp & downthe towns ingreat disorder, playing many lewdeparts without guide of Captaines, he was very sory he was not at that time Generall of the Achains, and told the Romaines, that he enuied their victoric, having warres with enemies that were so easily to be ouercome. For said he) if Fortune fanoured me that I were Generall of the Achaian's at this present, I would have killed men counthem energy man in the cellars and tippling houses. Now when the Romaine's had ouercome stagainst the Romaine of the Romaine o Antiochus, they began to haue furer footing in GRECE, and to compasse in the ACHAIANS on maines. all fides, and specially, by reason the Heads and gouernours of the cities about them did yeeld to the Romaines, to win their fauour. And now their greatnesse grew in hast, by the fauour of the gods, fo as they were become the monaich of the whole world, who brought them now to the end that Fortune had determined. Philopamen in the meane time did like a good pylot, refifting against the billowes and roughnesse of the waves. And though for the time he was forced to gine place, and to let things paffe, yet for all that he was against the Romain s, and did withstand them in the most part of their proceedings, by seeking ever to defend the liberty of those, who by their cloquence and well doing carried great authority among the ACHAIANS. And when Aristanesus Magalipolitan, (aman of great authoritie among the Achaians, and one that ener bare great denotion to the ROMAINES) faid in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they should denie the Romaines nothing, nor shew themselves vnthankfull to them: Philogamen hearing what he faid, held his peace a while and fuffered him to speake (though it boiled in his heart, he was so angry with him) and in the end, breaking all patience, and as one onercome with choler, he faid: Ariftanetus, why have you fuch hafte to fee the vnfortunate end of GRECE? Another time when Manius Confull of Rome (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make request to the councell of the Achains, that such as were banished from LACED EMON, might return home into their country againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius also did earnessly intreat them: Philopemen was against it, not for any harred he bare vnto the banished men, but because he would have done it by his owne meane, and the onely grace of the ACHAIANS, to the end they should not be beholding for so good a turne, neither vnto Titue, nor yetto the ROMAINES. Afterwards he himfelfe, being Generall of the Achains, did reftore them wholy to their owne againe. Thus was Philopamen fometime a litle too bold and quarrellous, by reason of his great stomack: & specially when any man sought for to haue things by authority. Lastly, being threescore & ten yeares of age, he was y eight time chosen General of the Achains, and hoped well, not only to passe the yeare of his charge in peace and quietnesse, manchair but all o all the rest of his life without any stir of new wars, he saw the affaires of GRECE take so the right good successe. For like as the force and strength of sicknesse declineth, as the natural strength of need of n the fickly body impaireth: fo through all the cities & people of GRECE, the defire of quarrel & the Athabe ofwars furceafed, as their power diminished. Neuertheles, in the end of his yeares government, the gods divine (who in the purished linfolder words and deeds a through him to the ground as 70 years the gods divine (who infly punish all infolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as oil. they fuffer a rider vnfortunately to take a fall of his horse, being come almost to the end of his cariere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongst good company, where one was maruellously praised for a good captaine, said vnto them: Why masters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken prisoner aline of his enemies. Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (a private enemie of Philopamens for certaine controversies past betweene them, and a man generally hated befides of all honourable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawne the city of MESSINA from the denotion of the ACHAI-ANS ; and moreover, that he came with an army to take a towne called Colonide. Philippemen was at that time in the city of AR GOs, sicke of an Ague, & yethearing these newes, took his iorney towards MEGALIPOLIS, making all the hafte he could possible, for that he came about 4. meniour hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence towards MBS SINA, and taried not, but neg against tooke with him a company of men at armes of the lustiest and wealthiest MEGALIPOLITANS: Dinocrates. who were all young noble men of the city, and willingly offered themselves to go with him for the good will they bare him, & for the defire they had to follow his valiantnes. Thus went they on their way towards the city of Messina, & marched fo long, that they came neare to the hill of Euander, where they met with Dinocrates and his company, and gaue fo fierce an onset on the that they made them all turne taile:howbeit in the meane while, there came a relecte of 500 men under, to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the countrey of MESSINA. The flying men that were scattered here and there, seeing this supply, gathered themselves agains together, and shewed vpon the hils. againe, who most of louchad followed him: began to march away through narrow bushy pla: ces, himfelf being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, and skirmished with them, onely to drive them away from following of the rest of his company, and not a man that durst once set upon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopamen fundry times venturing farre from his company to giue these young noble men leafure to faue themselues one after another tooke no heede to himselfe that he was alone enuironed on euerie fide with a great number of enemies. Notwithstanding, of all his enemies there was not a man that durft come to handstrokes with him, but still slinging and shooting at him a farre off, they draue him in the end among ft ftony places between hewne rocks, where he had much ado to guide his horse, although he had spurred him that he was al of a gore bloud. And as for his age, that did not let him but he might have faued himselfe; for he was strong and luftie by the continual exercise he tooke: but by curfed happe his body being weake with ficknesse, and wearie with the long journey he had made that day, he found himselfe very hea. uie & ill difposed, that his horse stumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and brused all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and never stirred nor Tpake: fo that his enemies thinking he had bene dead, came to turne his bodieto ftrip him. But when they faw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once vpon him and tooke him, and bound both his hands behind him, and did all the villany and mischiese they could vnto him, and fuch, as one would little haue thought Dinecrates would have vied in that fort or that he could have had fuch an ill thought towards him. So they that tarried behind in the city of Messina, were maruellous glad when they heard the fenewes, and ran all to the gates of the citie to see him brought in. When they saw him thus shamefully bound and pinioned, against the dignitic of so many honours as he had received, and of so many triumphs &vi-Ctories as he had passed: the most part of them wept for pity, to consider the mishap and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is folitle certainetic, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there some courteous speech to run in the mouthes of the people by litle & litle that they should remember the great good he had done them in timespaft, and the liberty he had reftored them vnto, when he expulled the tyrant Nabis out of Messina. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to pleafe Dincerates, faid they should hang him on a gibbet, & put him to death as a dangerous enemy, and that would never forgive man that had once offended him; and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Dincerates then ever he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiving fuch open flame by him. Neuertheleffe, in the end they carried him into a certaine dungeon under the ground, called the Treasurie, (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor doore, nor halfe doore, but a great from rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and fo they did let him downe the fame, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these young noble Achaian horsemen had fled vpon the spurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred themselves, and looked round about for Philogomen: and finding him not in fight, they supposed straight, he had bene slaine, Thereupon they staid a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiving he answered not, they began to fay among themselues, they were beasts and cowards to fly in that fort; and how they were dishonoured for ever so to have for saken their Captaine, to save themselves, who had not ipared his owne life to deliuer them from danger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring still for him, they were in the end aduertised how he was taken. And then they went and carried those newes through all the towns and cities of Achaia, which were very forry for him, and tooke it as a figne of great ill fortune toward them. Wherupon they agreed to fend ambassadors forthwith to the MESSINIANS, to demand him: and in the meane time every man should prepare to arme themselves to go thither, and get him either by force or love. When the ACHAIANS had thus fent, Dinocrates feared nothing To much, as that delay of time might faue Philopamens life: wherefore to preuent it, as foone as night came, and that the people were at rest, he straight caused the stone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopamen with a cup of poison to offer him, who was commanded also not to go from him, vntill he had drunke it. When the hangman was come downe he found Philopamen laid on the ground upon a little cloake, having no lift to fleepe, he was so gricuously troubled in his mind. Who when he faw light, and the man standing by him, holding a cup in his hand with this poison, he sate vpright vpon his couch, how beit with great paine, he was so weaks

and taking the cup in his hand, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horsemen that came with him, specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them Philotas were faued. Then he cast his hands a litle ouer his head, and looking merrily on him, he said: It is mentage wel, feeing we are not all vnfortunate. There with speaking no mo words, nor making other ado, wirds. he drunke vp all the poison, and laid him down as before. So nature strong not much withal, his body being brought fo low, and thereupon the poison wrought his effect, and rid him straight out of his paine. The news of his death ran prefently through all Achaia, which generally fro philogehigh to low was lamented. Wherupon althe Acharans youth & counsellers of their cities & meni diath towns, affembled themselves in the city of MEGALIPOLIS, where they all agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their General, under whose conduct they inuaded The Achaithe MESSINIANS, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and fword: fo as the MESSI- ungge Phi-NIAN'S were fo feared with this mercileffe furie, that they yeelded themselves and wholly confented to receive the Achaians into their citie. But Dinecrates would not give them leifure to death. execute him by inflice, for he killed himfelfe; and fo did all the reft make themselves away, who gaue aduise that Philopamen should be put to death. But those that would have had Philopamen sile. hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused them to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with alkind of torments. That done, they burnt Philopames body, & did put his after into a pot. Then Philopames they straight departed from MESSINA, not in disorder, one vponanothers necke as every man mentionslifted:but in fuch an order & ray, that in the middeft of the funerals, they did make a triumph of rad. victory. For the foldiers were all crowned with garlands of laurel in token of victory, notwithstanding, the teares ran downe their checkes intoken of forow, and they led their enemies prifoners, shackled and chained. The funerall-pot in the which were Philopemens ashes, was so couered with garlands of flowers, no fegayes, & laces, that it could feant be feene or differned, and was carried by one Polybius a young man, the fon of Lycortas, that was General at that time to the ACHAIANS: about whom there marchedall the noblest & chiefest of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the fouldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not fo forowful in their countenance, as they are commonly which have great cause of sorowinor yet so loyful, as those that came conquerors fro so great a victory. Those of the cities, towns, & villages in their way as they past, came and presented themselves vnto them, to touch the funerall-pot of his afties, even as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres : and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of Megalipolis: at the gates whereof, were old men, women and children, which thrusting thefelues amongst the souldiers, did renew theteares, sorrowes, & lamentations of all the miserable and unfortunate citie: who took it that they had lost with their citizens, the first & chiefest place ofhonour among the Achaians. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other prisoners of MESSINA, were all stoned to death, about his sepulcher. Althe other cities of Achaia, besides many other honours they did vnto him, did set vp statues, as like to himas could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of GRECE, when the citie of CORINTH Was burnt & destroyed by the ROMAINS, there was a malicious ROMAINE that did Worth what he could to haue the same pulled downeagaine, by burdening and accusing Philopamen (as humanitie if he had bene yet aliue) that he was alwayes enemie to the Romaines, and enuied much their of the Roprosperitie and victories. But after Polybius had answered him, neither the Consul Mummius, keeping sor his counsellors, nor lieutenants, would suffer them to deface & take away the honors done their encin memory of so famous and worthy a man, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto mies monu.

T is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme and stature, by Philepamen statue of brasse, to whom we compare him: the which is now fet vp at Rome, neare to great Apollo that was brought from CAR-THAGE, and is placed right against the coming into the shew-place, under which there is an infeription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they fay of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleafure men againe. For if he did punish any man that had angred him, he would do it gently, but his anger did notlong continue with him. He did good alfo to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleasured, as if they had done him some pleasure: and was readie to do for them fill whom he found thankfull, because he would ever make them beholding to him, and thought that as honourable a thing as he could purchase to himselfe, because he greatly sought honour aboue all things, when any notable feruice was to be done, he would do it himfelfe, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would cuer be rather with the that needed his helpe, then with those that could help him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to exercife his vertue with the other, he took them as his fellowes and followers of honor, with him. He came to mans flate, when the city of Roma had greatest warres and trouble: At that time all the youth of Rome, which were of age to carie weapon were sent to the war to learne to traile the pike, and how to become good captaines. Thus was he entred into martiall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Hannibal of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thousand footemen, under Marcellus the Consull: who being flaine by an ambush Hannibal had laid for him betweene the cities of BANCIA and VENVSA, then they did chase Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernour of the province and city of TARENTYM, which was now taken againe the second time. In this government of his, he wannethe reputation as much of a good and iust man, as he did of an expert and skilfull captain. By reason whereof, when the Ro-MAINES were requested to fend mento inhabite the cities of NARNIA and Cossa, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, which chiefly gaue him heart and courage to afpire at the first to che Consulship, passing ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other yong men were wont to attain the Confulfhip. Therefore when the time came that the Confuls should be elected, he did present himselfe among other, accompanied with a great number of those he had brought with him, to inhabite the two new townes, who did make earnest sute for him. But the two Tribunes Fulnius & Manlius, spake against him, and faid: it was out of all reason, that so yong a man should in such manner prease to have the office of the highest dignitic, against the vse and custome of Rome, before he had passed through the inferiour offices of the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, the Senate preferred it wholy to the voices of the people: who presently pronounced him Consult openly, with Sextins Elius, al- To Flathough he was not yet thirtie yeares old. Afterwards, Alins and he deuiding the offices of the series Aflateby lot, it fel vpon T. Quintius to make war with Philip king of MACE DON. In the which me lius Coffus. thinkes fortune greatly fauoured the ROMAINS affaires, that made such a man General of these T.Q. Flawars: for, to have appointed a Generall that by force and violence would have fought all things kelb warre at the MacEDONIANS hands, that were a people to be won rather by gentlenes & perswasions, with Philip then by force and compulsion: it was all against themselves. Philip to maintaine the brunt of a Macedon. battell against the Romain es, had power enough of his own in his Realme of Macebon: but to make war any long time, to furnish himselfe with mony and victuals, to have a place & cities toretire vnto: and lastly, to haue all other necessaries for his men and army, it stood him vponto get the force of GRECE. And had not the force of GRECE bene politically cut fro him, the wars against him had not bene ended with one battell, Moreouer, GRECE (which neuer before bare the ROMAINE sany great good will) would not have dealt then fo inwardly in friendship with them, had not their General bene (as he was) a gentle person, lowly and trasfable, that wan them The correspond more by his wifedome, then by his force, and could both cloquently vtter his mind to them, and the Greek courteoufly also heare them speake, that had to do with him, and chiefly ministred instice, and equitie to every man alike. For it is not to be thought that GRECE wold otherwise so some have then be withdrawne themselves from the rule of those, with whom they were acquainted, and gouerned and have put themselves vnder the rule of strangers, but that they saw great instice and lenitiein them. Howbeit that may more plainely appeare by declaring of his acts. Titus was informed, that the Generals before him sent to the warre in Macedon (as Sulpitius, and Publius Island) vsed to come thither about the latter end of the yeare, and made but cold wars, and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in another against Philip, & all to take some straight, or to cut off victuals: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarrying at home, confumed the most of their Consulship at Rome, in matters of gouernment, and fo enjoyed the honour of their office. Afterwards in the end of their yeare, they would fet out to the wars, of intent to get another yeare ouer their heads in their office, that speding one yeare in their Cosulship at home, they might employ the other in the wars abroad. But Tities not minding to trifle out y half of his Conful ship at Rome, & the other abroad in the wars: did willingly leaue al his honors & dignities, he might have enjoyed by his office at Romn and befought the Senate that they wold appoint his brother Lucius Quintius lieutenant of their army by sea. Furthermore, he took with himself about three thousand old soldiers of those that had first overthrowne Asarubal in Spaine, and Hanibal afterwards in Afrike, under the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to serue, and were very willing to go with him in his journey, to be the strength of his army. With this company he passed the seas without danger, & landed To little in Errays, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his army before King Philip, who of in Epirus. long time had lien in camp about the mouth of y river of Apfus, to keep their straight & passage Apfust. which is the entry into Erinvs. So that Publius Iulius had lien still there, and done nothing, by reason of the natural force & hardnes of the place. Then Titus took the army of him, & sent him to Rome. Afterwards, himself went in person to view & consider the nature of the courty, which was in this fort. It is along vally walled on either fide with great high mountains, as those which that in the vally of Tempe in Thessaly: howbeit it had no fuch goodly woods, nor greene feription of forests, nor fairemedows, nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had but it was a great the country deep marish or quauemire, through the middest wherof the river called Apsius did run being in greatnesse & swiftnesse of streame, very like to the river of PENEY's. The river did occupy al the ground at the feete of the mountaines, faning a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, & a narrow straight path by the waters side, very vnhandsome for an army to passe that way, though they found not a min to keep the passage. There were some in the army that city of Lynevs, where the countrey is very plaine, and the way maruellous caffe. Howbeit he stood in great feare he should lacke victuals, if he staid far from the sea; and haply if he fellinto any barren or leane countrey, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to slie) he should be constrained in the end to return again towards the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherfore he determined to croffe the mountaines to fet vpon his enemies. & to proue if he could win the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with hisarmy, and when the ROMAINES forced to get up the hilles, they were received with darks flings and shot, that lighted amongst them here & therein somuch as the skirmish was very hote for the time it lafted, and many were flain and hurs on either fide. But this was not the end of the warre; for in the meane time there came certaine neat-heards of the countrey vnto Titus (who did victo keep beafts on these mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not by the which they promifed to guide his army fo, that in three dayes at the furthest, they would bring them on the top of the mountaine. And because they might be affored that their words were true, they faid they were fent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Charopus was the chiefest man of the Epirors, who loued the Romain's very welyet he fauoured them but underhand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit unto them, and fo fear one of his captaines with them, with foure thousand footmen, and three hundred horsmen. The heard-men that were their guides, went before fill, fast bound, and the Romain's followed after. All the day time the army refted in thick woods, & marched all night by moon light, which was then by good hap at the ful, Tiens having fent thefe men away, refted all the reft of his camp: fauing that fome dayes he entertained them with fome light skirmishes to occupie the enemie withal, But the fame day, when his men that fetched a compasse about, should come vnto thetop of the mountaine about the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, and deuided them into three troupes: with the one of them he himselfe wenton that fide of the river where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the fide of the hill. The MACEDONIAN'S again, they floo luftily at them from the height of the hil. and in certaine places amongst the rockes they came to the sword. At the selfesame time, thetwo other troupes on either hand of him, did their endeuor likewise to get vp the hil, & as it wereen uying one another, they climed up with great courage against the sharp and steep hanging of the mountaine. When the Sun was vp, they might fee afarre off as it were, a certaine simoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mifts we fee comonly rife from the tops of the mountaines. The encinies could fee nothing because it was behind them, & that the top of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The Romaines, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the midst of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they sawit increased stil more & more, and in such fort, that it darkned althe aire: then they did assure the sclues it was certainly the token their men did give them that they were come. Then they began to crie out, climing up the hils with fuch a luftie courage, that they draue their enemies up the hil stil, euen ynto the very rough & hardest places of the mountaine. Their fellowes also that were behind the enemies, did answer them with like loud cries from the top of the mountaine; wherewith the enemies were so associated, that they fled presently upon it. Notwithstanding, there was not flaine aboue two thousand of them, because the hardnes and straightnes of the place did so guard them, that they could not be chased. But the Romaine s spoiled their camp, took all that they found in their tents, tooke also their flaues, and wan the passage into the mountaines, by the which they entred the country of Epinvs and did passe through it so quietly, and with so great abstinence, that though they were far from their ships and the sea, and lacked their ordinary portion of come which they were wont to have monthly, & that victuals were very feant with the at that time, yet they never took any thing of y country, though they found great store & plenty of al riches in it. For Titus was advertised, that Philip passing by THESSALY, & slying for feare, had caused the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountaines, & then to set fire on their houses, & to leave those goods they could not cary away, by reason of the weight & vnhadsom cariage thereof, to the spoile of his fouldiers: & fo(as it feemed) he left the whole country to the conquest of the Romains. Whereupon Titus looking consideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to passe through the courty without doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their enemies had now left to them as their own. So they taried not long to enjoy the benefit of their orderly & wife forbearing of the country. For 10 foone as they were entred THESSALY, the cities willingly yeelded themselves vnto them; and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyond the country of THERMOPYLES, did maruelloufly defire to fee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put themselves vnto his hands. The Acharan salso on the other side, did renounce the league & alliancethey had made with Philip and furthermore did determine in their counsell, to make war with him on the ROMAINES side. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time friends and confederates with the Romainss, and that they did shew themselves very louing to take their part in the wars:neuertheleffe when they defired the Opyntians that they wold put their city into their hands, and were offered that it should be kept & defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but fent for Titus, and put themselves and their goods wholy into his protection. They fay, that when king Pyrrus first faw the ROMAINS army range in order of battell from the top of a hil, he faid: This order of the barbarous people setting of their me in battell ray, was ingefibe not done in a barbarous maner. And those also that never had seene Titus before, & came for to Remaines speake with him: were compelled in a manner to fay as much. For where they had heard the Ma-CEDONIANS fay, that there came a captain of the barbarous people that defroyed al before him by force of armes, and fubdued whole countries by violence: they faid to the contrary, that they found him a man indeed young of yeares, howbeit gentle, and courteous to looke on, and that faske the Greek tongue excellently well, and was a louer only of true glory. By reason wherof they returned home maruellous glad, and filled all the cities & towns of Grece with good wil towards him, & faid they had seene Titus the captaine, that would restore them to their ancient liberty againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip shewed himselfe willing to have peace and that Titus also did offer it him, and the friendship of the people of Rome, with these conditionsthat he wold leave y Grecians their whole liberties, & remove his garrifons out of their ciries and strong holds: which Philip refused to do. And thereupon all GRECE, and even those which fauoured Philip, faid with one voice: that the Romaines were not come to make wars with them, but rather with the Macedonians in fauour of the Grecians. Whereupon all GRECE came in, & offered themselves vnto Titus without compulsio. And as he passed through the countrey of Bosotia, without any flew at all of warres, the chiefest men of the citie of THEER'S went to meet him: who though they took part with the king of MACEDON, because of aprivate man called Barchylelus, yet they would honour Titus, as those which were contented to keepe league and friendship with either side. Titus embraced them, and spake very courteously vino them, going on his way still faire and foftly, entertaining them fometime with one matter, and sometime with another, & kept the talke of purpose, to the end his souldiers being wearied, with journying, might in the meane time take good breath; and fo marching on by litle and litle, heentred into the city with them. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleased, but yetthey durst not refuse him, though he had not at that time any number of souldiers about him. When he was within THERES, he prayed audience, and began to perswade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already, that they would rather take part with the Ro-MAINES, then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpose, king Attalus being by chance at that time in the affebly, did help to exhort y Thebans very earneftly, that they wold doas Titus perswaded them. But Attalus was more earnest then became a man of his yeares, for thedefire he had (as was imagined) to shew Titus his eloquence: who did so straine and moue himselfe withall, that he swouned sodainely in the midst of his oration, whereby the rewme fell down so fast vpon him, that it took away his senses, so as he fell in a trance before them all, and few daies after was conneied again by fea into Asia, where he lived not long after. In the mean King datatime, the Bobotians came into the Romains, & took their part. And Philip having fent Am-The Boni. baffadors to Rome, Titus also sent thither of his men to solicite for him, in two respects. The ans yell one if the wars continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, Remaines, if the Senate did grant him peace: that they would do him the honor, as to make and conclude it Quinting with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare least they would fend a diminious. fucceffor to continue those wars, who should take the glory from him, & make an end of them. But his frieds made fuch earnest sute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he praied neither was there fet any other General in Titus place, but he stil cotinued his charge in these wars. Wherefore, so soone as he had received his commission and authority from the Senate, he went ftraight towards THESSALY, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his army aboue fixe and twenty thousand fighting men whereof the ÆTOLIANS made sixe thousand footemen,

and three thousand horsemen. King Philips army on the other side was no lesse in number, and they began to march one towards the other, vntil at the length they both drew neare the city of Scorvsa, where they determined to trie the battell. So neither they nor their men were afraid to fee themselves one so neare another but rather to the contrary, the Romains on the one side tooke greater heart and courage vnto them, defiring to fight, as thinking with themselves what great honor they should winto our come the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantnesse, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other fide also taking the ROMATNES for other maner of foldiers then the Persians, beganne to have good hope if they might winne the field, to make King Philip more famous in the world, then cuer was Alexander his father. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stand to it like men, and to shew themselues valiant souldiers in this battell, as those which were to show the proofe of their valiant nesses in the heart of G_{RECF} the goodlieft Theater of the world, and against their enemies of most noble fainc. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the speed he made, because they were both ready to joyne, didget vo vnwares vpon a charnell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being a little hill raised vp aboue the rest, and neare the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his fouldiers, as all Generals do before they give battel. Who when he faw them all discouraged, for they took it for an ill figne that he was gotten vp on the top of a graue to fpeak vnto the be of a coceir at the matter, did of himfelf deferre to give battel that day. The next morning, because the night was very wet by reason the South windes had blowne, the clouds were mined to a mist, and filled all the valley with a darke groffe thicke ayre, coming from the mountaines thereabours. which couered the field betweene both campes with a mift all the morning; by reason whereof the skouts on both fides that were fent to discouer what the enemies did, in very shorttime met together, and one gaue charge vpon another, in a place they call the dogges heads, which are points of rockes placed vpon little hilles one before another, and very neare one vnto another. which had bene called fo because, they have had some likenesse of it. In this skirmish there were many changes, as commonly falleth out when they fight in fach ill fauored frony places: for fometime the ROMAINES fled, and the MACE DONIANS chased them: another time the MACE. DONIANS that followed the chafe, were glad to flie themselves, and the Romaines who fled before, now had them in chafe. This change and alteration came by fending new supplies still from both camps, to reliene them that were diffressed and driuen to flie. Now began the misto breake vp, and the aire to cleare, so that both Generals might see about them what was done in either camp: by reason whereof both of them drew on their army to the field and battel. So Phi-Inp had the vantage on the right wing of his army, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill, from which they came to amaine to fet vpon the Romaine s, and with fuch a fury, that the frongest & valiantest that could be, had never bin able to abide the front of their battel, so close. ly were they io yned together, & their wall of pikes was fo strong. But on his left wing it was not To, because the ranks of his battell could notion to neare nor close target to target, the place being betwixt the hils and the rocks, where the battel was coming, so as they were copelled by reason of the straightnesse & vneuennesse of the ground, to leave it open, and vnfurnished in many places. Titus finding that disaduantage, went from the left wing of his battell which he saw Battellbeouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, and going foduinely towards the left wing of King Philips battell, he fet vpon the MACEDONIAN'S Onthat fide, where he faw they could not close their ranks in the front, nor joyne them together in the middeft of the battel (which is the whole lip King of ftrengthand order of the MACED ONIAN fight) because the field was vp hill and downe hilland to fight hand to hand they were fo peffered behind, that one thronged and overlaid another. For the battel of the MACEDONIANS hath this propertie, that follong as the order is kept close and ioyned together, it feemeth as it were but the body of a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are fundred and not joyned together, it doth not only lose the force & power of the wholebody, but also of cuery private souldier that fighteth: partly by reafon of the diuersity of the weapons wher with they fight, and partly for that their whole strength confifteth most, in the disposing and ioyning together of their ranks & orders, which doth stay vp one another, more then doth euer y private fouldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, and that they ran their way: one part of the Romains followed the chafe, & the other ran to give a charge vpon the flanks of the right wing which fought yet, and they made great flaughter of them. Wherupon they now which before had the vantage, began to stagger and breake, and in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing down their only in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing down their weapons: infomuch as there were flaine of them eight thousand in the field, and fine thousand our came taken prisoners in their chase. And had not the fault bin in the ÆTOLIANS, Philip had not faued Philips are himselfe by flying as he did. For whilest the Romain's had their enemies in chase, the Atoli-Maurie ANS tarried, and rifled all king Philips campe, fo as they left the Romaines nothing to spoile between the at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot words betweene them, and one and the with another. But afterwards it angred Titus worse, challenging the honour of this victory to Romaines. themiclies, because they gaue it out through GRECE, that they alone had ouerthrowne king philip in the battell. So that in the fongs and ballades the Poets made in praise of this victory, which every country and townes-man had in his mouth, they alwayes put the ÆTOLIANS before the ROMAINES: as in this that followeth, which was currently fung in enery place: Ob friend, which paffest by : here lye we wretched pheares, Withouten honour of the grave, without lamenting teares. We thirty thousand were, which ended have our dayes: In cruell coasis of Theffaly, which caufed our decaies. We have bene overthrowne by th' Atolians men of warre. And by the Latine crewes likewife, whom Titus led from farre, Even out of Italy, to Macedonie land, Vs to destroy, be (captainelike) did come with mighty band: And Philip flout, therewhiles for all his proud fierce face, Is fled, more froift then Harts do run, which are pursude in chase.

The Poet was Alexus that made these verses for to sing, who did them in disgrace of king Philip, fallely increasing the number of his men which died in the battell, onely to shame and spite him the more: howbeit he spited Titus thereby, more then Philip, because it was sung in every place. For Philip laughed at it, and to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a fong to counterfeit his, as followeth:

This gibbet on this bill, which paffers by may marke, Was fet to hang Alceus up withouten leaves or barke.

But Titus tooke it grieuously, who chiefly desired to be honoured amongst the Green, by reason wherof from that time forwards he dealt in the rest of his matters alone, without making account of the Ærolians: wher with they were maruellous angry, and specially when he received an ambassador from Philip, and gave eare vnto a treatie of peace which he offered. For gradge bethen they were so netled against him, that they gave it out through all GRECE, that Titus had times fold peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haucended the war, and vtterly haue deftroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought GRECE into bondage. These stans. derous reports and false tales which the Atolians spread thus abroad, did much trouble the Romaines friends and confederates: but Philips selfe pulled this suspition out of their heads, when he came in person to require peace, and did submit himself wholly to the discretion of Titus and the Romaines. Titus then granted him peace, and delinered to him his realme of Ma- To Quintins CEDON, and commanded him he fhould give over all that he held in GRECE; and besides, that Philip he should pay one thousand talents for tribute, taking from him all his army by sea, sauing onely ten ships; and for assurance of this peace, he tooke one of his sons for hostage, whom he sent to Rome. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, & wifely did foresee the time to come. For then Hannibal of CARTHAGE (the great energy of the Romaines) was banished out of his countrey, Hannibal andcame to king Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earneftly moued, to follow his good was with fortune, and the increase of his Empire. Whom Hannibal so followed with these perswasions, and the increase of his Empire. that king Antiochus at length was come to it. And trusting to his former good successe, and notableacts, whereby in the wars before he had attained the furname of Great, he began now to an spire to the monarchie of the whole world, and sought how to find occasion to make wars with the ROMAINES. So that if Titus (foreseeing that a far off) had not wisely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the wars of king Philip, & that these two the mightiest Princes of the world had ioyned together against the city of Rome: then it had bene in as great trouble and danger, as euer it was before in the time of their wars against Hannibal. Howbeit, Titus having happily thrust in this peace betweene both wars, he cut off the warre that was present, before the other that was coming: by which meanes he tooke from one of the kings his last, and from the other his first hope. In the meane time the ten commissioners that were fent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aide & affilt him in the order of the affaires of GRECE, did counfell him to fet all the rest of GRECE at liberty, and onely to keepe in their hands with good garrison, the cities of CHALCIDE, of CORINTH, and of DEMETRIADE, to make fure that by practife they should not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then by Philip of the ETOLIAN'S (that were the common flanderers of Titus proceedings) began openly to make these cities to rebell, and did summon Titus to loose the chaines of GRECE for so did king Philip call the fethree cities. Then they asked the GRECIANS in mockery, whether they were willing now to have heavier fetters on their legs then before, being somewhat brighter and fairer then those they had bene shackled with: and also whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking offthe fetters from the GRECIANS legs, and tying them about their necks. Titus being maruelloufly troubled and vexed with this, moued the ten Counfellors fo earneflly, that he made them grant his request in the end, that those three cities also should be delivered from garrison: because the GRECIANS thenceforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberality was not throughly performed and accomplified in every respect on them all. Wherfore when the feast called Ishmia was come, there were gathered together an infinit multitude of people, come to fee the sport of the games played there: for GRECE having bene long timetroubled with wars, they seeing themselves now in sure peace, & in very good hope of sull liberty, looked after no other thing, but delighted onely to see games, and to make merry . Proclamation was then made by found of trumpet in the assembly, that enery man should keepesi-Icnce. That done, the herald went forward, & thrust into the middest of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloud: that the Senate of Rome, and Titus Quintins Flaminius, Conful of the people of Rome, (now that they had ouerthrowne king Philip and the Macedonians in battell) did thenceforth discharge from all garrisons, and set at liberty from all taxes, subsidies, & impositions for ever to live after their old ancient lawes, and in fulliberty: the Corint Hians, the Lo-CRIANS, those of PHOCIDE, those of the Iles of EVBOEA, the ACHAIANS, the PHTHIOTES, the Magnesians, the Thessalians, and the Perro effians. At the first time of the Proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herald, and the most part of those that heard him, could not tell directly what he faid: for there ran vp and down the shew-place where the games were plaid, a confused bruite and tumult of people, that wondered, and asked what the matter meant, so as the herald was driven againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after filence made, the herald putting out his voice far louder then before, did proclaime it in such audible wife, that the whole affembly heard him: and then rose there such a loud shout and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the found of it was heard to the fea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were fet to fee the Sword-players play, rofe vp al on their feet, letting the games alone, and went together with great toy to falute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recourier, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of $G_{R,E}$ o z. Then was seene (which is much spoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crowes fell downe at that present time among the people, which by chance flew ouer the shew-place at that time that they made the same outthe found of shour. This came to passe, by reason the aire was broken and cut asunder with the vehemencie mens voices and firength of the voyces, to as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe up the flying of the birds: which were driven of necessity to fall to the ground, as slying through a voide place where they lacked aire. Vnleffe we will rather fay, that it was the violence of the crie, which stroke the birds passing through the aire, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and so made them fal down dead to the earth. It may be also, that there was some hurling wind in y aire, as wedo fee sometime in the sea, when it riseth high, & many times turneth about the waves, by violece of the storme. So it is, that if Titus had not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to fee him, & that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended he had hardly escaped from being stifled amongst the the people came so thicke about him fro every place. But after that they were weary of crying and finging about his paulion vntill night, in the end they went their way; and as they went, if they met any of their kin, friends or citizens, they did kiffe and embrace one another for ioy, and so supped and made merric together. In their more reioycing yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the warsof GRECE, discoursing among the what fundry great wars they had made, what they had endured heretofores
